*This book is free to anyone who wants to read it.
It is not to be sold by anyone including me.
Anyone who tries to sell this book for a profit will be sued.*

Due to the ideas presented in this book, I have had to use various terms and words that are not found in dictionaries: beginning with the title. The word: ‘Splitness’ is used to describe two complimentary, simultaneous conditions: Connection and Separation. This book explores the logical extrapolation of this and other Dynamics. My challenge to the reader is simple:

Is this book true, or not?

Preface

The Basic Elements of Human Understanding are:

Experience
Comparison
Evaluation
Perspective

Putting all of these elements together creates a larger context of awareness which result in a better understanding.

For instance: what can you understand about an orange by looking at it through a microscope? The answer is; very little. But if you plant an orange seed and wonder about it. If you care for the seedling, and study its growth closely and wonder about it. If you watch how it grows into a tree and wonder about it. If you live by it, and sit under its shade and wonder about it. If you listen to the wind soughing through its branches and enjoy its beauty and wonder about it. If you pick its fruit, eat it and wonder about it. If you explore the incredible range of uses we have found for its oil, its rind and its pulp: in medicine, cooking, woodwork, nutrition and wonder about it... The wider the context of your experiences, the more comparisons you can make between different experiences, the better you can evaluate them, the better your perspective, the better your understanding is of anything... not just an orange. Then you have a wide range of experiences which you can evaluate, compare and put into perspective. Then you have a wider context of experience to put your understanding into.

What is the Sense of Wonder? The Sense of Wonder blends all the Basic Elements of Understanding together. Without the Sense of Wonder: we could never gain a better, more cohesive understanding about anything. The Sense of Wonder is an expansion or contraction of awareness. Any expanding or contracting awareness creates a Sense of Wonder. When you wonder about your inner self, your inner awareness contracts or expands. When you wonder about things that are outside you, your outer awareness expands or contracts. It is your mind breathing... taking everything in, absorbing it, digesting it, understanding it and then radiating everything it understands out, or in.

The Sense of Pure Wonder is a continual sense of awareness which is curious about everything, and never stops being curious. It uses all of the cognitive skills of your mind; continually asking questions, continually figuring things out, continually wondering about things, continually looking at things in new ways, continually experiencing new things, continually comparing things to each other, continually gaining a better perspective on the larger context, continually understanding things better. It is a state of mind that is in a constant, continual unending state of Learning.

Experience
Comparison
Evaluation
Perspective } + A Sense of Pure Wonder = Expanded Awareness

Expanded Awareness + Learning = Better Understanding

Main Chapters

Chapter 1: The Universe.

Pgs 1-126                      How the Universe came into Being.

Chapter 2: Life

Pgs 127-153                      Structural Dynamics of the Universe and Life

Chapter 3: Hominids

Pgs 154-211                      A: How we evolved into Humans
Pgs 212-249                      B: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Chapter 4: Modern Human Dynamics

Pgs 250-292                      Human Psychobiologic Totality.

Chapter 5: Modern Humans:

Pgs 293-327                      The Transition from Hunter-gatherers to Settlements

Chapter 6: Civilization

Pgs 327-757                      A: The Beginnings of Civilization
Pgs 758-1520                      B: The Effect of Civilization on Humans

Pgs 1521-2451                      Chapter 7: Entities and the Alternative

Chapter One: The Universe

Actual Infinity ..... 2

The Dynamic of Infinite Permutations ..... 5

Black Holes and Nothingness ..... 7

Dimensions and Causality..... 9

Connection and Separation ..... 10

The Impetus of Splitness..... 11

Formlessness ..... 14

The First Major Split..... 15

The Second Major Split ..... 21

The Third Major Split ..... 23

Einstein’s Mistake..... 25

The Dynamics of Splitting ..... 29

The Organic Nature of Splitness..... 37

Energy, Space, and Time ..... 39

The Dynamics of Splitting ..... 50

Time ..... 55

The Dynamic of Time..... 57

Space..... 65

The End of the Universe ..... 67

Relativity..... 70

The Two-Dimensional Universe..... 76

The Basic 3-Dimensional Conditions of Our Universe ..... 80

Selective Awareness ..... 85

Re-statement ..... 85

Gravity ..... 87

Understanding the Process of Splitness ..... 90

Causality ..... 93

Randomness ..... 96

Perspective and Distance ..... 98

Conclusion ..... 99

Understanding the Difference between the Infinite and the Finite ..... 108
 The Difference between Actuality and Abstraction..... 112

Chapter Two: Life

The Triality of the Universe..... 129
 The Totality of Twelve ..... 130
 Science ..... 135
 Instinct and Evolution ..... 137
 How and Why Life Emerged ..... 140

Chapter Three A: Hominids

The Basis of Hominid-Human Evolution ..... 156
 The 1st Major Imbalanced Split..... 156
 The 2nd Major Imbalanced Split ..... 157
 The 3rd Major Imbalanced Split..... 160
 The 4th Major Imbalanced Split ..... 166
 The 5th Major Imbalanced Split ..... 167
 The 6th Major Imbalanced Split: the Amnesia of Being Born ..... 168
 The Use of Fire as a Tool:..... 169
 The Effects of Using Fire..... 181
 Pyramidal Focus: ..... 182
 The Geometric Structure of Self-Awareness ..... 187
 The Geometric Structure of Civilization..... 189
 Balanced and Imbalanced Awareness..... 190
 The Reflective Dynamic of Human Awareness..... 190
 The Imbalance of Human Awareness ..... 191
 Language..... 193
 Time Awareness..... 194
 The Power of Mobility..... 199
 Vertical Upward Mobility and Horizontal Lateral Mobility..... 202
 The Fear of all Pyramidal Power ..... 203

Peer Pressure..... 204
 Destructive and Constructive Confidence ..... 212

Chapter Three B: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Learning and Instinct ..... 214
 The Splitting of Human Life-Energy ..... 216
 The Definition of What is Human ..... 218
 The Origin of Culture..... 225
 The Tool-Dynamic of Civilized Culture..... 234
 Wonder and Worship ..... 241
 Fear and Wonder..... 241
 Normality ..... 247
 Reality ..... 248
 Conclusion ..... 249

Chapter Four: Modern Human Dynamics

The Slow Death of Human Sensitivity-Awareness ..... 252
 The Human Inner Self..... 253
 The Imbalanced Splitting of Human Awareness ..... 254
 Balancing Human Awareness ..... 258
 The Need for Inner Balance and Self-Understanding..... 259
 Individual Awareness..... 265
 The Inner Child-Infant-Fetus and Personality Integration..... 280
 Child Rearing and Health..... 284
 Questions of Child-rearing..... 286
 Imbalanced Awareness and Pain ..... 287
 The Preservation of Imbalance ..... 290
 Memory and Wisdom ..... 293

Chapter Five: The Transition from Hunter-gatherers to Settlements

Modern Humans before Civilization .....	295
The Dynamics of the Transition .....	297
The Creation of Robber Baron Culture.....	307
The Basic Factors.....	307
The Consequences of Accumulation .....	309
The Agricultural Revolution.....	310

How the Universe Came into Being.

In order to understand how the Big Bang happened, some basic facts must be established. Two basic facts about the emergence of the Universe before the Big Bang are:

Two pre-existing basic conditions existed before the Big Bang:

The Dynamic of Actual Causality,
And
The Condition of Actual Infinity.

1: Something caused it to explode. It did not explode for no reason at all. It did not explode by magic. In order for it to explode, there had to be a pre-existing Condition of Causality which caused it to explode.

2: It exploded in a Condition of Actual Infinity. When it first emerged, it was already in a Condition of Actual Infinity. The Condition of Actual Infinity existed before it emerged.

Actual Causality

The Dynamic of Actual Causality is a connected sequence of events. Every cause is an effect, and every effect is a cause. It is the Dynamic which actually causes things to happen in a strict sequence. Cause and Effect can also be defined by Newton's Third Law of Motion which states: "For every action: there is an equal and opposite reaction." However this Law is not worded correctly. The proper wording is: "For every action: there is an equal and opposite balanced reaction." EG:

cause-effect-cause-effect-cause-effect-cause-effect-cause-effect-cause effect

By tracing a sequence of events backwards: forensic experts can go into a burned out building where an explosion happened, and determine not only what made the explosion happen, but where it happened and how it happened, and what the triggering device was. This can be demonstrated by lining up dominos. You can make them tip over in one direction in a strict causal sequence of events. You can also tip them over in the opposite direction. The Causal Dynamics responsible for the explosion can be traced back to before the Big Bang because the Condition of Causality existed before the Big Bang happened.

Actual Infinity

The definition of Infinite means something is without limits, without bounds, without any end to it. Something that is endless. But this definition is not complete. The correct definition of Infinity is something without an end, and without a beginning. Infinity is something that has no beginning and no end. There is no end and no beginning to anything that is Actually Infinite. I use the term: Actual, to separate my use of the word Infinity from those who think that Infinity is merely an idea, and not an actual fact. Actual Infinity is not an intellectual conjecture. Actual Infinity is not an idea. Actual Infinity is not imaginary. It is not a possibility. It is not a probability. Infinity is not an abstract concept invented by humans. The Condition of Infinity actually exists.

To get a slight intimation of the Actual Infinity of the Universe: aim the Hubble telescope in one direction and pick up the farthest detectable radiation 13 billion light years away. Now, if you could magically transport the Hubble telescope 13 billion light years to the farthest radiation you managed to pick up, and aim it again, along the same exact straight line, and pick up the farthest detectable radiation again ... And if you repeat this an infinite number of times along the same straight line: you will still not get to the end of the Universe. You will never get to the end of the Universe. There is no end to the Universe. The Universe is actually limitless in its size.

To even begin to understand what Actual Infinity is, you need to have a Sense of Wonder. Science has found that the Universe we live in is both larger and smaller in size than we ever dreamed possible; because they wondered about it and asked questions and explored these questions. The Universe is not only actually infinitely large in size; it is infinitely small in size also. The Condition of size ranges from the infinitely small to the infinitely large.

The fact is; our Universe actually does not have any finite end to it. It also does not have a finite beginning to it. We are living inside a Universe that is actually infinite in size. The largeness of the Universe is Actually Infinite. This is not a theory or a supposition. This is a fact. Not only that... the smallness of the Universe is also Actually Infinite. Largeness is only ½ of the Condition of Size. The other half of this Condition is Smallness. It is the Condition of Size itself that is Actually Infinite; not just the condition of largeness or smallness. The Condition of Actual Infinity is the larger Condition inside which every other Condition of the Universe exists; including the Condition of Size.

For instance: microscopes have revealed that what appears to be uniform at one level of perception is not uniform at all, but actually full of small differences. These smaller differences cannot be perceived with the naked eye. They can only be perceived by magnification. Once they are magnified: then we can see that what we thought was uniformly smooth: is actually full of dissimilar differences made up of smaller things we did not see before magnifying them. What Science once thought was the smallest thing in the Universe, the atom: was found to be actually made up of smaller things called neutrons, protons and electrons. Then Science found that protons and neutrons are actually made up of even smaller things called quarks. Science found that in the study of the smallest things in the Universe: Quantum physics, there is no uniformity on the smallest subatomic level. Whatever may look or seem to be absolutely uniform: can be magnified further to show that the appearance of its uniformity is an illusion. Science has found that the reason there is no uniformity in the Universe is because small things are made up of even smaller things that cause these dissimilarities... without any end to how smaller they are. The cause of all dissimilarities in the Universe is because of smaller things that are so small we cannot see them... even with microscopes. As in Ogden Nash's poem: and little fleas have lesser fleas, and so on, ad infinitum’

What if there was a finite limit to how small energy particles could be...?

What if they could not be divided any further into smaller energy particles? If the smallest energy particles were finite in size: A finite limit to their smallness means that the smallest finite energy particles would all have to be exactly the same size; simply because they could not be anything smaller. Not only would the smallest energy particles have to be exactly the same size: there could not be any dissimilarity between them. Because if there were any dissimilarity between them, it would then mean that they are made up of even smaller things that cause these dissimilarities. That is... if the smallest energy particles had a finite limit to how small they could actually be: which they do not.

In other words: for the Universe to be finite in size: Literally all of the smallest energy particles in the Universe... would have to be not only the same size... they would also have to be absolutely identical to each other not only in size: but in every other way also. Because the only way you could have dissimilarity in anything of the same size... is if there are things that are even smaller which cause these dissimilarities.

If this were true... then the entire hierarchy of larger energy particles would also have to be made up of energy particles that are absolutely identical to each other. If this were true, then the characteristics and behavior of every quark: would have to be absolutely identical to every other quark in the Universe. Then the characteristics and behavior of every lepton in the Universe: would have to be absolutely identical to every other lepton in the Universe. If there were a finite limit to how small energy particles could be, then all quarks the same size would be absolutely identical to each other. All the leptons the same size would be absolutely identical to each other. All the electrons the same size would be absolutely identical to each other, all the atoms the same size would be absolutely identical to each other, all molecules the same size would be absolutely identical to each other, all the stars the same size would be absolutely identical to each other, and all galaxies the same size in the Universe... would be absolutely identical to each other.

If this were true, which it is not: then there could be no permutations or variations of differences of any kind of things the same size in the Entire Universe whatsoever. Then at every level of size... everything in the Universe would be not only absolutely the same size: they would be absolutely identical to each other, without any difference or variation between them.

Everyone knows this is not true.

By using logical deduction and reasoning, the infinite variations and permutations of differences and dissimilarities of all things that are generally the same size in the Universe proves beyond any doubt that the Universe is Actually Infinite both in its largeness and in its smallness of size.

The Condition of Size is merely one aspect of the Basic Condition of Actual Infinity. Even the idea of infinity could not exist inside our Universe if it was finite. Nothing that is larger can exist inside something that is smaller than it is. If the Universe were finite in size: then there could be no permutations of variability, then there could be no quarks that behave differently from other quarks, then there could be no creative evolution of the Universe, then there could be no organic evolution, then there could be no Life on Earth and no human beings.

The Dynamic of Infinite Permutations

Throughout the entire Universe no two things are absolutely identical to each other. No two grains of sand are exactly identical to each other. No two drops of water are exactly the same. No two snowflakes are identical to each other. No two atoms are exactly the same. No two planets are exactly the same. No two stars are exactly the same; no two galaxies are identical to each other. No two trees are exactly the same. No two leaves are exactly the same. The Universe is full of infinite diversity. This infinite diversity comes from infinite permutations of basic elements and structures and designs never repeating themselves exactly the same way.

The Dynamic of Infinite Permutations comes from the Path of Splitness. When any energy encounters any other energy in its Path, it deflects away, or splits off from its original path. This deflection creates a change in its direction; which creates differences in the basic structures of Energy on all levels, and in how they act and react. This can be visibly seen in the dynamics of a growing tree. Every seedling of the same species starts out very much the same, and looks very much the same. But the more it grows: the more different, the more unique it becomes simply because it keeps on splitting. The more it splits off from its original path: the more unique it becomes. Why? Because every split is different. Every split is unique. No two splits are exactly the same.

If the Universe was not Actually Infinite, then the number of permutations of different grains of sand, different drops of water, different snowflakes, different atoms, different planets, different stars, different galaxies would necessarily have to be limited to a finite number. If this were true, then sooner or later, they would have to repeat themselves. If this were true: somebody, somewhere... would find two things that are absolutely identical to each other. If the Universe were finite: then sooner or later: scientists would find two stars that are exactly the same. Sooner or later somebody would find two grains of sand that are exactly the same. Sooner or later you would find two leaves that are exactly the same. Sooner or later: you would find two snowflakes that are exactly the same.

This has never happened.

This will never happen.

This cannot happen because the Universe is not finite.

The Universe is Actually Infinite.

Infinite permutations cannot exist inside a finite Universe. The idea of infinity itself could not even be conceived of inside a finite Universe. You cannot have Mandelbrot's famous series of equations that go on forever, never repeating exactly the same way inside a finite Universe: unless you have a Dynamic of Infinite Permutations as a basic Condition of the Universe... and you cannot have that, unless the Universe is Actually Infinite. The idea of a finite Universe housing infinite permutations of everything; is like trying to stuff an elephant into a mouse. It cannot be done. It is impossible. It is too absurd for words. The Condition of Actual Infinity cannot exist inside something that is finite.

Black Holes and Nothingness

The energy sucked into a black hole is not destroyed; the energy inside them does not disappear. Energy, Space and Time are not destroyed inside a black hole; they are just intensely compressed. The Conditions of Energy, Space, and Time still exists inside black holes. They just exist in an intensely compressed Condition. It is merely the structure of the energy inside a black hole which is destroyed, not the energy itself. For example take a wafer and crush it into powder. You have destroyed the structure of that wafer. The powder takes up less space. But the wafer has not disappeared. The energy of the wafer has not been destroyed. It is just the structure of the wafer which has been destroyed. This is basically what a black hole does to energy that is sucked into it. Not one erg of energy is lost or destroyed inside a black hole. A black hole merely takes all the energy that is sucked into it, all the solid matter, all the light rays, all the dust particles; and turns it into a more compressed form of energy. It then spews this intense form of compressed energy out of its two polar orifices. The more energy it sucks in, the more powerfully it spews gamma rays and radio waves out of its two polar orifices. Things do not disappear into black holes; they just drop out of sight.

Whatever goes into a black hole also comes out. There is no magic involved here. The fact that Energy is not destroyed inside a black hole can be deduced by using common sense. If the energy inside a black hole actually did disappear, if the energy inside it was indeed completely destroyed, then the gravitational pull of that energy would by necessity also cease to exist. Then, there would be no mass of compressed energy to create the extremely powerful gravity well which goes to make up a black hole. Then there would be no black hole at all.

Newton's Third Law of Motion states: "For every action: there is an equal and opposite reaction.” This Law has never been disproven. In order for this Law to work, the Basic Conditions of Causality and Dynamic Balance have to exist in order for any action or reaction to even happen. Newton’s Third Law of Motion applies not only to physical objects, it applies not only applies to Energy, it applies to Space and Time as well. It is a Law that is so simple, so taken for granted: that nobody ever has thought to state it formally as a Universal Law, not just as a Law of Physics for moving physical objects. This Universal Law is The Law of Dynamic Balance. Whatever exists: something else must exist in order to balance its existence. There are no exceptions to the Law of Dynamic Balance. This Law goes far beyond what exists inside the Universe. This Law goes far beyond our Universe. Existence must also be balanced by Non-existence. The Universal Condition for something to exist also requires the balancing Condition for nothing to exist also and vice versa. Neither Condition can exist without the other.

What is a black hole? A black hole is nothing more than a gravity well which sucks Energy, Space and Time into it. It sucks not just energy into it... it sucks literally everything into it. The fact that Black Holes exist proves that Space, Energy and Time can be compressed. Black holes compress all the three basic elements of our Universe simultaneously. Not just Energy. Not just Space. Not just Time. Everything. All three. In essence, Black holes are compressions of Everythingness. What makes this compression possible at all? Here is where the Universal Law of Dynamic Balance applies. Here is where Newton’s Third Law of Motion applies to black holes. You cannot have an action without an equal and opposite balancing reaction. You cannot have something unless it’s opposite exists to balance it. All forces, all things in the Universe must balance. The Condition of compression which exists inside a black hole can only exist if it is balanced by another compression which is equalize to it, and balances it, and is its complete opposite. The only compression that can balance a black hole which sucks everything into it is a compression which is the opposite of everything.

The opposite of Everything is Nothing.

The compression inside a black hole is a compression of Everythingness.

Even though we cannot see the other half of this compression; it exists. It has to exist. The other half of a black hole is a compression of Nothingness. Without a balanced, equalizing compression of Nothingness black holes could not exist.

Dimensions and Causality

What is a Dimension? A Dimension is a Linear Condition which is oriented 90 degrees to all other Dimensions. The Nature of the Universe is Actually Causal. Whatever happens in any of the 3 Dimensions of the Universe causes other things to happen in these 3 dimensions. The Nature of all three Dimensions is Actually Infinite. The Three dimensions of our Universe did not appear by magic out of nowhere; they were created in a strict causal sequence. Our Universe existed first as a Causal Infinite Totality that had no Dimensions. The 3 Dimensions were created logically, naturally, organically, mathematically and mechanically in a strict causal order of 1-2-3. The reason why our Universe has Three Dimensions is because these dimensions were created by a Causal Process splitting dimensionally three times: one way, two ways and then three ways in a series of Three Basic Causal Splits.

Before the 3 Dimensions were created the Universe existed in a Condition of Actual Infinity which had no dimensions at all... but it still had a Condition of Causality. Not only did it have no dimensions, the existence of the Condition of Causality preceded the existence of the Condition of Actual Infinity, otherwise the Condition of Actual Infinity could not have created the 3 Dimensions in a causal sequence.

The Nature, and Condition and Dynamics of the 3 Dimensions of the Universe are Actually Causal, and Actually Infinite. Actual Causality and Actual Infinity are most Basic Natural Organic Conditions and Dynamics of the Universe.

You cannot have three Dimensions in a Condition of Actually Infinity and a Dynamic of Actually Causality without the Condition of Actual Infinity and the Dynamic of Actual Causality existing before the Three Dimensions were first created. The Condition of Actual Infinity and the Dynamic of Actual Causality had to exist before there was the Condition-and-Dynamic of Dimension. Otherwise the 3 dimensions of the Universe would not be Actually Infinite or Causal in nature. The three Dimensions of the Universe were created after the Dynamic of Actual Causality and the Condition of Actual Infinity, not before.

The Condition of every Dimension in our Universe is Actually Causal
The Condition of every Dimension in our Universe is Actually Infinite.
The Dynamic of every Dimension in our Universe is Actually Causal.
The Dynamic of every Dimension in our Universe is Actually Infinite.

The Universe is made up of Three Dimensions: Length, Width and Depth. All of these Dimensions are oriented 90 degrees to each other. Because they are all causally connected to each other; whatever happens in any one of the 3 Dimensions of the Universe also causes things to happen in the other two dimensions. The Nature of these 3 Dimensions are Actually Causal. What had to happen in order for our Universe to be created was the Infinite Totality of Formlessness being split apart by Impetus in a strict Causal sequence of 1-2-3. What am I talking about? I'm talking about the Basic Conditions which existed before our Universe was born.

Connection and Separation

Before the 3 Dimensions of the Universe could be created, two other Dynamic Conditions also had to be created. These two Basic Conditions were:

The Condition of Connection
and
The Condition of Separation

Before anything can be split, the Conditions of Connection and Separation have to exist before any Splitness can occur. Before a Singularity can split apart there has to be both a Condition of Connection, and a Condition of Separation. Only after the Conditions of Connection and Separation were added to the Conditions of Actual Causality, Actual Infinity could the Universe have emerged the way it did. The four distinct Basic Conditions which had to exist before the 3 Dimensions of Universe could be created were:

The Condition of Actual Causality
The Condition of Actual Infinity
The Condition of Actual Connection
The Condition of Actual Separation

The Impetus of Splitness

In order for the Condition of Splitness to be causally created from an Unsplit Totality: something had to be there to make it split. That something was the Primeval Phenomenon called: Impetus. Impetus is the Basic Force that pushes things around in our Universe. It was the Basic Force that caused the Explosion of the Big Bang to happen. It is the basic Force which splits things apart.

Science has managed to measure certain aspects of Impetus: but it does not fully understand what it is measuring. Impetus is not inertia. Neither is it mass. It is an Organic Force. There is a general phenomenon throughout the Universe that Science calls Inertia. Everything that happens tends to keep on happening. Everything that moves tends to keep on moving, everything that stays still tends to keep on staying still. But that is only one small aspect of Impetus. Science has mistakenly tried to categorize aspects of Impetus into mechanical characteristics; of Inertia, Momentum and Mass. Science has used the idea of Impetus properly in one respect; as the term for any force that changes stillness into motion, and motion into stillness. But the force of Impetus also does something else. Impetus not only changes stillness into motion and motion into stillness: It also makes things go around. Impetus does not just change stillness into an absolutely straight linear path of motion, it also changes stillness into a linear path that eventually curves, and tends to go around. This is the reason why stars and planets have orbits, this is the reason why planets rotate, this is the reason why electrons orbit around atoms.

The scientific fact is... all the Impetus of all the Energy in the Universe not only goes in a straight linear direction.... it also goes around. Science has tried to separate these two inseparable aspects into different phenomenon, using theories of Gravity, and Friction, and Magnetism, and Centrifugal force, and Polarity, and Positive-Negative charged particles, etc... All this complication is unnecessary. The Impetus in our Universe does these two things naturally because it has been doing both long before our Universe ever emerged, and long before Energy was ever created.

The Organic nature of Impetus can be seen in the organic growth of a seed. The force it takes for a seed to sprout and force its way out of the ground and split does not come from the energy locked within the tiny seed. That force is not a form of unlocked potential energy being released: it is a form of Organic Impetus splitting. Science can explain where the seed gets its water from, and where it gets its nutrition from and how it begins to use photo-synthesis as a source of energy... But it cannot explain the incredible strength that a small seed has, or where that strength comes from, because Science has not realized that Impetus is as Organic Force; not a mechanical one.

Take light rays as an example. Light rays traveling through intergalactic space actually avoid hitting stars: they go around stars organically. Not only that, once they go around a star... they curve back again and resume their original position and direction. This is true not just in the medium of Space, but in other mediums also. You can see how light rays go around an object blocking their path on the horizon at sunrise or sunset. At sunset or sunrise... any boat passing in front of the sun on the ocean as you look into the sun, almost disappears from view. This is because the sunlight behind the boat curves around the boat. You can see this effect also in how the farther away a shadow is from the object making that shadow: the fuzzier the edge, the lighter the shadow becomes. The fact is: the farther away a light source is from an object blocking its path: the more opportunity it has to bend around that object.

Today, the fact that Light rays can bend is no big secret. Optical fiber telephone cables bend light every day and we think nothing of it. However, what Science does not recognize is that light bends naturally by itself regardless of which medium it travels through... it goes around objects blocking its path naturally: just like water flows naturally around stones in a shallow stream and once having gone around the stone, it regains its previous linear condition.

The only reason light travels in a general direction that is more or less straight, is because when it is moving through space it has no opposition, there is nothing in its way. When light hits our atmosphere: it goes around atoms and molecules in the atmosphere: not in a perfectly straight line. Just like it does with stars in space. If light traveled in a perfectly straight line: it would release most of its energy before it ever reached the surface of the earth. If light rays went in a perfectly straight line in Outer Space: sooner or later it would hit a star. Even if it never hit a star...it would still not travel in an absolutely straight line... because as Science now knows: the Space of our Universe is curved, and any ray of light going from one end of the Universe to the other curves, simply because the Space it travels through is curved.

The Impetus of Splitness had to exist before the Big Bang happened. If it hadn't, been there before the Big Bang happened; there couldn't have been any explosion in the first place. What Science has missed is that Impetus is not only the basic force that makes things move in our Universe in a Linear path... it is also what makes things go around. The Basic Condition of Impetus was doing this long before our 3-dimensional Universe ever emerged. This is very, very important to understand. The reason all things that move in our Universe go around is because the Basic Condition of Impetus of the Universe not only goes in a linear path, it also goes around. You can see this in how galaxies and stars move. You can see this in how the energy of the Sun moves. You can see this in how the energy of the atmosphere moves. You can see this in how water moves. You can see it in atoms and electrons; you can see this in everything that moves.

Our Universe emerged as it did because there was a Basic pre-existing Condition called Impetus which existed before the Universe emerged. The Impetus of Splitness existed before the Big Bang happened. That Impetus had two basic characteristics. It went in a straight line. And it also went around. It went in a straight line and then it curved. This is the reason why not only the path of all Energy curves, but it is also the reason why the Space of our Universe is curved. The Curvature of Space comes from the Condition of Impetus which existed before the Big Bang happened.

Formlessness

There is only one more thing missing in this formula. What is missing is the most basic ingredient of all, what is missing... is what the Impetus of Splitness acted upon.

Actual Causality is a Basic Dynamic of the Universe... what is this Dynamic acting through? What is it acting upon? Actual Infinity is a Basic Condition of the Universe... what is this Dynamic acting through? What is it acting upon? Connection and Separation are Basic Dynamics of the Universe... what are these two dynamics acting through? What are they acting upon? Impetus is a Basic Force of the Universe... just exactly what is it pushing around? There had to be something that these Dynamics and Conditions acted upon before the Universe emerged. For the Universe to be shaped in the manner it was before the Big Bang: there had to be something that Impetus could shape, in order to give the Universe its form.... That something, that basic missing ingredient was something that had no shape or form... it was something that was a Medium that Impetus could act through... that Medium was something called: Formlessness.

This was the missing Condition that Causality needed to act through.

This was the missing Condition that Actual Infinity needed to exist in.

This was the missing Condition that Impetus went through, and went around.

This was the missing Condition that had to exist before there could be any kind of Totality. This was the basic missing ingredient that was needed to exist before Connection and Separation could be created.

This was the basic missing ingredient that was needed before The Path of Splitness could even begin. Exactly what Formlessness is made of... just what it is... is completely unknown. All that human logic can conclude is; that in order for all of the Dynamics and Conditions and Forces that were needed to create the Universe to work, there had to be a basic Formless Medium for these Forces to work through, and act upon. Only after all of these basic Ingredients-Conditions-Dynamics were found and brought home and assembled in their proper order on the table... only then could the preparation for the recipe that created our Universe begin.

What is the main preparation in any recipe? You guessed right: chopping up things with a knife. Except instead of a knife and putting them into a bowl: it was the Linear Splitness of Impetus, and the Impetus of Going Around, that chopped things up, while keeping them together in the bowl. Instead of a chef: there were certain Basic Dynamics and Conditions. The Impetus of Splitness was not a knife: it was Raw, Primordial Force acting on a Raw Primeval Medium called Formlessness. Impetus was not a mechanical force: it was an Organic Primal Force. And the Primal Medium, which I call Formlessness, was not a three dimensional substance: it was the Primal Medium from which everything in the Universe is made of, including the 3 Dimensions... especially the 3 dimensions. What then happened... what had to happen in order for our Universe to be created, was the Infinite Totality of Formlessness being split apart by Impetus in a Causal sequence of 1-2-3

The First Major Split

Infinite Everythingness is the Totality of Everything in our Universe. The Universe exists as a Totality made up of Energy, Space and Time. Infinite Everythingness is simply the combined Totality of all the Infinite Energy, Infinite Space and Infinite Time of the Infinite Universe. Before the 3 dimensions of our Universe could be created, Impetus split this Condition of Formlessness into two Conditions:

The Condition of Infinite Everythingness
The Condition of Infinite Nothingness

The Condition of Infinite Totality was made up of a Formless Medium which could be shaped by Impetus. In other words, Nothingness is not an absolute void or vacuum: it is made out of an even more Basic Condition which is a Formless Medium. Everythingness and Nothingness are Conditions of Formlessness.

After Impetus managed to separate Formlessness into Everythingness and Nothingness; instead of one Totality to penetrate, there were two. This Condition was completely new to Impetus. He became confused, he became indecisive.... Which one should he go after? Which one was more attractive? Which one should he penetrate and split? Everythingness or Nothingness? He lost his male aggressiveness and confidence. As a result of his indecisiveness, free from the continuous furious onslaughts of Impetus going through Her, and around Her and through Her an infinite number of times, Formlessness was able to catch her breath a bit and slow down... but not for long. Impetus made up his mind: Everythingness was much more attractive; there was more of her to push around... he went after Her with a vengeance. When Impetus began splitting Formlessness, it did three things;

1. It split the Totality of Formlessness into a separated Duality of Everythingness and Nothingness
2. It created the Dynamics and Conditions of Separation, and Connection.
3. It created the first Linear Dimension of Length.

The first major split of Impetus splitting Formlessness into Everythingness and Nothingness is not included in the 3 major splits which caused the 3 dimensions to be formed. If you include it, then the number of Major Splits is actually 4, which is a balanced number, not 3. On this basis, the 3 major splits which created the 3 dimensions are actually the 2nd, 3rd and 4th Major Splits. The trouble is, the first major split was not completely linear and it did not create a linear dimension, which is why I do not include it.

The Path of Splitness which Impetus followed created the 3 linear Dimensions of our Universe in a natural Causal sequence. Before the 1st Linear Dimension could exist it had to have something to exist in. It had to have a Medium to exist in. That Medium was Formless. Only after the Dynamic of Linear Impetus split Formlessness into Everythingness and Nothingness, only after the entire Totality of Everythingness was split in one direction an infinite number of times, was the 1st Linear Dimension created. Before the 1st Dimension could be created; the Two Conditions of Connection and Separation had to be created first. They were created by Impetus plowing into the Infinite Condition of the Formless Totality of Everythingness an infinite number of times. The 3 dimensions were created in a specific order: naturally... organically... logically.

Impetus created the 1st Dimension of Length by splitting Infinite Everythingness in one direction. By going through her in a straight line, and then around her; doing it over and over an infinite number of times. Every time Impetus went through Formlessness He created linear lines of separation inside Her. It was not only the action of His penetration which created these separations; it was the result of Impetus exiting out of Formlessness which created these separations inside Her. It was the result of His absence after exiting out of Her which created the Separations inside Her. After he came out of Her, She connected herself back together again. Then Impetus went around Her and did it all over again until she became a formed Medium, made up of Linear Connections and Separations. Linear Impetus and Orbital Impetus are actually the same basic Force. Impetus went around the Infinite Totality of Formlessness, and plowed back into it in the same direction all over again. It did this over and over again in the same direction an infinite number of times. As it was doing this, Impetus was giving Formlessness a shape, it was shaping Formlessness into a Form; it was turning Formlessness into a single shape called a Totality. Impetus repeated this splitting over and over an infinite number of times; separating the Formlessness of Infinite Totality linearly, and then coming around to slit her apart again. After it split her Totality into a Duality of Everythingness and Nothingness, Formlessness tried to rejoin itself back into an unsplit whole. Formlessness tried to do this an Infinite number of times until she finally became a swirled Duality of Everythingness and Nothingness.

Then Impetus had to choose which part of Formlessness to split and began splitting Everythingness Every time The Linear Impetus of Splitness Split Everythingness apart: She came back together, but not as an unsplit whole. She came back together as two split halves that could not rejoin itself into a completely unsplit whole. The unsplit whole of Everythingness became a Totality made up of Connections and Separations. She became a Totality made up of Connections and Separations. These Connections and Separations were the second Linear Dualities to be created by the Path of Splitness. The first was the Basic Duality of Everythingness and Nothingness.

This infinitely repeated Dynamic of The Path of Splitness created the Dynamics and Conditions of Connection and Separation. The Condition of Infinite Everythingness changed from a Connected Condition to a Separated Condition, and back again to a Connected Condition an infinite number of times until finally, the Condition of Infinite Everythingness became an Infinite Condition of Connected Separations which were completely mono-Linear in nature all going in the same direction. She was changed from a Formless Mass, a Formless Medium, a Formless Totality into a shaped Totality, a shaped Form that was linear, and had only one dimension: the Dimension of Length. By being split apart an infinite number of times, and reconnecting an infinite number of times, this created:

The Dynamic of the Condition of Connection,
The Dynamic of the Condition of Separation, and the First Dimension of Linear Length.

This is roughly how it happened: The black lines represent the Force of Linear Impetus which I call the Impetus of Splitness. The colored lines are the Medium of Formlessness being defined and shaped into a linear form by the linear Force of Impetus splitting Formlessness.

Sep-Con-Sep-Con-Sep-Con -Sep

From a 1-dimensional Condition of Linear Connections and Separations that ran in only one Direction: Linear Impetus pushed Formlessness around.

To: Linear Impetus pushing Formlessness more around... into a circle

Until it pushed Formlessness into a complete circle. Into a 1-dimensional Totality..

And then all the way around, into two circles. Into Two 1-dimensional Totalities that were not 2-dimensional.

Finally splitting it into two completely separate rounds. into two shapes... into two Totalities which had only one Dimension: the Dimension of Length. This was how Everythingness and Nothingness was turned into a 1-dimensional linear Duality. The Impetus of Splitness organically turned the Medium of Formlessness into 2 Totalities of Everythingness and Nothingness. The more times The Dynamic of Splitness went in-between and around Everythingness and Nothingness, the more they became Linear in nature, the more they were pulled along a single linear line that tried to re-connect itself and revert back to its earlier Condition of connected non-linear Everythingness and connected non-linear Nothingness. The more times The Linear Impetus of Splitness went between them, the more it curved them around, the more Linear they became, the more they curved... until their linearity became completely circular... until the 1st Dimension became a circular 1-dimensional Totality... until they became 2 circular 1-dimensional Totalities: or the 1st Basic Dualism of Everythingness and Nothingness. The First Split of Actual Infinity was both organically simple and organically complex. It did many things simultaneously.

The Second Major Split

The two circular, linear Totalities which had become the 1st Dimension of linear Length were split apart at an angle of 90 degrees to the original Dimension of their Length. This created the new 2nd Dimension of Width. This created the 2-Dimensional Condition of the 2-Dimensional Universe. When the 1st Dimension of Length became circular in nature, even though its Linear Dimension was a circular Totality, it did not need the 2nd Dimension of Width to exist as a one-Dimensional Linear Totality of Actual Infinity, or even as two circular 1-dimensional Totalities. The 2nd Dimension was created like this:

Why did this happen? Because it was the only way that Impetus could split the two 1-dimensional Totalities apart again. In case you haven't noticed; the male Energy of Impetus wants to penetrate Formlessness... and then go around and come back and penetrate Her all over again... sound familiar? The only way He could do it was by changing the point of entry of His attack. By splitting Her apart in this new way... He created the 2nd Dimension. The 2nd Dimension was created by Impetus changing the angle of His attack, by the Linear Splitness of Impetus going through the Linear Duality of Everythingness at 90 degrees from where He had originally been going through Her before. By changing the angle of His entry by 90 degrees, Impetus could go through the center of both female Totalities instead of in-between them and churn them back into one big sexy Form, which He could split all over again, and shape, and split; over and over again, an infinite number of times. Sound familiar? That is what artists do with clay.

The Impetus of Splitness which slit Formlessness apart, also pulled Her around. The Impetus of Splitness that slit Formlessness apart also pulled Formlessness around into a Totality, into a shape, into a form. The Dynamic of Splitness was Linear; it was a straight line. But it was also curved, it went around, and it was also circular. The result was the two 1-dimensional Linear Totalities of Everythingness were churned back into a single Totality of mixed-up one-dimensional lines of Connection and Separation. The entire process which created the 1st Linear Dimension was repeated all over again, except that it was done at a 90 degree angle to the 1st dimension.

This is how Impetus split the 1-dimensional linear Conditions of Connection and Separation into two new Dynamics of Length and Width. Instead of just 1-dimensional linear Connections and Separations that went around, Impetus created 2-dimensional spaces between them. The same process was repeated until it was churned back into a Totality which was now completely 2-dimensional. But now, the whole dynamic was changed... because there were now 2-dimensional spaces between the Separations and Connections... these Connections and Separations could do something they couldn't do before... they could expand and contract... The extra dimension of Width changed the 1-dimensional Condition of Connections and Separations into 2-dimensional one of Contracting and Expanding rings like this;

And then being split apart split again....

Repeating the same basic dynamic of the 1st basic split all over again, but differently... at a 90 degree angle to the 1st split... creating 2-dimensional sets of contracting and expanding rings... going in and out an infinite number of times. This created the 2-dimensional Universe both organically and mechanically; it created the Dynamic of 2-dimensional expanding and contracting rings.

All Major Splits of the Path of Splitness are equal in nature. You can see this in Nature. You can see it in how sub-atomic particles act and react. You can see it in how a living cell splits. You can even see it in abstract mathematics. All Mathematical equations are dynamic balanced splits. Scientific equations only work if their two sides balance each other equally. If everything inside our Universe did not obey the Law of Equality of Balanced Splitness without exception, then there could be no Science, no mathematical equations, no Nature, no living cells, no sub-atomic particles, no Universe. Everything in the Universe tends to equal out, or balance out... this is a Universal Dynamic which is older than our Universe.

The Third Major Split

Impetus kept on splitting the two expanding and contracting 2-dimensional Rings of Linear Totalities apart an infinite number of times., expanding away from each other and contracting towards each other an infinite number of times, until they collided against each other with such force, they had nowhere else to go but out in a new direction that was 90 degrees from the direction they had always followed. They were forced to explode out, away from each other in the exact same way an atomic bomb is forced to explode; by the intense Dynamic of Compression and Contraction, being balanced by the Dynamic of Repulsion and Expansion. Except that they were not composed of two small spheres of Plutonium, they were composed of two sets of infinitely powerful rings of contracting and expanding 2-dimensional cells, which were infinite in their power, slamming into each other so hard, that they exploded completely out of the 2-dimensional Universe they were in... and by doing so, created a new dimension that was oriented 90 degrees to the Dimensions of Length and Width of the 2-dimensional Universe. This was how the new 3rd Dimension of Depth was created.

This was how the Big Bang happened. This was why it happened. Our three-dimensional Universe emerged out from the 2nd Dimension exactly the same way you drop a pebble into a pond, except it happened in reverse, like this:

If you reverse the film of a pebble hitting the 2-dimensional surface of a pond: you will see exactly how and why the Universe emerged from the 2nd Dimension. All the circular rings concentrating all of their 2-dimensional energy into a compressed central point created the singularity which was the origin of the Big Bang. The Linear circular rings of Connection and Separation contracting into the center had become 2-dimensional rings of Expansion and Contraction in the 2nd Dimensional Universe; when they were forced out of the 2nd dimension, they created a new 3rd Dimension, they became what Science calls the waves and troughs, or peaks and valleys of radiating 3-dimensional energy.

The small blip in the center of the pond, marking where the pebble hit, represents what Science calls the singularity of the Big Bang. That singularity, coming out from the center of the 2-dimensional pond, was the beginning of the creation of a new Dimension called Depth. Depth is the 3rd Dimension. That singularity was the beginning of our 3-dimensional Universe.

If you black out ½ of the pond and drop a pebble into it and run the sequence forward instead of in reverse, you will see exactly how ½ of the Big Bang happened. You will see how all the 2-dimensional Energy and 2-dimensional Space was forced out of the 2-dimensional Universe into the new 3rd Dimension.... But you will not see the other side of the explosion. You will not see the other Universe emerging out from the other side of the 2-dimensional Universe; which was the only way it could have happened. The fact is there were actually two singularities that balanced each other, not one. The only way our Universe could have been created was by another Universe also being created. One Universe was Male... the other was Female.

Einstein's Mistake

Light rays traveling through intergalactic space actually avoid hitting stars: they go around stars organically. Not only that, once they go around a star they curve back again and resume their original path. This is true not just in the medium of Space, but in other mediums also. You can see exactly how light rays go around an object naturally by looking at an object in front of the sun on the horizon at sunrise or sunset on the ocean. Any boat passing in front of the sun as you look into the sun almost disappears from view. This is because the sunlight coming from behind the boat is trying to curve around the boat. The reason the boat almost disappears from views is because the light going around the boat hasn't had time to straighten itself out yet... it's still roiling from the impact of nearly hitting the boat and trying to get around it. Just like water going around a stone in a stream roils around right behind the stone, but not further on. The water flow right behind the stone is not smooth simply because it hasn't had enough time and distance to straighten itself out yet and return to its original linear smoothness. This is exactly what light does when it hits an object. This is why you have glare when are looking at something right in front of the sun. Glare is just the visual effect of roiling sunlight, disturbed from its path by going around an object it is trying to avoid. The reason this is a good proof is because when the sun is on the horizon: the visual effect of the boat shrinking in size and almost disappearing from sight can clearly be seen using the naked eye without any expensive fancy scientific equipment. Anyone can do it and see with their own eyes how light behaves going around a boat, or a mountain. Light goes around objects directly in its path naturally. Einstein's theory of gravity, the weakest force in the Universe being powerful enough to attract and bend light is both a hoax and a farce.

Today, the fact that Light can bend is no big secret. Optical fiber telephone cables bend light every day. But light bending in Outer Space without needing an optical lens to bend it... this was a revolutionary idea 100 years ago when Einstein's predicted that it would happen . When his prediction of light bending around the moon was discovered to be actually true, the world of Science swallowed his completely fallacious explanation for it hook, line, and sinker. But then the troubles of Science began mounting. Once having swallowed Einstein's clever deception, scientists began to find crucial flaws in almost all of his theories. Accepting his explanation that light curved around the moon due to gravitational attraction was their most serious blunder. What Science failed to note was the fact that the moon has very little mass, and has almost no gravity. Einstein's explanation was a total scam right from the beginning of his being swept into the public eyes as some kind of phenomenal genius. The result of his swindling the entire scientific community with this clever stunt is that Science to this day still does not recognize, and will not admit that light does not go around objects because of any gravitational pull... it goes around objects in its path naturally; just like water naturally flows around stones in a shallow stream. And once having gone around the object, it resumes its original path naturally.

This is the 100 yr-old blunder which Science has failed to correct, and has preserved to the present day. Einstein's idea of a 'gravitational red-shift' is a complete blunder not only because he used Newton's obsolete model of Gravity, and this blunder was further covered up by including Newton's concept of Mass. Not only that, but Einstein's attempt to scrap his entire Theory of General Relativity by introducing what he called a 'Cosmological Constant' and further introducing another theory called 'Special Relativity' was a conscious attempt to sabotage and nullify and destroy the only valid idea he did have; which was the Theory of General Relativity. What is the Theory of General Relativity? It is the fact that everything is connected to everything else relatively on a general, universal basis; which Science is totally incapable of using or measuring. The fact is; modern science has still not managed to find out just what Mass actually is, and where it comes from. Science still does not know what Gravity actually is, where it comes from, how it works or why it works. Light does not bend due to any attractive force at all. In fact, the opposite is true. Light bends due to repulsive forces which make it try to avoid hitting anything directly in its path, not attractive forces. What Einstein and the rest of the Scientific world did not realize was that in order to see any light rays coming from the sun before the sun actually came out from behind the moon; was that this light had to first begin bending before it came around the moon... and then bend back around the moon, enough for photographs to show this curious phenomenon of sunlight emerging out from behind the moon before the sun actually came out from behind the moon.

The mistake made almost a century ago by Einstein was subtle: a slight miscalculation, but devastating in its ramifications. People didn't realize that the slight curve of sunlight detected was only half of the story. Scientists didn't realize that sunlight also curves before it reaches the moon, not just after. Einstein's explanation of gravity causing sunlight to curve around the moon was not only completely false: it was a huge blunder. Sunlight is not attracted-to anything which has gravity, in fact it does the exact opposite: it is repulsed by physical objects, not attracted to them, it just goes around them naturally, like flowing water goes around a stone. What is maddening about this is the state of denial that Science is in concerning this huge blunder. Science does not want to admit that it screwed up big-time. Science does not want to admit that Einstein's famous prediction of the lunar eclipse of the sun was based upon a completely false premise. Here is a crude representation of how the mistake was made:

The result of this blunder was... the entire basis of Modern Science for the past 100 years has been founded upon a set of completely false assumptions, and has been led on a wild goose chase ever since: searching for non-existent things which don't exist like gravitons, using terms like mass and gravity and the speed of light as universal constants: couching scientific measurements in terms and quantities that are not only completely false and misleading, but entirely non-existent. The fact is our moon is not a black hole. It does not have enough gravitational attraction to bend anything, much less light rays traveling at 186,000,000 miles per second. Neither does the earth's gravity bend light; neither does the gravity of the largest planet in the solar system Jupiter... neither does our sun. Einstein's theory of gravitational attraction bending light is a complete blunder and should be removed from all physics textbooks.

The only reason light travels in a general direction that is more or less straight is because when it is moving through the medium of space it has no opposition... there is nothing in its way. When light hits our atmosphere it goes around atoms and molecules in the atmosphere: not in a perfectly straight line. Just like it does with stars in space. If light traveled in a perfectly straight line it would hit everything in its path and release most of its energy before it ever reached the surface of the earth. If light rays went in a perfectly straight line in Outer Space: sooner or later it would hit dust, or a star. Even if it never hit a star, it would still not travel in an absolutely straight line, because as Science now knows the Universe is curved and so is Space, and any ray of light going from one end of the Universe to the other curves simply because the Space it travels through is curved.

The Dynamics of Splitting

The basic dynamics of splitting are very simple, but the actual process is very subtle and complex. The action of Linear Impetus pulled Everythingness and Nothingness around, until they both curved back in upon themselves. The original Condition of Separation was a straight line, which then became a curved line. You can see this dynamic portrayed in the oldest symbol of human wisdom: the sign of the Dao.

This shows the effect of the Path of Splitness. It shows Everythingness and Nothingness trying to come back together after Impetus split them apart. The mark of the Dao signifies the Basic Dynamics of Duality in Nature called Ying and Yang. They also represent the Duality of Everythingness and Nothingness. They are the basic Conditions of Emptiness and Fullness which existed long before our 3-dimensional Universe was created.

Here is an even older representation of the Dynamic of Splitness. David Dawson went hiking through China and climbed the Taoist mountain of Mt Qiyun. He visited the temple and shrines on that Mountain. A Chinese Daoist Priest told him that this is what the original Yin-Yang symbol of the ancient concept of Duality looked like before the Daoist Duality of Everythingness and Nothingness became a mixed swirl with curved lines.

This photo shows a very important Aspect of the Path of Splitness: The Aspect of Imperfection. When Impetus first split Formlessness, She did not come back together perfectly. This Aspect of Imperfection explains why and how it took an Infinite number of times of Impetus splitting Formlessness to gradually evolve Her into different Conditions of Connectedness and Separateness. Every time Formlessness was split apart by Impetus and came back together again She was changed. This picture gives us a hint of how infinitely complex the formation and splitting of Formlessness into Infinite Everythingness and Infinite Nothingness actually was... Before they were completely split in two, they managed to reconnect back together again into a single Totality with layers of Everythingness and Nothingness within it... Before the Three Dimensions were created, Impetus split Formlessness in two halves that were mixed up imperfectly. Because of the imperfection of the whole process, there was neither 100% pure Everythingness nor 100% pure Nothingness. Before the 1st Dimension was even created, there was already some Nothingness mixed up with Everythingness, and some Everythingness mixed up with Nothingness. This picture shows how every time Formlessness came back together, She did so Imperfectly... with the two halves not matching up exactly. This Aspect of Imperfection is built into the causal Process of Splitness. Our Universe is not perfect because the very dynamics of its origin were imperfect to begin with.... The imperfection of the Causal Process of Splitness, or the Aspect of its Imperfection also explains why the phenomenon of Cause and Effect in our Universe is never perfect.

This photo is not a coincidence. These two images help to explain the Basic Dynamics of the Universe before the Big Bang happened. The wisdom of Lao Tse was correct. He just couldn't put it into a modern scientific context. He didn't have the benefit of all the facts and discoveries that modern Science has today. Now the knowledge of Lao-Tse and the discoveries of modern Science can finally be put together into the proper context which makes not only logical, but organic sense as well. Now the facts and logic of the Daoism of Lao Tse, and the facts and logic of modern Science: can be connected and understood as part of the same explanation. Lao Tse spoke of Nature as a natural process of logical organic dynamics, while the mechanistic explanations of Science explains the understanding the Universe as a natural process of logical mechanical dynamics. Once you connect these two models: you can see that they are actually describing the same thing. You can visually see the same dynamic of Organic Splitness in the designed shape of the human brain:

What Lao Tse saw as a Basic Duality of Nature was also a Basic Condition of his own brain. You can see the same condition of Splitness in one of the most concentrated forms of nutritional energy found in the plant kingdom: nuts.

Notice; the split inside a walnut is oriented 90 degrees to the split of its outer shell: the intense pressure needed to split the shell apart at its seams automatically creates a split inside the nut that is oriented 90 degrees to the linear seam of the shell: this is a recreation of the 90 degree split which created the 3rd-dimension. You can see the same split which created our Universe in organic seeds, plants, insects, reptiles, shellfish, fish, birds, mammals and brains. This basic design of Splitness is older than Nature itself, it comes from the original Dynamic of Splitness which created our Universe.

The origin of this Dynamic of Splitness is not a human idea: it did not come from the human brain. This dynamic is much older than the human brain. It is much older than the Universe. This is the Primary Pre-Historic Dynamic which created the Universe. It pried the Totality of Actual Infinity apart, and then it married the two halves back together again 3 times, creating the 3 dimensions: each time in a new way... creatively. The dynamic of Splitness is also the Condition of Sex and Reproduction. You can see this Dynamic happening in living cells as they split. You can see this in a penis splitting a vaginal slit. You can see this Dynamic of Splitness in the splitting of an atom. You can also see it in the slit of a coffee bean. You can see it everywhere in Nature. The Impetus of Splitness goes in both a straight line, and around. You can see this Dynamic of Splitness in the energy of a tree:

You can see the Path of Splitness in a coffee bean. After intense heat it splits in half... then a 2nd slit appears 90 degrees to the 1st split and it splits again.

You can see it in the energy field of a magnet...

You can see it in the energy of the earth's magnetic field:

You can see this in the energy of how wind blows clouds around. The wind blowing in your face goes in a straight line, but eventually it goes around also. You can see this in wind patterns, You can this in the coriolis effect, you can see it ocean currents like the Gulf Stream, which goes for long distances in a straight line, and then goes around.

You can see it
In the energy of hurricanes and typhoons

You can see it in the energy of the jet stream of the upper atmosphere. It is going in a straight line; but it also goes around the earth.

Even stars going in a straight line for millions of miles, still go around the centers of galaxies

As you can see, Impetus moves all the Energy of the Universe in both ways: in a straight line and around. Impetus does not go only in a straight line; it also curves. Look at NFL kickers: their approach to the ball is a curve. Watch their foot curving before it hits the football and sends it out in a straight line. A baseball bat curves before it hits the baseball. The ball first goes in a straight line and then it begins curving. This happens everywhere in the Universe whether there is any gravitational pull or not. Regardless of size, from atoms to galaxies... this is how all Energy in our Universe behaves.

By using the theoretical abstract straight line of ancient Greek geometry and abstract mathematics, which does not exist in the actual Universe; Science has misperceived, misinterpreted and misunderstood the basic nature of how the Impetus of Energy works in our Universe. Science does not study energy organically; it studies it mechanically. This is a basic weakness in all scientific theories, models, knowledge and exploration. It was also Einstein's basic mistake.

The Organic Nature of Splitness

The Path of Splitness can also be understood as the Dynamic of a growing tree. Every Condition split off into two more Conditions. The trunk of the tree is the 3 Conditions of:

Causality

Actual Infinity

Separation-Connection

Which became the 1st Dimension: the trunk of Length

Which split off into two branches: Everythingness and Nothingness, and then Width, which split off into 2 more branches: Dualistic Everythingness and Dualistic Nothingness. Which split off into two more branches, with three branches coming out from each of the two branches. Like a tree. If you can understand how a tree grows, you can understand the Basic Dynamics of how the Path of Splitness created our Universe.

As you can see, the Dynamics are both Organic and Mechanical in nature and they are all balanced. At every split, every new Condition of Splitness retains within it all the former Conditions which it split out of. No Conditions are lost. Literally all of the Conditions which it had before it became 3-dimensional have been retained. Our 3-dimensional Universe has all the linear characteristics of the 1st and 2nd dimensional Universe: connection-separation, attraction-repulsion, expansion-contraction.

Presumably once Space becomes Infinitely Empty, or large... and as the mirror side of the other Universe's Space expands also; then both together will become a single Totality of Infinitely large Empty Space, that is, a spherical curve of 360 degrees, rather than an unfinished, flattened curve of less than 180 degrees on our side. But this can only happen after Energy becomes infinitely small. However: once Space finishes becoming Infinitely Empty, or Infinitely Large: its Infinite Largeness by definition, cannot have anything larger outside of it... which destroys the entire concept of it being spherical in nature. This contradicts all scientific understanding of the Universe and raises a host of paradoxes, which will be explained more fully in later books in this series. I will explain them here only in this way. Conditions that are Actually infinite do have finite cycles that come to a finite end... but only within the Infinite Conditions themselves, only as a fleeting permutation of Actually Infinite Conditions, only in the Present as an aspect of the Dynamic of Splitness.

Energy, Space, and Time

In order for Energy to exist: it must be able to move through Space.

In order for it to move through Space: there must be Time for it to move.

In order for Time to exist: there must be Space and Energy.

These three basic Conditions of the Universe cannot exist without each other.

Without Space and Energy: Time cannot exist.

Without Energy and Time: Space cannot exist,

Without Time and Space: Energy cannot exist.

Without Time: Energy and Space cannot exist.

Without Energy: Space and Time cannot exist.

Without Space: Energy and Time cannot exist.

Each Basic Condition of our Infinite Universe cannot exist without the other two Conditions existing also. Our Universe came into being as a Causal Process: containing all the Conditions of the previous Conditions of Splitness. Our Universe came into being as a Totality of Actual Infinity that was Causal. Our Universe came into being in a Condition of Connection, and Separation.

Our Universe came into being as a Condition of Connection-Separation. Our Universe came into being from a Dualistic, 2-dimensional Condition. Our Universe came into being as a Dualistic, 2-dimensional Condition. Our Universe came into being: as a compressed form of Everythingness: balanced by a compressed form of Nothingness which was needed in order for Everythingness to exist at all. Our Trialistic Universe came into being based upon pre-existing Dualistic Conditions which had to exist before it could exist. It came into being based upon the pre-existing Condition of Connections and Separations which had to exist before it could exist. It came into being based upon the pre-existing Conditions of Contraction and Expansion which had to exist before it could exist.

More importantly, it came into existence as a series of Balanced Acts of Splitness. It came into being based upon the Law of Dynamic Equality, or the Condition of Dynamic Balance. The entire process of the creation of the Universe comes from, and is a result of the organic evolution of The Path of Splitness. Before the 3-dimensional Universe could come into existence something had to get in-between the Condition of Infinite Duality and create another connected-separated Split in-between the two Conditions of Length and Width. Before the 3-dimensional Universe came into existence: there were two infinite sets of polarized Dualities: Attraction and Repulsion in a two-dimensional Condition of Actual Infinity. These two-dimensional Dualities created the dynamic Conditions of Expansion and Contraction were Conditions of Length and Width in the 2-dimensional Universe. It was only with the addition of a Third Element, an in-between Condition; that the 3-dimensional Universe came finally came into being; and gained its Trialistic, or three-dimensional nature of Depth.

That Third Element was Time.

What happened is very cumbersome to describe in words, but is actually very simple. Following the Path of Splitness, Impetus split the Condition of Infinite Totality of Formlessness and created the 1-Dimensional Universe: then it split Formlessness again and created the 2-Dimensional Universe: then it split it again and created the 3-Dimensional Universe. The Third Major

Split created a new Trialistic Condition. Creating three new thirds, or Trialities which we call Time, Space and Energy: created out of the Duality of Infinite Everythingness, and Infinite Nothingness. What we call Time, Space and Energy are merely Trialistic fractions of the previous former basic Conditions of Totality and Duality. The first split changed the Dualism of Everythingness and Nothingness into a 1-dimensional Condition. The second split created 2-dimensional rings of Attraction and Repulsion, or Expansion and Contraction. The third major split created the Triality of Energy, Space and Time

We see the ongoing process of splitting as a passage of Time. Time is not passing. It is splitting. Time is just a 3-dimensional form of Splitness. The reason we perceive the changes of these splits from three perspectives, Past Present and Future is because our awareness exists in-between the act of splitting.

Scientists have discovered that the curvature of Space in our Universe is so small, that the curvature of the entire Universe is barely noticeable. The reason for this comes from how Space was formed, and where it came from. In the transition from two-dimensional flatness into a three-dimensional expansion of our Universe: the only curves scientists can perceive are the transitional curves between the two basic Conditions of infinite Length, Width..., and the 3rd Condition: Depth.

Our Universe emerged from only one side of a two-dimensional Condition of Infinite Duality into a three-dimensional Condition of Infinite Triality: it cannot have more than a 180 degree curve. Our Universe is only one-half of the balanced Split. Furthermore, this curve can never get to the ends of the Universe because the original flattened Condition of Infinite Duality from which it came from was already Infinite to begin with. Its 2-dimensional flatness of Length and Width had no end to it. The Universe was already endless before it was formed 3-dimensionally because it emerged from a 2-dimensional Condition of Endlessness. You cannot curve 360 degrees around an infinitely wide-long, two-dimensional field that has no end to it. If the three-dimensional Condition of Infinite Energy of our Universe had emerged as a Singularity from a state of Actual Infinity that was not already 2-dimensional in nature then the three-dimensional Space of the Universe would possess no curvature at all. This did not happen.

If Energy had emerged as a Singularity from a flattened Condition of a two-dimensional state that was finite, then the three dimensional Space of our Universe should have radiated out and curved 180 degrees. This did not happen either. Neither of these things happened because the Third Split emerged out of a two-dimensional Condition of Actual Infinity which was essentially two-dimensionally flat. Energy emerged from both sides of this two-dimensional flatness as a Balanced Split. Furthermore... it was not a Singularity, it was a balanced split. The Big Bang was a Dual Bang: not a single one. Our Universe exists on only one side of this Emergence, as one-half of this Duality. Another Universe emerged from the other side; it had to, there was no other way any of this could have happened in order for the emergence of our Universe to balance dynamically. There had to be another Universe emerging on the other side, there is no other way it could have happened.

The curvature of Space in our Universe does even approach 180 degrees. If you add the Universe on the other side to the Emergence of this Third Split; even then you would still not be able to do more than approach a curvature of 360 degrees of 3-dimensional Space. And you could only approach it if you approached it from both sides... and even then you will never get around it because the two approaching curves never meet, simply because the 2-dimensional Universe between them still exists between them in a Condition that is Actually Infinite in Length and Width.

The 3-dimensional Space of our Universe curved out from a 2-dimensional Universe. The curvature of the 3-dimensional Space on our side is so slight because it came out of 2-dimensional Universe whose Dimensions of Length and Width are Actually Infinite. Our 3-dimensional Universe came from that 2-dimensional Universe. That two-dimensional Universe still exists in between our 3-dimesnional Universe and the other 3-dimensional Universe. The two Universes emerged from both sides of the 2-dimensional Universe at the same time. Because of the 2-dimensional Universe existing between them: both 3-dimensional Universes can never curve a complete 180 degrees around it to make a complete 3-dimensional spherical Totality. Because both are trying to curve around a flat 2-dimensional Condition of the former 2-dimensional Universe that is Infinite in Length and Width. The curving ends of our Universe are trying to reach a 2-dimensional plane which is Actually Infinite in Length and Width... but never quite getting there. The curvature of our 3-dimensional Space proves that the Condition of the 2-dimensional Universe did not disappear after Everythingness emerged from it on both sides to create two 3-dimensional Universes.

Put both Universes together and you get an unfinished shape: the shape of two unfinished emerging 3-dimensional halves: attempting to reach the ends of an infinitely long-wide Length and Width of the Planar Field from which it originally emerged... but never quite getting there because the planar 2-dimensional field they emerged from is Infinite. This explains why the so-called explosion of the Big Bang did not produce a perfectly round effect. The type of curve that Scientific measurements show exists, the curve that the Space in our Universe has... can only exist if our Universe emerged as a balanced split of two 3-dimensional Universes emerging from a 2-dimensional Universe that is Actually Infinite. It emerged organically, naturally. You can see how the Big Bang happened in one of the fastest growing organisms on earth: mushrooms.

You can even see the linear 2-dimensional lines which created our 3-dimensional Universe. Our Universe did not emerge by magic. It emerged out of organic dynamic Conditions. It emerged because certain pre-existing Conditions caused it to emerge organically. Two 3-dimensional Universes that are Actually Infinite, emerging simultaneously from two sides of a Two-dimensional Universe explains how and why our Universe emerged very simply. The organic Impetus that makes a mushroom explode organically into growth from a tiny, microscopic spore is basically the same organic Impetus that made the Big Bang explode out from a tiny, microscopic Singularity.

The point is; every single tiny seed which produces round 3-dimensional fruit is an organic recreation of the big-bang of the Universe. Every flower is an organic recreation of the big bang. Every apple, every orange, every fruit, every tree that grows from a tiny seed is a recreation of the organic development of the 1st half of the Universe's existence. But not the 2nd half. The 2nd half of the Universe's return hasn't been completed yet: this is why all fruits after they expand out, instead of going back in again, they lose their organic structure and dissolve into an amorphous mass of decomposing matter... only to repeat the entire incomplete process all over again.

The apparent flatness of our Universe and the curvature of its Space which Science has discovered is because the Universe expanded out from a two-dimensional flatness that is Actually Infinite in nature and size, and came back in.... Because the Universe came out of only one half of the explosion, this split the 2-dimensional Universe and created two 3-dimensional Universes. Every time the center of the 2-dimensional Universe constricts, it flashes a signal, a 1-2-3 punch of Dimensions. Every time this happens, the 3 dimensions change. Every time this happens, the positions and directions of the Energy in our Universe change in three ways: Length, Width and Depth. This is how the heartbeat of the center of the 2nd dimensional Universe controls the rate of Time splitting in our 3rd-dimensional Universe. This change is what we call Time.

The Third Balanced Split: created the in-between element of Time.
The in-between factor of this split was Time.

The Third Balanced Split is Time.
Time and the Third Balanced Split are the same thing.

It created a Condition of Actual Infinity of three Conditions which I call a Triality. This Triality was based upon Conditions of Infinite Sets of Duality: Some examples of these infinite sets of Dualisms in our 3-dimensional Universe are: long-short, large-small, past-present, dark-light, empty-full, hot-cold, up-down, attraction-repulsion, weak-strong, fast-slow, far-near, forward-back, degeneration, re-composition, life-death, male-female, in-out, positive polarity-negative polarity.

The most obvious of matching, or Balancing Dualisms in our Universe is its Duality of Size. When the Universe emerged it created infinitely small particles of Energy by expanding that Energy out into an infinitely large volume of Space. It did both at the same time. The Conditions of Infinite Smallness and Infinite Largeness were created simultaneously at the same time. Energy became infinitely small... while Space became infinitely large. The Path of Splitness could not create Energy that is both infinitely large and infinitely small at the same time. It could not create Space that is infinitely large and finitely small at the same time. The other half of this causal process will happen when Energy becomes infinitely large and Space becomes infinitely small. Only after the entire process that formed the Universe reverses itself and our Universe returns back to its original 2-dimensional Condition... and goes back to where it came from... only then will the dynamic process of the Big Bang be finally Dynamically Balanced.

When the Universe became 3-dimensional the Conditions of Infinite Smallness and Infinite Largeness were created at the same time... There was no other way they could have been created. They had to balance each other. Both aspects inter-acted with each other, and continued to do so, producing the entire range of inter-actions in-between them that went on to create the Universe we see today. Infinitely Large Space and Infinitely Small Energy particles were created at the same time because the Condition of Infinite Largeness of the Universe had to be dynamically balanced by a Condition of Infinite Smallness. It had to happen this way. There was no other way the Universe could have emerged and remain Dynamically Balanced.

The Dynamic Balance of the process of the emergence of the Universe automatically balanced the aspects of its size. The Condition of Time gave the two-dimensional Condition of Connectiveness its causal-active nature: it turned it into a 3-dimensional Causal Condition called Energy. The Condition of Time also gave the two-dimensional Condition of Separation we know as Space its relative-spatial nature of Depth. The Third Major Split called Time: transformed the two-dimensional Polarity, or two-dimensional Dualities of three-dimensional Energy and three-dimensional Space into motion. The Third Major Split of Time transformed two-dimensional Connection into three-dimensional Energy. The Third Major Split of Time transformed two-dimensional Separation into three-dimensional Space. The Third Major Split created the in-between Condition of Time called movement. The 3rd Split was created by the in-between element of Time.

The 3rd Split created Time.
The 3rd Split was Time.
The 3rd Split is Time.

Time and the 3rd Major Split of Actual Infinity are the same thing. Time exists as a Causal Totality. All of its splits are Causal in Nature; linked together in a progression of connected fractions which are separated from each other. Even though they are all connected and all the same thing, Time exists as 3 Basic kinds of Conditions in our Universe. As a Causally connected Totality that is Actually Infinite. As a Causally connected Duality of Past and Future that is Actually Infinite. And as a Causal Triality of Past-Present-Future that is Actually Infinite. Time exists as a Trialistic, three-dimensional Causal Process of Splitness.

There is a misconception that Time is the fourth dimension. This is not so. There is no fourth dimension. The fourth dimension does not exist. There are only three Dimensions. Time is the Third Dimension. However, if you include the first major split of Nothingness and Everythingness to the three major splits which created the three Dimensions; then the 3rd split becomes the 4th, and the Dimension of Depth becomes the 4th dimension. The only thing is that the first major split was not completely linear in nature, so it cannot be included as a dimensional split.

Dimensions are Linear Conditions which are oriented at an angle of 90 degrees to each other. The first linear Condition of Infinite Dimension was not a point, or a position: it was the Condition of Length. It is an Infinite Linear Condition of Connection-Separation which was created when the Dynamic of Linear Splitness split the entire Totality of Actual Infinity. Infinite Conditions of Connection and Separation created the First Infinite Dimension of Length just one-way. When the Totality of Actual Infinity was first separated and connected; it was separated and connected linearly in just one direction. It did not explode apart.

The Original Condition of Totality did not have any linear dimensions before it was separated and connected. It did not have any dimensions at all. It was the 1st sequence of Splitting which created the first Linear Dimension... or rather, what was splitting it linearly gave it its Linear One-Dimensional Condition. Basically, when the Causal Totality of Actual Infinity was first split, it gained an Infinite linear Condition of Dimension called Length. The only Dimension it had was Length. It was a 1-Dimensional Universe. The 1-dimensional Universe could also be said to have a Condition of a 'point' or a 'position' without any other Dimension whatsoever. But only if you look at it from one perspective: the perspective of its 1-dimensional direction of movement, like looking into a gun barrel. This makes sense since there were no other dimensions or perspectives you could use to look at it from, simply because the dimensions and perspectives of Width and Depth had not yet been created. The perspective of Length, the first Dimension of Length is also the famous mathematical concept of the 1-dimensional point. They are the same thing. The 1st Dimension of Length is also a point: they are the same thing. All you need to do is look along the length of a pencil and you will see a point. All you need to do is look at any length from the proper 1-dimensional perspective and you will see that this is true. Look at a length of wire from the perspective of its 1-dimensional direction, and all you will see is a point. The 2nd linear split hit the 1st Infinite dimensional Universe linearly at 90 degrees to the 1st Dimension of Length: and changed the 1-dimensional Universe from a Condition of Infinite Length: into two Conditions of Infinite Length, and Infinite Width.

The 3rd Dimension split the 2-dimensional Universe at 90 degrees to the first 2 Dimensions, and split it into Infinite Length, Infinite Width and Infinite Depth. The Condition of the three Infinite Dimensions is mono-linear. They are all made up of single lines which only move in one direction at a time. The three Infinite Dimensions of our Universe are made up of these three Conditions which are all oriented 90 degrees to each other. When the first split of Time happened, it split  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the 3rd Infinite Dimension of the Universe going out... leaving  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the 3rd Infinite Dimension coming back in; unsplit. Instead of Time Splitting the entire Totality of the Infinite 3rd Dimension, it only split  $\frac{1}{2}$  of it. The 1st half of this splitting was going out. The 2nd half of this splitting is now coming back in.

The 1st Major Split of Infinite Time happened like this: it split into two halves.

On one side was the singularity of our Universe expanding outwards... Since it created two Universes at the same time, each did not go out all the way. They only went  $\frac{1}{2}$  the way out on each side. Each one did not go all the way out because each 3-dimensional Universe was only  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the actual split of  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time. But... put them together, and they did go all the way out. Two halves make a whole. This explains the entire dynamic behind the 'big bang'.

Then they turned around and began to come back in... like this:

This is the reason why the Energy in our Universe went only half the way out. This is the reason why the Energy in our Universe is now trying to come back in again. This is the hidden Dynamic behind why our Universe exploded out in one direction and came back in again. These dynamics happened because they were all Dynamically Balanced in a strict Causal Sequence. The splits were Causal: they happened in a specific sequence. They could not balance each other and cancel each other out simultaneously. They had to balance each other in a Causal succession of first going out, and then coming back in. When you look at it this way: suddenly what is inexplicable: becomes easily understandable. Try asking any scientist why the Energy of the Universe exploded out and is coming in now, and they will tell you that it is a silly question because as far as they are concerned, that question is impossible to answer. Well it is not impossible to answer. I have answered it. And so can anyone else if they just use simple logic and plain common sense. All three Dimensions are linear: they have a single Linear Direction. One half of a balanced Linear Dimension that is Causal in our Universe is:

The other half of the Causal Linear Dimension is:

Why? Because one of the Basic Conditions of our Universe is the balanced Duality of In, and Out. Everything in our Universe has an inside to it, and an outside to it. Everything in our Universe that goes in, also goes out. The next Split of Infinite Time was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the explosion that was our Universe coming back in instead of going out... And the next split after that was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the remaining unsplit half and so on add-infinitum. Coming back in instead of going out. Each split of Time is exponentially smaller than the previous one by  $\frac{1}{2}$ . Because the remaining 3rd Infinite Dimension was fractionally split into two directions: In and Out. Our Universe did not expand out into a full globe of Infinite Space when it first split out. It only split  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the way out because that was only half of the entire split. Then it began to split the remaining  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the 3rd Dimension we call Depth coming back in.

Isn't the 1st half of Out supposed to be balanced by the 2nd half of In? Why didn't our Universe just come back in just as fast as it went out? The reason for that is tragically simple. If our Universe had expanded out as an organic whole, without exploding into fragments of infinitely small Energy particles, and destroying its entire organic structure as a whole: it would have come all the way back In just as easily and quickly as it went Out. But it didn't expand organically Out: it exploded destructively, it destroyed its own organic 2-dimensional structure. Now it is blindly trying to re-organize itself back into cellular structures which will allow it to go all the way back in again... The result is all the Energy of the Universe is coming in, while Space is being squeezed out from in-between the Energy coming back in. Because Infinite Time splits the 3rd Dimension fractionally into exponentially smaller halves; after Time started splitting, its remaining unsplit half almost instantly became infinitely small in relation to its first split of one-half. The relative difference between an infinitely small remaining fraction of 3-dimensional Space that is unsplit... splitting into even infinitely smaller fractions of 3 dimensions so minute, so tiny, that it can only be noticed by comparing how much energy vibrated billions of years ago; to how much energy vibrates now. Entropy is what Science has noticed as a very gradual tendency of Energy slowing down. The vibration of all Energy in the Universe is getting slower, and thus shorter. This is not actually true. Energy is not actually slowing down. Time or the 3rd Dimension of Depth is just getting shorter... As Time passes there is less of the 3rd Dimension of depth to vibrate in, or more accurately... through.

The Dynamics of Splitting

After the Three Major Splits happened, the splitting did not stop. Once Energy emerged as a split Totality, which Science mistakenly calls a Singularity, it kept on splitting into Infinitely small Energy particles. Once a space emerged from in-between the split Singularity the Singularity of Energy became a Duality of 2 Energies. Actually, it was a Triality of 2 energies and 1 space. Once the two split energies into four: two more spaces emerged... space kept on emerging from in-between the splitting energy particles. That's why they're called particles: they kept parting from each other, going 'ick!... ick!... ic!...' as there was less and less and less of the parting particles to part from each other.

Once Time emerged from in-between Energy, creating Space: it split Infinitely Out. Time was the buffer between Space and Energy which enabled them to split. Remember, Time is the Dimension of Depth. Time was the 3rd factor of Depth that made 3-dimensional Splitness possible. Once Time began splitting, then everything else began splitting 3-dimensionally also: the Universe became an ongoing process of Trialistic Splitness.

It became an ongoing process of Dynamically Balanced Splitness. It already had been a process of Dynamically Balanced Splitness. It had been a process of Dynamically Balanced Splitness long before the Path of Splitness created our Universe. It was just a continuation of the same dynamic. Energy, Space, and Time split, at almost at the same time. All three began a process of Dynamically Balanced Splitting, Creating Connected Separations as they split. One can understand Energy splitting, even Space. But Time? Time is the 3-dimensional act of splitting. From our vantage point of the in-between Present, it is the in-betweenness of the act itself which we perceive: we call it 3-dimensional motion. Time keeps forever splitting the 3rd Dimension of Depth into the Past, while the Future 3rd Dimension remains unsplit. This is why we cannot know what will happen in the Future, but we can know what happened in the Past. This is why the Future is unpredictable and why the Past is unchangeable. This is why the Future has not happened yet and the Past has already happened. The Future is merely the remaining unsplit fraction of the 3rd dimension. It is the remaining unsplit fraction of Infinite Time. The Present is merely the connective link of Splitness in-between the split Past and the unsplit Future. The Present is merely a moving point of Splitness in-between the ongoing Splitting of Time.

The Universe is composed of Three Dimensions in which the three aspects of these Dimensions: Energy, Space and Time work. Once you can understand this it becomes simple. The three Dimensions are not Energy, Space and Time. The Three Dimensions are Linear Conditions of the Universe. They are the Basic underlying, invisible, transparent, intangible Conditions of the Universe. Energy, Space, and Time is merely the result of their Splitting into 3 dimensions. They are Basic Conditions of Splitness. Energy is a Condition of the 1st Dimension splitting. Space is a Condition of the 2nd Dimension splitting, and Time is a Condition of the 3rd Dimension splitting.

In that first instant when our Universe began to emerge...:
Infinite Energy began to split Infinitely.
Infinite Space began to split Infinitely.
And Infinite Time began to split Infinitely.

All as a Dynamic of Balanced Splitness. Meaning that it was not just a creation of Connections but of Separations also. Upon the emergence of Energy, Space and Time: nothing could be instantaneous, nothing could come instantly into existence. Because the Condition of Causality already existed. Everything had to happen in a Causal order. That Causal Order was a simple series of one-two-three. What happened? Three things happened.

The first instant of Energy was Infinite.
The first instant of Space was Infinite.
The first instant of Time was also Infinite.

All three began splitting at almost the same time, but not quite. The Causal sequence in which the 1-dimensional Universe was created determined the Causal order in which the 2-dimensional Universe was created. The Causal order in which the 2-dimensional Universe was created determined the Causal order in which the 3-dimensional Universe was created.

Energy comes first: it is a form of the original Totality of Actual Infinity; it is a form of 1-dimensional Totality. Energy is a form of 2-dimensional Connectiveness. Space comes second: it is a form of Separation that was created by the Dynamic of Splitness splitting the original Totality of Actual Infinity into 1 Dimension. Space is a form of 2-dimensional Width.

Time comes third. It was new: it came last.

The two-dimensional Condition of Length called Energy emerged on both sides of Infinite Duality first. The two-dimensional Condition of Width called Space emerged on both sides of Infinite Duality second. The three-dimensional Condition of Depth emerged third. It became the three-dimensional Condition of Time. Our Universe emerged out of only one side of this split. Another Universe emerged on the other side to balance it. This is the only way the Big Bang could have happened. There is no other way our Universe could have emerged. In order to balance: they emerged on both sides of a flat, two-dimensional Infinite Universe. This near-simultaneous Split came out of its original two-dimensional state or Condition of Actual Infinity, as an Infinite Duality. Space and Energy are only the original Dualities of two-dimensional Connectiveness and two-dimensional Separation extended into a Trialistic Condition, or State.

How could Space emerge second and Depth third? The Space that emerged was 2-dimensional, not 3-dimensional: it needed the added 3rd dimension of Time to turn it into a 3-dimensional space which had Depth to it. There is no other possible causal sequence in which the Universe could have emerged. Energy came first. Space came second. Time, or the 3rd Dimension: came third. It was Time, the last and 3rd split of Depth which made our Universe emerge as a big bang.

On our side of the flattened 2-dimensional Condition of Infinite Duality: one-half of Infinite Energy emerged, creating one-quarter of Infinite Space between it. The same thing happened on the other side of the original flattened Condition of the 2-dimensional Universe. What Science calls a Singularity emerged out of a Dualistic Split: not a 'singularity'. Explosions do not happen by themselves. It is ridiculous to assume that any explosion can come out of nowhere for no reason at all. That is like expecting to have a dynamite explosion without any dynamite. There has to be something to make it explode. Also, there have to be very good reasons for it to explode.

The energy in both halves of this balanced 3-dimensional Split was traveling away from each other at an infinitely fast speed. The other Universe is on the other side of the 2-dimensional Universe. Science does not even realize that a 2-dimensional Universe even exists between the two 3-dimensional Universes. Science cannot see the other side emerging from this Singularity or measure it. How all this happened was determined by the Causal Order of Splitting itself. Separation cannot exist before there is something to separate. Actual Infinity had to exist as a Totality before it could even begin to Split.

There are no exceptions to this causal sequence of Splitness. :

Connection always happens first.
Separation always happens second.
Motion always happens third

You can see the Causal sequence of this Dynamic in the growth of a tree. The trunk of a tree is linear: it is a single unsplit Totality. Then a split occurs. Only after the split happens can the tree grow apart from itself. The Causal Sequence of this Dynamic of Splitness is universally true everywhere in the Universe. There are no exceptions to it. The Causal order of the Universe is the same everywhere, and happens in the same causal sequence of 1-2-3. Contact-Reaction-Movement. Energy was created before Space because Energy is a three-dimensional form of Connectiveness, or Totality. Space was created after Energy because Space is a three-dimensional form of Separation, or Duality. Only after Energy emerged out of what Science calls a 'Singularity' which was actually a Dual Split of two dynamically balanced Totalities, did 3-dimensional Spaces start to be created in-between this unseparated Singularity or Totality of Energy on our side. This is the reason why in our half of this Balanced Split: our Universe first came into existence as a 'Singularity' of Pure, Unsplit Infinite Energy just before a Space was created in-between the two Singularities of the two emerging 3-dimensional Universes emerging out of the 2-dimensional Universe.

If Space had come into existence before Energy then there would have been no Singularity, no Unsplit Totality of Connectiveness. Instead, there would have been an Infinitely Large Space coming into existence first; into which, Infinite Energy would have then split. This did not happen. The Third Split of Actual Infinity created the new Condition of Time, which transformed these two emerging Dualities of Energy into a Trialistic 3-dimensional Condition. One-half of that Split happened on our side, creating the Infinite 3-dimensionality of our Universe. In essence: Time is merely the ongoing evolution of the Splitness of Everythingness and Nothingness. Once Time was created, then things could split three-dimensionally depth-wise. Before that, things could only split 2-dimensionally, and before that: only onedimensionally. The 2nd and 1st dimensional splits were Causal in Nature. But there was no Time. Time only began with the 3rd Major Split of Actual Infinity. The Causal process of Time splitting: enables Space and Energy to undergo an infinitely complex series of dynamically connected-separated-balanced splits in a three-dimensional Condition.

Time

Everything in the Universe which exists as Energy and Space: exists in all three Conditions of Time: Past, Present and Future. We cannot see the Past or the Future. Humans are incapable of perceiving the Totality of Actual Infinity. We perceive things only in the present moment, finitely: not Infinitely. We only perceive things in-between the Past and the Future... only in the Present, because the Present is in-between the Past and the Future. The only reason we see the Universe as being finite is because we are stuck in the Present. The Future exists as an unsplit fraction of the Condition of Infinite three-dimensional Space: as well as the already-split fraction of the Infinite Past. The human perception of finiteness is only due to our awareness being limited to the present moment. As far as we know, the only form of Energy which does not exist in all three states of Past-Present-Future is the animal-human awareness of Time in the Present Moment, not the energy itself: only our present awareness of it. Human awareness only exists in the Present. How can Space and Energy also exist in the Future when the Future has not happened yet? It exists in the Future as an unconnected or unsplit potential of what already exists.

Science has made Time into a constant. It is not a constant. This is a fundamental misconception and fallacy of Science. It just seems like that because one half of Infinity is still Infinite: One half of one half of Infinity is still infinite. It is the rate, or speed at which Time splits which is constant, not the actual amount of Time which has elapsed. Between every Split of Time a new 3rd Dimension of Depth is created. Between every consecutive split of Infinite Time  $\frac{1}{2}$  less of the Infinite 3rd Dimension is being created than the one before it. Time, and the Totality of the 3rd Dimension are the actually the same thing. They are a Dynamic of Splitness. You can call the Condition splitting. Three-dimensional Space and three-dimensional Energy could not exist if there was no three-dimensional Time or no Condition of Balanced Splitness. The creation of our entire Universe was and is a Causal Sequence of Balanced Splitness.

This also explains Heisenberg's uncertainty principle and why the position or the direction/speed of electrons can be ascertained, but never both at the same time... You either have motion or you have position; but you never have both at the same time. In the attempt to measure electrons at that microscopic a level of Time, Space and Energy, the separations and connections between position and direction/motion become noticeable. It's the nature of Time itself which is responsible for this seemingly mysterious phenomenon; not the electrons themselves. Cameras and motion pictures work by the same principles as Time does: 2-dimensional position is 90 degrees to 3-dimensional motion/depth... that's how Time and the Universe works. It's that simple. The light emanating out from the transparent film is recreating how the big bang created the 3rd dimension of Depth.

The Dynamic of Time

Time creates the 3rd Dimension of Depth. As Time keeps splitting: all the positions of all the elements within our 3-dimensional Universe have the opportunity to change their positions and directions. This changing of positions is the Passage of Time, or the Splitness of Time. This changing of position happens in-between the Splitting of Time. Time is the three-dimensional Condition of Depth of our Universe, as well as Width and Length... and is Actually Infinite in nature. Time and three-dimensionality are basically the same thing. From our viewpoint, in that first instant of Infinite Time: Infinite Energy emerged on our side as an Infinitely Small Totality, or a Singularity: balanced by another Singularity emerging from the other half of the Infinite two-dimensional Duality: which both of them emerged from.

The Dynamic of Infinite Time splitting is an exponential factor of the fractioning of halves. It is a Dynamic of Splitness. The First Split of Time was literally one-half of the Infinite Third Dimension of Depth. It was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Actual Infinity. It was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time. This is why the Energy in our Universe exploded Out only halfway in that 1st Split, and then after that one-half, it came back In. The other half exploded Out in the other Universe. Our Universe is only one half of a whole; it was never designed to go all the way out; it was only designed to go half of the way out. This is why our Universe is almost flat now. Now; all the Energy in it is coming back in, not going out...while Space is going out from in-between the Energy coming back In: giving a false impression that our Universe is expanding. Space is expanding. Not Energy. Energy is coming back In. Not only that: if you include the Universe on the other half of that split: then on our side... the 1st Split on our side was only one-quarter of the Infinite Third Dimension of Depth: not one-half.  $\frac{1}{4}$  being Out  $\rightarrow$  , and the other unfinished  $\frac{1}{4}$  being In.  $\leftarrow$

Once you understand the 3rd Dimension as a Condition of Depth and once you understand that the 3rd Dimension of Depth is split into two Conditions of In and Out; then you can understand how the Condition of Size was created. The first half of Infinite Time split the Condition of Infinite Depth Out Infinitely. The remaining splits of Time have been splitting the Condition of Depth In, Infinitely. The Condition of 3-dimensional Size in the Universe is an aspect of the Condition of Depth. The dynamic of the Universe splitting the Dimension of Depth Out created Infinite largeness. The dynamic of the Universe splitting the Dimension of Depth In created Infinite Smallness. In other words, the relative Condition of Smallness did not exist until the Universe finished going Out, and began coming back In. The Condition of Size is just a relative Condition of Infinite Depth. The Condition of Smallness and Largeness cannot exist without the Condition of Depth. The Condition of Size is a relative Condition of the 3rd Dimension. Depth, Size, Smallness, Largeness, are all aspects of the same dynamic of Splitness.

The next Split of the remaining unsplit half of Infinite Time on our side was one-quarter or half of one-half of the Third Dimension called Depth. That is only counting what happened on our side of the 3rd Split of Actual Infinity. And so on ad-infinitum; exponentially splitting into infinitesimally smaller fractions of Infinite Depth.

During the first moment of Infinite Time splitting, fully all of the entire process of the Splitting of all Energy into Infinitely small energy particles took place. One half of Infinite Time became the already split Past. The other half was the unsplit Future. The first half that did split, did so infinitely. This was the process of the Totality of Infinite Energy splitting into Infinite Smallness. Along with Infinite Space being created in-between the splitting up energy particles and splitting the Universe into Infinite Largeness three-dimensionally. This Dynamic of Splitness explains why more things went on during what Science calls the first instant of 'Singularity' than all the billions of years of splitting which came after it. At the half-point of Time's Infinite Splitness after the first Major Split was finished, the entire process of Connecting and Splitting flipped over and began running in reverse in order to dynamically balance itself. After the 1st half of the process was over the 2nd half of this process began. Instead of Connections creating Separations, Separations began creating Connections. The entire direction and dynamic of Splitness turned around and reversed itself. Instead of Energy expanding Out, Space began expanding Out. While Energy began coming In instead of going Out.

How could the entire process of Energy splitting into Infinite Smallness occur during the first Split of one half of Infinite Time? that's only one split. That was the Major split: not a minor one. The other minor splits happened inside it. One major split of what?... of Depth: the 3rd Dimension. It took ½ of Infinite Time to expand the Universe to ½ of its Infinite Depth going Out. It will take the remaining ½ of Infinite Time to contract the Universe the remaining ½ of its Infinite Depth coming back In. The 3-Dimensional Condition of Depth has two balanced Conditions to it: Out and In. Only ½ of any Depth is Out. The other ½ of that Depth is In. The major split of Infinite Depth expanding ½ of the way Out, during ½ of Infinite Time caused Energy to split into Infinitely small particles. What we perceive in our Trialistic Universe to be a single Split of Time is actually a combined Trialistic Split, or Three Splits in one. When the first Split of Time happened: it happened three ways; or one-dimensionally, two-dimensionally and three-dimensionally... Splitting the first dimension, (the Totality of Actual Infinity), splitting the second dimension, (the Infinite Duality of Everythingness), and splitting the third dimension, (the Infinite Triality of Energy-Space, and Time). It split three times: once, twice, and thrice... It Split infinitely... two times in one Trialistic Split. Two-in-one. Two inside one. One in-between Two.

And then the third way:... all three ways combined.

In every Trialistic split of Totality, Time splits Energy three different ways... Each single Trialistic Split of Infinite Time is not only three splits: it is also two Splits. It is also one split. It is all three-in-one. And each one is Infinite. The third Split... the extra one, which gives our Universe three Dimensional Depth is called Time. Time is only the extra third split of Depth added-on to the other two Conditions of Splitness: Length, and Width. Which existed in the Two-dimensional Universe long before there ever was a 3-dimensional Universe.

Science mistakenly believes the Big Bang explosion of our Universe happened in a tiny moment of Time even smaller than a nano-second of Energy-creation... and a slightly longer nano-second after that: when compressed Energy exploded out into Space. That assumption is relatively untrue. The reason this idea exists is because Science does not have a true understanding of what Time actually is. Science does not understand the Relativity of Time. Science does not understand how Time relates to Energy and Space. What Science calls the first 'nano-second' of the Universe's existence was actually 1/2 of Infinite Time. It was one-half of Actual Infinity. This is why from our perspective in the present, billions of years after the Universe emerged into the 3rd Dimension, it seems to have exploded out so fast... and become so infinitely big in such an apparently short time.

Our perception and understanding of the emergence of the Universe is relative; including our perception of Time. If you had actually been there while it was actually happening... it would have been happening as slow as molasses. It would have been so slow that you would barely have noticed anything moving at all. Why? Because you would not have been alive for one half of Infinite Time to see the whole process unfolding. You would have been alive only an infinitely small fraction of that 1/2 of Infinite Time. If you had actually been there, you would have said:

“Huh? What bang? I don't see any bang. Nothing's happening. This is boring. Wake me up when it's over... I'm going back to sleep.”

This is why I use the word emerge to describe how our Universe came into being; not the word explode. Our Universe emerged not as an explosive bang, but slowly... organically. Its emergence is perceived as an explosion only from our relative perception of Time in the present. Using time-lapse photography a mushroom can be made to seem to explode. Flowers can seem to explode if the actual rate of time is speeded up. In actual fact their growth is not an explosion. It is only an explosion if you speed up the perception of the relative speed at which it actually grows. This misperception of Time comes from the distortion of Science, shortening 1/2 of Infinite Time, down to a zillionth of a nano-second. This is why Science incorrectly perceives the emergence of our Universe as an explosion. Science's misperception of Time at the moment of what they call the 'Big Bang' is due to the fractional relativity of Infinite Time splitting

We humans have no way of sensing exactly what fraction of Infinite Time has Split during any perceivable moment of human time-awareness. Human awareness was never designed to perceive or measure the relative duration of each fractional Split of Infinite Time. Our awareness of Time only exists in the Present. Our awareness of Time exists mostly, as an awareness of the Present Moment. Our awareness of Time only exists in-between the Past and the Future. The Present Moment only exists in-between the Splitness of Time as it keeps on splitting. We are not able to compare different moments of Time to see if there is any relative difference between them because we are inside the splits: not outside of them.

Why did our Universe emerge in this way and no other? Because of the Dynamic of Balanced Splitness. Because Infinite Space emerged as a Duality that had a Basic Condition of Causality, it could not be Infinitely Small and Infinitely Large at the same time. Because Infinite Energy emerged as a Duality that was Causal, it could not exist as an infinite number of infinitely small particles and as one infinitely large particle simultaneously at the same time. Infinite Time also emerged as a Causal Duality. It could not exist as an infinitely long moment of Time and an infinitely short moment of Time simultaneously at the same time. Time has a uniform rate of splitting. We cannot tell the relative difference between any two moments, or Fractions of Time. We cannot tell if any Fraction of Time is longer or shorter than any other Fraction of Time because our awareness of Time only exists in-between the Splitness of Time.

The other half of this process of Splitness is still happening. Infinitely Small particles in an Infinitely Expanding Space are coming In closer together, to form larger masses of Energy, while going through Infinite Permutations of Possibility and Probability. While Space is going Out; squeezed out from in-between the Energy coming IN. After the first Split of Time, only one-half of the process was done. Now, the other half of the process is happening.

However, the other half of the process is not the same as the first half. It cannot be reversed in exactly the same order it happened. One might think that after  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time when Energy was split into infinite smallness, the next split of 1/4th of Infinite Time should reconnect pairs of Infinitely small energy particles together, and 1/8th of Infinite Time should re-connect pairs of the merged almost infinitely small energy particles, and so on... until Infinite Energy finally merges back into a Totality of a Singularity. Why is this not happening? Put it this way: take a house and smash it with a wrecking ball into ten million pieces. Are you going to put one million of the smallest pieces back together again first? Will it take you same exact amount of time to put together as it took to smash it apart?

No.

You are first going to find the largest pieces first. And put them back where they are generally supposed to be. Then you are going to find the next-largest pieces and put them back generally where they are supposed to be... The last thing you are going to do is find the smallest pieces and put them back where they once were. And it will take you a hell of a lot longer to put it back together than it took to smash it apart in the first place. Especially the smallest pieces.

This is what the Energy of the Universe has been doing ever since the 3rd Major Split of the Path of Splitness first smashed it apart in what Science calls a 'Big Bang'. It has been gathering itself together and organizing itself into dust clouds, stars, galaxies. It has been assembling huge galaxies made out of huge stars into huge cellular intergalactic cells made up of countless galaxies.

Ever since the Universe began to come back In, the Universe has been systematically organizing its Energy; and forming them into organic structures. It is collecting energy together, and organizing it organically...naturally, into spherical cellular structures on all levels of Size. It has not even begun to re-connect its infinitely smallest energy back together again properly. This is the last step which will happen: not the first.

Not only that: after the Universe exploded, or rather it emerged all the way out: it has been organizing the exploded pieces back into the only structure it knows... the structure of an exploded Universe... the structure of an exploded half-globe, pressed against another half-globe... with an empty interior, and a faint perimeter of energy particles: a living organic cell. This is why galaxies exist as faint, cellular films of energy on the outer perimeters of huge, empty inter-galactic space bubbles. Cellular space-bubbles are just small recreations of what the Universe was like just after it emerged, or exploded... depending upon which perspective you use to perceive the process.

After  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time had finished splitting, the Universe was an empty void with all of its Energy at the perimeter. Every form of Energy that exists in the Universe today is a blind re-construction of some aspect of the first  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the Universe's Basic Conditions. Novas are re-creations of an exploding Universe. Dwarf Stars and dead stars are re-creations of the first densely packed singularity. Radiation energy is a re-creation of energy exploding out from its first source. Gas and dust particles are re-creations of Energy when it stopped moving into stationary particles, starting to come together. Stars are re-creations of energy radiating out from a center. Galaxies are forms of Energy which re-creates many of the dynamics of the 2-dimensional Universe before our Universe emerged: in fact, they are as flat as pancakes. The reason galaxies are flat is because they are recreating Dynamics which once existed in the 2-dimensional Universe. Black Holes compressions in the center of flat galaxies are a re-creation of the compressed center of the 2-dimensional Universe coming in and being compressed into a black hole: a singularity, before exploding out into two, 3-dimensional Universes, through two orifices, that are oriented 90 degrees to the 2-dimensional flatness of the galaxy it inhabits.

The Totality of Infinite Energy is like a house. To be put back together exactly as it once was, every particle of energy that split has to be re-joined: to the exact same particle of energy it originally split from. The structural integrity of the Infinite Universe is much more exact than the structural integrity of a house. With a house: you can use new timbers, and new plaster to put it back together again. With the Universe, you can't. Why? Because there is no extra new Energy that can be used to patch up the Totality of Infinite Energy. All of it was smashed into Infinite Smallness, and Infinite largeness. Every Infinitely small particle of energy has to find its mate before it can re-connect back into the larger particle of energy that it once was a part-of. The process of the 2nd half of the Universe's evolution is merely a reversal of the 1st half of its Splitness. A reversal which is exacting, but not identical in sequential order.

Space

You can see how the dynamic of expanding 3-dimensional space works in bubble machines at amusement parks. The closer the bubbles are to the solid mouth which they are coming out of: the smaller they are. The farther away they get from any solid object the bigger they become. The farther away from stars that these Space bubbles are, the bigger they become. This dynamic of space as an exponential dynamic of expansion determines how far solid objects are away from each other in Space. This is the basic reason why stars and galaxies are so far away from each other. Science has discovered that the nature of Intergalactic Space is cellular in nature. What they do not understand yet is that Space is also cellular. Space bubbles pushed out from in-between energy particles expand naturally. The farther away they get from any energy, the larger they become. Until they become huge intergalactic bubbles of space. Most of the Universe is composed of these Space Bubbles. Science has never studied the true nature of Space because it assumes that there is nothing there to study. What Science does not realize is that Space is a Medium. Space is a Formless Medium which energy travels through. Just like water is a Medium which fish swim through.

Space is a 3-dimensional Condition of Formlessness

Science does not understand Space... Science does not understand that Space is a 3-dimensional Transparent Medium through which energy can travel. Just as water is also a Transparent Medium through which energy can travel. If Outer Space were not a Medium: then the energy of light and all forms of interstellar radiation would not be able to travel through it. If Space were not a Medium: all energy in the form of Radiation would not even be able to move through it. The Universe is mostly made up of Space. Compared to the vastness of Space, there is almost nothing else in the Universe. Just like there is almost nothing else in the vastness of the huge oceans except the formless medium of water. Just like in the atmosphere there is almost nothing else except the Formless Medium of air. Is a fish aware that it is traveling through the Medium of water as it travels? No. Are animals aware that they are traveling through the medium of Air as they travel? No. They take the Medium they travel through for granted; they don't think about it... just like Science has taken the Medium of Space for granted once it found that there was something beyond the air called Space which they could travel through. What happens when you take a fish out of the water? It dies because it is not designed to live in the Medium of Air... What happens when you take a human being out of the medium of air and put it into the Medium of Space? They die because are not designed to live in the Medium of Space. Just because humans cannot survive in the Medium of Space doesn't mean that Space is an absolute vacuum. It just means it is a Medium which we are not designed to live in, that's all. A fish taken out of water perceives the Medium of Air to be just as much of a vacuum with nothing there, as humans perceive the medium of Space to be a total vacuum with nothing there. As far as understanding the true nature of the Universe is concerned... it's all about subjective perceptions being relatively incorrect, that's all. As Einstein discovered; everything is relative to everything else. There are no absolutes in the Universe. Space is not an absolutely empty void.

The mid-point of this process after one half of Infinite Time split was a balance-point in the formation of our Universe. At this mid-point: there was no Mass or Impetus. Everything was reversed, and Mass and Impetus appeared again. What happened during the first major split of Time was that for every two particles of Energy being created by Splitness; only one space between them was created. There were twice as many splitting Energy particles being created than there were Spaces between those particles. Once this first half of the Causal Order of Splitness finished, then this entire process was reversed. The entire order of the process was reversed. In the second half of the process, as Energy particles came closer together; space was being pushed out from in-between them. For every two particles of Energy coming closer together: the space between them was split in two. Creating two spaces where there had only been one. This why the Space of the Universe is not contracting even though Energy is coming in.... Space is not getting smaller. It is actually expanding due to the space in-between energy particles splitting. This expansion of space creates the result of Astronomical bodies moving further away from each other. It is only Space being forced out from in-between energy particles... and adding to the space outside of the compact masses of energy coming together and pushing space out from in-between them. The One-half Split of Infinite Time on our side finished Splitting Energy particles into Infinite Smallness. Then during the next one-quarter Split of Time: Space had one-quarter of Infinite Time to let the Infinitely Small particles come closer together. During the second half of Infinite Time on our side: there was one-quarter, then one eighth, then one sixteenth of Infinite Depth splitting In... Until Infinitely small Energy particles began coming together into larger particles. Until Energy came together so closely, that solid matter called dust clouds were created. Until Stars were formed. Because of this dynamic of Energy coming together: the spaces between these huge collections of energy called galaxies became huge. Intergalactic Space was created.

The Universe is basically made up of the Formless Medium of Space. There is almost nothing else in the Universe except the vastness of Space, just as there is almost nothing else in the vastness of the world's oceans except water. Space is Formlessness; just as water is Formless. Just like fish would not be able to travel without the medium of water; Light would not be able to travel without the medium of Space. Energy in the form of radiation would not be able to even move without the Medium of Space. The Universe is mostly made up of the Formless Medium of Space.

The End of the Universe

The latest consensus of Science visualizes the end of the Universe as an infinitely large Space with a few giant combined forms of Energy, like huge, giant atoms, with a few huge powerful Black Holes. This description coincides almost exactly one part of what the culmination of the 2nd half of the process of Balanced Splitness will be. When Space becomes Infinitely Empty: Energy will finally recombine back into a single Totality... which will be eventually sucked into the last single Black Hole. A Black Hole so powerful that it will draw in all of Infinite Energy, Infinite Space and Infinite Time back into a Condition of 2 dimensions, then back into a Condition of Infinite Everythingness: where it will finally merge with Infinite Nothingness... and revert to a Condition of Actual Infinity that is unsplit; or an unsplit Totality of Actual Infinity.

The reason why the latest model of how Science sees the end of the Universe stops short of the logical conclusion of only one giant Infinitely large Black Hole swallowing up the last huge giant atoms of Energy. The reason Science stops short of all Energy merging into a single compressed mass and disappearing into the last Black hole is because Scientists try to measure the Infinite Universe by using finite numbers. Finite numbers can only approach Infinity. They can never quite get there. This is an obvious, abysmal blindness of Science. Loudly proclaiming that it has proven scientifically that the Universe is indeed Infinite... and then trying to measure this Infinity with finite numbers. Publicizing their finite measurements of our Infinite Universe... trying to show what the Infinite Universe will be like, after an almost Infinite amount of Time has passed... using finite numbers. Almost doesn't cut it. There is no such thing as an almost infinity. No matter how many zillions of numbers you use to predict what will happen in the end of the Universe, you cannot use finite numbers in your equations to accurately predict what will happen when Infinite Time has finished splitting. You can only approach Infinity with finite numbers. In fact, you can't even approach it: you can only ask to approach it. In fact, you can't even ask to approach it: you can only bow, and show the direction in which it is going.

However, the latest model of the Universe that Science has developed does prove that Time is actually Infinite, and the Universe is actually Infinite. Why? Because the end of the Universe predicted by Science by using finite numbers is not the actual end. It is merely a finite attempt to measure infinity. It is only a finite attempt to show the end of infinity. Science cannot show the actual end of the Infinite Universe because it cannot get there by using finite numbers. It cannot measure the Actual Infinity of the Universe using finite numbers unless the numbers they use are infinite. Finite mathematical numbers are not infinite. They cannot be infinite. They cannot measure infinity.

This entire explanation of the actual Universe in this book is based upon the assumption that not only Energy: but Time and Space as well operate by the same Dynamic of Balanced Splitting or Splitness. This single Dynamic explains everything. It explains everything that happened before our Universe emerged. It explains how our Universe emerged. It explains what has happened so far. It explains how it happened, and why it happened. It also explains what will happen, how it will happen and why it will happen.

Though our senses are not designed to perceive all of these various kinds of splitting: the inevitable conclusion that not only Energy... but also Time and Space, do in fact split, have split, and are still splitting... is corroborated by every verified fact that Science has been able to gather so far. Not by mathematics. Not by theories, not by models. By actual facts that have been verified. The strength of this explanation is its simplicity, and its logic: all three aspects of our Universe: Energy, Space and Time can be logically explained as being governed by only one Dynamic Principle: The Dynamically Balanced Path of Splitness. Because of the necessary balance of Duality: the two causal processes of Energy and Space balance each other. Energy split into infinitely small-split particles, and then began coming together into larger groups of infinitely small energy particles... to eventually merge together into a Single Totality. While Space emerged between the first Splitting Totality of Energy, and began splitting into ever-smaller segments... and will merge into one infinitely large Space. You could say that when the Universe began; relatively... Energy was Infinitely Large, and Space was Infinitely Small. And at the end of the Universe Energy will be Infinitely Small and Space will be Infinitely Large... That is: relatively. In relation to each other, and in relation to Time... as relative Conditions of Actual Infinity.

Each exponential split of Space separating is matched by an exponential connection of Energy coming closer together into larger structures. Since Energy has been coming together from the level-size of Infinite Smallness for only some billion years, it has a long way to go before it reaches its final merged Totality when Space reaches the end of its final Infinite Expansion. The principle of Splitness explains how the slowing-down of all coalescing Energy is dynamically balanced by the expansion, or speeding up of expanding Space.

Relativity

One key to understanding the Splitness of the Universe, and how and why it works is the fact that Time itself is Relative to both Energy and Space. Just as Energy and Space are relative to each other. If we existed during the first Split of Time and experienced how infinitely long that moment of Time was, and compared it to another split of Time 13 billion years later: only then could we gain a relative understanding of the relative difference between two different Splits of Time. If we could step outside the Splits of Time and compare the length of their relative duration side-by-side, and evaluate them, and gain a perspective, and digest it, and develop an integrated understanding of it... then we could develop a relative perspective of two Splits of Time. Time is not only Relative, it is Infinite. It is just as Infinite as Energy and Space. It is also just as relative as Energy and Space. Its relative relationship to Energy and Space is constantly changing just as the relative relationship of Energy to Space is also constantly changing; in the context of Actual Infinity.

Time is relative to Energy and Space. For instance: every form of Energy that exists today: radiation-dust-gas-liquid-solid: matches the relative physical Conditions of Energy at the time when these forms of energy were first created. The relative Condition of Energy is determined by the relative Condition of Time which existed when it was first created. Their Conditions match the Conditions of the Universe when they were first created. For instance, the reason Radiation travels at a much higher speed than other forms of energy is because when it was created, the fractions of Time-Depth splitting were relatively much longer-larger than they are now. The reason Radiation has almost no mass or momentum is because Radiation was created just after the mid-point, when the Impetus of Energy had turned around and was starting to come In instead of going Out. Energy had expended all of its Impetus going Out. When this happened: there was almost no Impetus in the Universe. The Impetus of Energy coming back In had not yet started gathering enough momentum to develop any appreciable momentum or inertia. Also, the energy particles had not coalesced enough to create any condensed mass of Energy. This makes the characteristics of momentum and mass seem to be almost the same thing, but they are not.

The Relative Condition that every kind of energy existed in when it was first created is not the same Relative Condition the Universe exists-in today. Relative Conditions of the Universe change with every split of Time. Once Energy was split into infinitely small particles it could not change its physical properties and characteristics of these infinitely split particles along with the changing Conditions of the Universe... simply because they could not split anymore. As a result, Energy only changed its characteristics and properties depending on its larger structures and density: not its intrinsic characteristics. The Conditions that the Universe existed in when these larger structures were first created are the intrinsic characteristics which these larger structures of Energy possess today.

Since Time splits the Depth of the entire Universe equally: all the original relative conditions of Energy change equally in relation to each other: but not to itself. Why? Because Energy had already been split to infinite smallness: the intrinsic nature of infinitely small Energy remains constant. Giving an illusion that the Relative Conditions of Energy are absolute. When actually they are Relative Constants, not absolute constants. These properties and characteristics of energy are relative constants. Just like the atomic number of protons, neutrons, and electrons of every Uranium atom are the same. When the Uranium atom was first created: that was how many protons, neutrons and electrons it originally had and still has.

Science mistakenly considers the speed of light to be one of the few absolute constants left. This is not true. The speed of light is a relative constant. Just like the speed of electrons are a relative constant. Just like the speed of quarks is a relative constant. There is nothing whatsoever special about the speed of light as opposed to the speed of anything else. Science has invented the constant of the speed of light as a holy Tabernacle, as some kind of sacred religious icon. The only reason that the speed of light is 'constant'... is because when it is traveling through intergalactic space it doesn't slow down because it doesn't hit anything. There is no friction in outer space to slow it down, that's all. Well guess what: the speed of every other form of energy in the Universe, as long as it doesn't hit anything, and as long as it moves through intergalactic space, and as long as there is no friction... is also constant. If it travels through the vacuum of intergalactic space, the speed of a baseball is also constant. The speed of an electron orbiting around an atom is also constant. That is, unless it is torn from its nice, safe, protective orbiting shell around a proton and is thrown out into another vacuum of space in another linear direction by another energy particle coming too close to it.

As long as it does not hit anything and is not affected by any other mass near it; the speed of every other orbiting body in the Universe is constant also because it is traveling through the medium of Space. The speed of light changes just like the speed of all other energy changes; only if and when it hits something, or is affected by energy close enough to slow it down or change its direction or affect it directly in some way... or if it hits another medium like water, or a transparent pane of glass, or a transparent film of plastic. Space is a Pure Formless Medium.

The only reason the speed of light is constant in outer space is that it is very good at avoiding other forms of energy as it travels through intergalactic space. It can do this because it has huge galactic distances it can use to bend through, and uses these huge distances and spaces to avoid hitting stars. Atoms have the same relative proportional space between them in sub-molecular space as stars do in inter-galactic space. And they avoid each other just as successfully. In fact, nearly all energy does this. Electrons have the same relative distance of inter-molecular space as light waves do in intergalactic space. Electrons avoid hitting atoms just as successfully as light waves avoid hitting stars. There is nothing special at all about the physical properties and characteristics of light waves. The only reason light waves are considered to be different from electrons is that we can see light waves with our naked eye, and we can't see electrons.

Science assumes that the speed of light is always the same. Actually it is only the relative Condition of light in outer space that is always the same. Actually it is only the relative Condition of the fractional rate of Time Splitting the Space between its photon-waves that is constant. Actually it is only because the Condition of Time splitting the 3-dimesional Depth of the Universe was longer when light was first created, that its speed is faster than other forms of energy. The photons inside these light-waves remain in the same original Relative Condition as when they were first created.

Science holds the speed of light to be a Universal Constant. Modern Science is based upon the use of Absolute Universal Constants which are measured finitely. This is a huge scientific fallacy. There are no Absolute Constants in our Universe, and they are not finite. They cannot be measured by using finite numbers. There are only relative relationships that are generally constant and they can only be measured in relation to each other...relatively: not absolutely.

The Universal Condition of Actual Infinity in the Universe is a Universal Constant. But not in relation to other Conditions that are Actually Infinite. The Universal Condition of Relativity in the Universe is a Universal Constant only inside our Universe. The Universal Condition of the Splitness of Time in our Universe is a Universal Constant only inside the 2 Universes it created. None of these Conditions can be finitely measured because they are all Actually Infinite. None of them are absolute; all of them are relative to each other. The speed of light. The specific mass of atoms. The speed of electrons. The mass of electrons. All of these aspects of the Universe are all relative relationships which are only proportionally constant to each other in relation to each other because they are all in a state of Dynamic Balance. Scientific Constants are merely relative comparisons of relative proportions which are generally constant. They are merely relative relationships that can be expressed in relative proportions as comparative fractions that do not change proportionally between themselves. Nothing else. It is that simple.

In his Theory of General Relativity, Einstein showed that there cannot be any Absolute Constants in the Universe. The trouble was that in order to prove it, he was forced to use two expedient Constants to do so. He had to do this. If he had not done so, the scientific community would never have accepted his theory in the first place. If he had not used these two expedient constants, nobody would have listened to him. In fact, if he had not used two expedient constants: he could not have even set up his equations. He would have been laughed out of the scientific establishment, his Theory of Relativity would never have been published in scientific journals and his ideas would never have gained worldwide fame. After he predicted that light rays actually bend around the Moon: his entire theory was indiscriminately hailed as being scientifically proven. It was not proven at all. Only the discovery that light bends around the moon was proven; nothing else. Until Science finds out just what gravity is, and where it comes from, and why light bends: no theoretical equation using light as a constant can be valid.

Time itself is a Condition of in-betweenness, or Splitness... on a Trialistic level, or in a three-dimensional, Trialistic Condition. It allows Causality, Relativity and Finiteness to exist by splitting the Condition: of Actual Infinity. The Splitness of Time is not a single linear process: it is multi-linear. It splits in all directions at the same time: Length-wise, Width-wise and Depth-wise. It is a Condition of Splitness. It is a three-dimensional Condition of Splitness. Each form of Energy at each relative position in Space, and each relative moment of Time exists at its own relative speed of motion in relation to all other energy around it. Each form of Energy exists at its own rate of Time moving through Space. In essence; Time is movement. Movement is Time. Time is three-dimensionality. Three-dimensionality is Time. Though light travels three-dimensionally in all three-dimensional directions in our Universe: Time is still a linear process of Splitting the Infinite Condition of the Third Dimension.

How can this be so? Because Time splits the Condition of Depth everywhere in the Universe at the same time. Not just at one place in the Universe. The Infinite Third Dimension of Depth is not a finite Third Dimension. It is a Condition that is actually Infinite; it exists everywhere in the Infinite Universe. Time merely splits the Infinite Conditions of Length, Width and Depth... linearly. In sequence. All three ways: in all three Conditions of Length, Width, and Depth... all oriented 90 degrees to each other. The most basic Condition of Time is Causality. Time is Causal. Causality causes things to happen in a linear sequence of events. Another basic Condition of Time is Actual Infinity. Time is Actually Infinite. Another Basic Condition of Time is Splitness. It exists in a Condition of Splitness as dynamically balanced Condition of Connection-Separation between Energy and Space. The 1st Condition of Time is Length. Time is linear. It goes in only one direction. The Length of Time is Infinite. It goes forward, only in one direction: that is its Condition of infinite Length. Actually, it went forward, or Out during the 1st one-half split of Time... now it has turned around and is coming back In... but it is still going in only one direction. Its direction just changed by 180 degrees. But only in the context of the Infinite Universe as an Infinite Totality reversing itself as a whole. We assume that Time going only in one direction is going forwards. It is not. It went forwards during the first ½ of Time. Now it is now trying to go backwards... back in, and doing a very bad job of it.

The 2nd Condition of Time is Width... or Duality, which exists as two Conditions of Past and Future. That is its Condition of Width. Time also exists as a Condition of the Present. In-between the Future and the Past. That is its 3rd Condition: the Condition of Depth is the Present. In other words our Universe only exists 3-dimensionally in the Present. It does not exist 3-dimensionally in the Past. It does not exist 3-dimensionally in the Future. This is why after something happens in the present 3-dimensionally it disappears from sight. We cannot see where the Past goes because we are moving along with the splitting Present... we are in the Present. This is also why we cannot see the Future because we exist only in the Present, and the Future has not been split yet. Because it has not yet been split: the Future is not 3-dimensional yet. Because of the Conditions that go to make up Time: Time splits the 3rd dimension in only one direction at a time. Nothing in the Universe can move in two directions at the same time. Everything in the Universe; moves in only one direction at a time.

Energy can only travel in one linear direction at a time.
Light can only travel in one linear direction at a time.

Light cannot travel in two different directions at the same time.
Energy cannot travel in more than one direction at a time.

Energy travels in a mono-linear direction. Whichever direction it vibrates in is also mono-linear. It can change the direction of its motion three ways, but it cannot travel in two directions at the same time. This is because all 3 dimensions were created by the Linear Impetus of Splitness going in only one direction at a time through the Infinite Medium of Formlessness. This Universal Dynamic reveals the fact that our Universe is actually a composite of three separate mono-linear Dimensions put together.

The Two-Dimensional Universe

Before our Universe emerged into Three Dimensions. When our Universe was still in a Dualistic Condition... what was it doing? Actual Infinity split infinitely into a Dualistic Condition...it split into sets of Connection and Separation in the form of concentric rings that expanded out. Then they came back together. They expanded and contracted In and Out an Infinite number of times. It was a Causal Process of Dynamic Balance. The 2-dimensional Universe had to balance itself dynamically. What goes out must go in. What goes in must go out. By retracing its own Causal Path of Dualistic Splitness, and coming back to its original Condition of Duality before our Universe emerged... the 2-dimensional Universe expanded and contracted as a series of 2-dimensional concentric rings or sets of Connections, and Separations. It did this an Infinite number of times, expanding and contracting...

And then being separated into two separated series of Concentric rings;

Split apart by the Impetus of Splitness

It was merely recreating, and re-living the original first split of Totality being split into Everythingness and Nothingness. This is why and how the 1-dimensional Universe finally split into two 2-dimensional Universes, and then two 3-dimensional Universes. Our 3-dimensional Universe is just a 3-dimensional re-creation of the 2-dimensional Universe and the 1-dimensional Universe. The experiential memory of the Expansion and Contraction of the two 2-dimensional Universes, the causal memory of this dualistic expanding and contracting process of in and out was already indelibly implanted inside the 2-dimensional Universe before it became 3-dimensional. This is why our Universe expanded Out during the 1st half of Infinite Time, and this is also why it is now trying to go back In during the 2nd half of Infinite Time. Because the first Dualistic expansions and contractions had already happened an Infinite number of times in the 2-dimensional Universe before our 3-dimensional Universe emerged... the Causal Process of it Splitting apart, or expanding was indelibly implanted into The Dualistic Condition of Actual Infinity when it emerged as a Singularity into the 3rd Dimension. It had been already programmed to go through this process. This guaranteed that once the Third Split happened it would split into Infinite Smallness first going Out; and then turn around and try to come back together again, coming back In.

Once it exploded out into the 3rd Dimension, it was no longer in a Condition of 2-dimensional concentric rings, or sets of Connections, and Separations that could easily expand out, and contract in; over, and over again. The 1st expansion of  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time destroyed the connective integrity of these expanding and contracting concentric rings of Connection and Separation... They were blown into tiny bits. They were blown into infinitely small particles. This is why the Universe still exists in the 3rd Dimension. It has yet to find a way of coming all the way back In. The entire Path of Splitness is a series of Dynamics which is desperately trying to go back to an earlier original Causal Condition, and failing in the attempt every time.

This was how and why 3-dimensional Energy expanded out and fractured into Infinite Smallness. Originally, it existed in a 2-dimensional Condition of concentric rings of Connection, and Separation. It was never designed to exist in a 3-dimensional state. It could not expand and contract as 2-dimensional rings of Connection-Separation 3-dimensionally. It could not keep the integrity of its 2-dimensional Condition in a Universe composed of 3 Dimensions. Instead of expanding out in rings of Connection-Separation. It exploded out into the 3rd Dimension: and the 2-Dimensional rings of 2-Dimensional Rings of Connection and Separation split up into smaller and smaller 2-dimensional bits... until they split into infinitely small Energy particles and Space cells.

Why didn't it split from a pair of 2-dimensional Universes into four, 3-dimensional Universes? There are 2 Nothingness Universes that do exist. They balance the two Everything Universes; they are just not dealt with in this book. If you add Nothingness to the equation then you actually do get four 3-dimensional Universes instead of two.

If you ask how can there be something even less than the empty space of our Universe: ask a fish; what is water? The fish does not really understand the water it swims in: it senses the water it swims in as merely something it travels through. Just as we ignore the air we live in as something taken for granted which we travel through. Water, Air, and Space; are all just different Mediums of Formlessness mixed up with the Impetus of Energy... Space has all kinds of radiation energy and light waves traveling through it, just like water has all kinds of fish traveling through it. The Space of our Universe exists as a Medium, just as water and air does. Not as nothing. The Space of our Universe is not made up of nothing: it is a 3-dimensional Medium, a Medium which is composed of 3 Dimensions. Take diamonds as an example: even though they are the hardest solid substance on earth, diamonds are a Medium also. They are transparent, and allow light to pass through it just as water and air and space does. Whatever is transparent, acts as a Medium for other kinds of Energy. Mediums are transparent. Space is a Formless transparent Medium which Energy can travel through.

What we call 3-Dimensional Energy, is 2-dimensional in its origin and in its intrinsic nature. Energy is 2-dimensional because it originally came from a 2-dimensional Condition. It originally came from the 2-Dimensional Universe. At the first causal split of  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time splitting into its three-dimensional Condition, the Universe was only expanding like it had already done an infinite number of times before in the 2-dimensional Universe. Except for the first time, it did so at 90 degrees to its former expansions and contractions.

This is also why Time keeps on splitting.

This is the secret of Time...

This is the rate of Time...

This is the heart of Time.

This is the metronome of Time...

It is the rate of Time splitting which is constant; not Time itself. In the center-point between the twin, three-dimensional Universes: the Condition of the 2-dimensional Universe is still expanding and contracting at the same rate that it always has.... at the same rate it did before the 3-dimensional Universe ever existed. Every time it contracts it sparks a 3-dimensional explosive split which radiates out into both 3-dimensional Universes. Every contraction of the 2-dimensional Universe produces one Split of the 3-dimensional Depth we call Time. Every expansion produces the Trialistic 3-dimensional positional changes in the two 3-dimensional Universes. The rate at which the 2-dimensional Universe expands and contracts is constant. It has been contracting and expanding an infinite number of times at the same rate for an infinite number of times long before the two 3-dimensional Universes ever emerged out from its 2-dimensional contractions and expansions.

This hidden metronome in the center of the unknown, invisible, intangible, 2-dimensional Universe is one reason why Science has not been able to understand the fundamental dynamics of how Time actually works. The Universe is organic. The Universe is a Totality. An egg is also a Totality. When an egg is formed, the first thing it creates inside itself is a beating heart in its center. Each split of Time is a relative exponential fraction of the Condition of Infinite 3-dimensional Space. The first major split was  $\frac{1}{2}$ ... the second was  $\frac{1}{4}$ .... Now the fractions are so tiny we cannot use finite numbers to measure them. But the rate at which it splits is always the same. The rate of Time is the heartbeat of not only our Universe, but of the other Universe also: two hearts beating as one. The constrictions and expansions of the 2-dimensional Universe is the organic heartbeat of Time in the two 3-dimensional Universes. The reason we have hearts that beat regularly is because before our 3-dimensional Universe emerged, the 2-dimensional Universe was originally a single infinite heart, beating regularly... constricting and expanding an infinite number of times... which collided and split and became two beating hearts. The beating heart of the 3-dimensional Universe comes from the constant constriction and expansion going on in the 2-dimensional Universe. The rate of Time is the rate at which the heart of our Universe beats; but the rate of Time is not the heart itself. Time is organic. The rate at which Time splits... or passes is organically understandable.

The Basic 3-Dimensional Conditions of Our Universe

To further explain the emergence of this Triality and explain how and why the Universe unfolded as it did, we can break down its basic Triality of our 3-dimensional Universe into its composite Basic Dualistic Conditions.

The Basic Trialistic Conditions of the Universe are:	Space	Energy	Time
The Basic Dualistic Conditions Of these Trialities are:	Empty- full	Attraction-Repulsion	Past-future

emerged also as a Triality with an in-between factor of Balanced Splitness. This in-between factor is the Condition of Relativity. It is also the factor of The Present Moment which exists in-between the Past and Future Splits of Time. It is also the factor of Causality. These three descriptions of the same Condition are the in-between factors which gives Space, Energy, and Time; their interdependent Balanced Splitness.

Relativity exists as a Condition of The Present Moment and Causality.

Causality exists in the 3-dimensional Universe as a Condition of Relativity, and The Present Moment.

The Present Moment exists as a Condition of Relativity and Causality.

Since Time exists only as a relationship between Energy and Space and since our awareness exists only in the Present Moment, we have no way of measuring the relative moments of Time as they keep on splitting. Since Space only exists as a relationship between Time and Energy and since our awareness exists only in one space at a time, we have no way of measuring the relative position of space as it goes on expanding. Since Energy only exists as a relationship between Time and Space and since our awareness exists only in one energy, we have no way of accurately measuring the causality of energy particles as they go on affecting each other.

Even with a comparison between different rates of speed we are still comparing only relative aspects of Space and Energy at the same moment of Time, or at the same rate of Time splitting. This is an deceptive illusion because every split of Time is different, even though it splits at the same rate. One moment in time, one second today is not the same amount of Time as one second fifty years ago or 3 billion years ago. Because we have no way of determining if one period of Time is the same or different from any other given period of Time we have no way of knowing what unit of Time we are actually using. This explains Why and How the Universe could come into being at such an incredibly fast rate from our relative viewpoint and then slowed down so quickly. The only possible answer is the exponential fractional Splitting of Time itself, in the context of the Third Dimension being Actually Infinite, and the Third dimension being Time. There is no other possible answer.

This scale of fractional slow-down can be seen in the splitting of a single cell. For instance in the birth of a living organism beginning from a single cell, or Totality. As the total cell splits, and multiplies... the rate of its growth slows down exponentially with every successive split. A growing fetus grows faster and changes more during its first moments of cell-splitting: than all the rest of its growth. The fractional rate of splitting of a single cell mirrors in microcosm exactly how Time actually works, and how the Universe was born. You can also describe the in-between factors of the Trialities of the Universe as: Relativity, Causality and the Present Moment. Like this.

Space:	Energy:	Time:
Full-Relativity-Empty	Attraction-Causality-Repulsion	Past-Present - Future

Which gives an in-between description of the:

Relative size and position of Space	Relative strength and speed of Energy	Relative passage of Time
And the: Causal nature of Space	Causal nature of Energy	Causal nature of Time
And the: Present Moment of Space	Present Moment of Energy	Present Moment of Time

Which translates into our finite perception of:

Space:	Energy:	Time:
From: full-empty	attraction-repulsion	before-after
To: large-small	weak-strong	fast-slow

This is just one more way of describing how the basic Dualistic Conditions of Infinity became Trialistic Conditions producing the connective relationships of our Universe, with all of its unique characteristics as we see it from our vantage point as humans 13-14 billion years after our Universe emerged. They are all Relative Conditions of Actual Infinity; not Finiteness. What these explanations demonstrate: is the Connectiveness of Causality. They show how The Condition of Causality created the Condition of Connectiveness. They show how the Connectiveness of Causality is Relative to the Path of Splitness. Every Causal Connection was balanced by a Causal Separation. Every connection is causally related to every separation. Every separation is causally related to every connection.

The apparent paradox is that since our awareness of the Universe only exists in the present moment it makes the Universe seem to be finite to us. We only perceive things in the present moment. We only perceive things relatively. We only perceive things causally at one point of the causal sequence. We only perceive things in a very limited way. Because we have no vantage point except in the present moment, our senses are not designed to perceive Actual Infinity. We can only perceive the in-between aspects of Infinity. We can only perceive the ongoing Splitness of Actual Infinity.

The in-betweenness of the Present Moment gives us a Relative perception of the fullness and emptiness of Space, and the attraction-repulsion of Energy as a Relative, Causal process. To see Space only in terms of Relative fullness and emptiness, and only in terms of the Present Moment, and only in terms of Energy... to see Energy only as different forms of attraction and repulsion, as structures, or as patterns in Space that are Causally affected... to see Time only as a Causal process in the Present Moment... to measure things by Causality, Relativity and the Present Moment is all problematic if you want to make actual sense out of it. If our awareness extended into the Past and the Future, we would not be capable of perceiving anything separately at all. Then there would be no such thing as a separate action, a separate space or a separate form of energy... Then we would perceive Energy, Space and Time as a seamless flow. Then we would perceive moving things just like the time-lapse photos of a busy nighttime highway as a seamless flow of energy, as a flowing river of light. Instead of seeing this:

We would see this:

Selective Awareness

One basic problem of our understanding the Universe lies in the nature of how our awareness is programmed to function selectively, which Science mistakenly calls selective intelligence. We are not selectively intelligent. Actually, we are selectively blind. Anything you select to study means you have to exclude everything else. Anything you select to understand means you cannot understand anything else. What do you select to study and what do you select not to study? What do you focus on, and what do you not focus on? Unless you include literally everything in the Universe in your study you cannot gain a true understanding of how all things are connected to each other, and how they are separated from each other and how they all work.

How can you study only one thing, and expect to understand how what you are studying is connected to the rest of the Universe, while ignoring everything else in the entire Universe? You can't. This is the absurdity of selective specialization. What do you select to measure when you have the entire Infinite Universe to measure? How do you measure it relatively when there are an Infinite number of ways to measure different things to each other by? Which relationship are you going to compare them to when there are an Infinite number of relationships to compare? Scientific inquiry is selective, limited and finite in scope. Science cannot measure Actual Infinity. Science does not want to address this. Science avoids admitting what it doesn't know. The Scientific search for any kind of absolute certainty has proven to be a futile quest because no matter what it studies; it does so selectively, and because the Universe is dynamically Relative to itself and always changing its relative relationships.

Re-statement

In essence: what happened, was that the Condition of Actual Infinity merely evolved into a Condition of Balanced, Infinite, Trialistic Splitness... naturally and organically. Not mechanically as Science would have you understand it. This is the basic organic explanation of where the Universe came from.

Thirteen billion years of the Causal process of Splitness is now being examined by Science. And every new scientific discovery only goes to underline and prove that my explanation is both accurate and correct. Every new scientific discovery of the Universe reinforces what I have explained in this chapter.

The farther back you go to the earliest Conditions of the Universe, the more reversible they are, the more they demonstrate the dynamic of Balanced Splitness and their origins of Duality, and Totality. Energy particles were created starting with the smallest and the simplest as the most numerous... going on to create larger particles in less abundance. Each fraction connecting-to, and combining with others to form larger, less common combined fractions of infinitely small energy particles. The Causal Process of Splitness explains how and why Energy became matter, and how Energy itself was created in the Universe, and the exact order in which it was created. Beginning from infinitely small energy particles coming together to creating larger subatomic particles.

To give a perspective of where the Universe stands now as far as Infinite Time is concerned; we are only 13-14 billion years into the last phase of that Infinite Path of Splitness. For us it seems that the first instant of the Big Bang happened incredibly fast. Actually it took fully one-half of an Infinity of Time for the Big Bang to occur. This is why the discrepancy between what happened during the first instant and everything else which happened after it seems so disproportionate. Infinite Time keeps on splitting into relatively smaller fractions exponentially, but since our awareness exists only inside the present moment the speed of events happening at different Time-periods is seen by us to be a sliding scale beginning at a blinding speed and ending up in a frozen crawl. The Relative Splitness of Time as a form of Balanced Splitness easily explains this because Time is relative not only to Energy and Space, but to itself as well... as both Space and Energy are also. Each balanced split of Time is relatively half the amount of Time which has already split. This same fractional truth or principle was also true for Energy and Space during the 1st half of Infinite Time. The Relative fractional proportions of Splitness: in the context of Actual Infinity splitting into Time, Space and Energy explains the entire 1st half of the history of the Universe which Science calls the Big Bang.

No scientific theory has ever been able to explain just how and why this Big Bang happened in the first place. This explanation does. The reason why Science cannot explain the Big Bang is because Science only measures finite phenomenon, it cannot measure Infinite phenomenon. The Big Bang was Infinite in nature, it was not finite. The very context of finite measured abstract numbers which Science uses in its theories to measure the Big Bang is invalid. Finite mathematical numbers cannot measure or explain Infinite Conditions. They cannot measure or explain Infinite Energy. Finite mathematical numbers cannot measure or explain Infinite Space. Finite mathematical numbers cannot measure or even attempt to explain Infinite Time.

Gravity

What holds the Universe together? Energy-Space-Time is held together by what? Science has no answer to this question. Science says that something called Gravity attracts energy which has mass to itself. Yet Science is unable to find just where this Gravity comes from. Gravity is merely one small aspect of the original Condition of Connectiveness. It comes from the earlier Condition of Infinite Totality. This is why its existence cannot be explained in terms of the existence of small gravity particles. It is the Universal Condition of Connectiveness that makes Energy particles attract each other. This is why there is no such thing as a Graviton. There never has been, and there never will be a Graviton. Science can look for it, and promise that they are almost on the verge of finding it, as they did for 30 years... but they never will because it does not exist. Actually: they have already given up on finding it. Their theoretical models depended on finding it. Now scientists are carefully keeping their mouths shut about this. They found that none of their theoretical models balance out. Hard Physics is disappearing from school text books. Fad theories and models are being constantly introduced to distract people from the fact that the basis of Scientific knowledge has been scientifically disproven by new discoveries, and no new theories or models have successfully been put forth to explain these new discoveries. One fad theory after another comes and goes, having nothing to do with hard physics which is testable and can be verified. The trouble with this is that it is destroying the reliability and integrity of all Science. Science is just as hide-bound and just as flawed as any other human institution of knowledge. The complete and utter failure of Science to explain the most basic phenomenon called gravity makes almost every other explanation and theory and model it subscribes to not only suspect, but potentially invalid and bogus.

One major reason Science has failed to understand Gravity is because Science has never put this natural phenomenon into its proper context. In fact all scientific explanations about gravity are put into the wrong context. The reason Gravity exists is because our Universe is now in the process of coming IN: not going Out. The first part of this process is the Energy of the Universe coming IN together. Gravity is only the crudest and most general way in which solid matter comes together and tends to stay together.

All Inorganic Energy has an intelligent selective awareness which Science does not recognize: Inorganic Energy is not dead, it is alive; it just has no awareness of anything outside of itself. Inorganic energy is sentient: it is aware... it has an inward awareness. It lacks any outward awareness. It radiates: "Come IN" because all of the Energy of the entire Universe is coming IN. The larger the mass of Energy, the louder its message, the farther it can be heard by other masses of both Organic and Inorganic Energy.

The phenomenon called Gravity can be explained by The Principle of Mutual Attraction: Like attracts Like. Energy is not coming IN blindly and haphazardly: it is coming IN selectively and intelligently. 'If you are like me, and I am like you then come IN with us: we have many things in common, we are like each other, we come together because of our Mutual Attraction for each other.' This is very important to understand; the awareness of both Organic and Inorganic Energy is selective. Gravity is a sentient response of living Energy coming IN together by its selective awareness of a mutual attraction for each other on a sub-atomic level of mass consciousness. All Energy is alive. All Energy is aware and is very selective in what it is attracted to and how it comes together.

This awareness of both Organic and Inorganic Energy, this Universal Principle of Mutual Attraction can be scientifically proven by the fact that all large bodies of saltwater have tides, whereas all large bodies of freshwater do not. On a molecular level, the mineral salt dissolved in oceans is still a solid mineral; it is not a liquid. The Moon is made up of solid minerals on a molecular level also. It is quite simple. Minerals attract Minerals. Solids attract solids. Liquids attract liquids. This also why there are veins of gold and silver in the surface of the Earth. When they were liquid: they were attracted to each other naturally because liquid metals are attracted to each other very selectively: liquid gold is attracted to liquid gold. Liquid silver is attracted to liquid silver: Like attracts Like. Anyone who wants to can verify this and receive a Nobel Prize for explaining just how ‘Gravity’ actually works and why it exists.

The Universal Law of Mutual Attraction is also the reason why moisture in the air comes together to form fog, or mist. It is the same organic reason why water droplets in the air come together in the air to form clouds in the sky. These water droplets get bigger and bigger attracting more water molecules, until they are so big that they become attracted to all the waters of the Earth as a whole. Humans call this mutual attraction by many names: Love, Friendship, Love of Family, social bonding, the urge to socialize, nationalism, love of country.... it’s all basically the same thing. It exists in all Organic and Inorganic Energy because all the Energy of the entire Universe is coming IN, it is coming together naturally in many ways... organically; not mechanically. You can also see the human species coming IN to form larger masses of Energy such as tribes, villages, towns, cities, nations, empires: doing it blindly on a subconscious level: this is exactly what sub-atomic Energy particles do also. This tendency of large masses of individual energy particles to blindly come together on the lowest level of unawareness called mass conformity is what Newton called ‘gravity’.

Science does not understand that what Newton called ‘gravity’ is actually a case of Mutual Attraction. Newton did not put the phenomenon of an apple falling to the Earth into its correct organic context: an apple is very much like the Earth; they have a mutual attraction for each other. Clouds are not very much like the Earth: that is why they float in the air. But when the moisture inside the clouds become round globes of liquid water... ah! then those round globes leave the cloud to fall to the Earth because the Earth is a round globe that is covered with water. Clouds are not attracted to the Earth as much because they are not much like much of the Earth. Newton didn't understand the Law of Mutual Attraction. Mutual Attraction is selective. So is Love. Newton did not understand what Love is; he had no Love in his heart.

This is one basic reason why people whose hearts are dead and feel no Love for each other and have never felt love and have never been in Love become scientists. They do not know what Love is. They do not Love the Earth. They do not look at what they see with Love and Wisdom. This is why scientists have no insights about what they study... this is why scientists are so blind in so many ways; they are missing essential parts of their own humanity. Science has no Love and no Wisdom in its knowledge. This is one reason why most intelligent people who have any love in their hearts instinctively have an emotional aversion towards Science and scientists. Electrons orbit around protons because of their mutual attraction for each other. They do not want to hurt each other, and they do not want to be hurt. This is why planets orbit around the sun also. You can see the Dynamic of Energy coalescing and coming together in how the spiral arms of Galaxies draws Energy into its center... The Energy in galaxies is coming together gently, gradually, selectively, intelligently, because of Mutual Attraction for each other; not because of what Newton called 'gravity'. The phenomenon called 'gravity' exists because all Energy is alive and is aware on many levels which we as mammals cannot perceive.

Understanding the Process of Splitness

The fractional process of Splitness can be practically demonstrated as an organic Creation of Linear Dimensions by Impetus following the Path of Splitness. Take an apple and call it Actual Infinity. Your arms represent the Conditions of Actual Causality. While holding the apple in one hand, take a knife in the other hand. Your two hands represent the ongoing creation of: Connection and Separation. The hand holding the apple together represents the Condition of Connection; while the knife represents the Condition of Separation. Your knife represents the Impetus of the Path of Splitness. Now start the Causal Process of Splitness. The first connected split will give you two connected-separated halves of: Infinite Nothingness and Infinite Everythingness. Splitting the apple again at 90 degrees to the first split will give you four quarters.

Two of those quarters represent Infinite Nothingness splitting into a connected-separated Duality of an Infinite 2-dimensional Non-Universe. The other two quarters represent Everythingness also splitting into a connected-separated Duality of an Infinite 2-dimensional Universe. Now split the 4 quarters of the apple at 90 degrees to the first 2 splits. This will give you 8 connected-separated pieces. Ignore one half of the apple. In the first split you made: one half of the apple represents Nothingness which we cannot deal with. Even though it is a dynamically balanced mirror of the other half. That leaves only four connected-separated pieces to deal with. Two of those connected-separated pieces represent the first split of Time in the other 3-dimensional Universe. The other two pieces represent the first split of Time in our 3-dimensional Universe. One of the two pieces of the other Universe represents  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time that slit completely when the other Universe first emerged. The other piece represents the unsplit  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Infinite Time after the Big Bang when our Universe first emerged.

Only one piece....  $\frac{1}{8}^{\text{th}}$  of that apple represents our Universe after the first major split of Time was finished. It represents the remaining  $\frac{1}{2}$  fraction of unsplit Infinite Time left in our Universe after the Universe exploded in a 'Big Bang'. Now; if you keep on splitting the last one-eighth of the apple into halves along the same parallel lines of the third split, into exponentially smaller and smaller fractional halves... for 13 billion years: the last unsplit sliver will represent the unsplit fraction of Infinite Time left in our Universe... And at that split... where your knife is: in-between the Past and the Future of our Universe: is where we are now.

Now if you are very good while you do all of this splitting, you should be able to keep the entire split apple together in one hand: your hand holding everything together represents the original Connectiveness of Formlessness being shaped into a Form called Totality by Impetus. But remember in this process of Splitness the other Universe was also fractionally split just as many times as our  $1/8^{\text{th}}$  of a Universe-apple was split in the last 14 billions years. But since we have no way of perceiving what happened to the other Universe: and since you are not that good at splitting things with a knife: we will not try to split the whole apple as it actually split... and is still splitting.

What is good about this practical demonstration of Splitness is that it shows how Time actually works. It demonstrates the Nature of Time as an act of Splitness, and as an actual amount of Time. Every split of Time forces our Universe apart at a 90-degree angle to the 2-Dimensional Universe. Separating the Past from the Future, and then melding it, connecting it back together again. The knife, or Splitness which creates the 3rd Dimension, also connects them back together. This Connectiveness of Splitness is what creates Motion. This is basically how The Path of Splitness created the Three Dimensions. This is how the Dimensions of Length, Width and Depth were created. This is how the 1st Dimension was created. It is how the 2nd Dimension was created. It is not difficult to understand. In the first split the Dynamics of Connection-Separation split Infinite Totality apart and created the 1st Dimension of Length. The knife is your 1st dimension of Length. In the second split: the Connected-Separated Dualities were split apart and created the 2nd Dimension of Width. It is your knife again, which creates the new dimension of Width. In the third split: it splits apart the 2-dimensional Universe and creates the Dimension of Depth. It is your knife again, that creates the new dimension of Depth. Your knife represents Impetus. This is a rough analogy of how the 3 Dimensions were created by Impetus following the Organic Path of Splitness.

This shows how the earlier Condition of Infinite Causality naturally evolved into 3-dimensional Depth-Time: logically, organically, and mechanically, mathematically, simultaneously... all at the same time. It demonstrates how the true Nature of Infinite Time is a perfectly understandable organic evolution of Causality as an actual act of splitting and connecting, and its relative relationship to other Conditions and Dynamics which are also Actually Infinite. The basic physical properties of our Universe were created in a logical, causal sequence: The Basic Conditions of: Through, In and Out, and Around, were created in the 1st linear Dimension. Expansion and Contraction, Attraction and Repulsion, Roundness and Flatness were added in the 2nd linear Dimension. Then the Condition of Depth was added in the 3rd Linear Dimension. From linear, to flat, to spherical forms of Formlessness in a strict sequence of 1-2-3. The reason why the Big Bang theory is so incomplete is because it does not explain why our Universe had all these qualities and characteristics in the first moments of its creation, and where they all came from. The fact is most of the physical characteristics and properties of our Universe were created before the Big Bang ever happened. It is only when you analyze the pre-history of our Universe and interpret it correctly that one can understand why the Big Bang was a logical outgrowth and evolution of certain basic Conditions and Dynamics which existed before our Universe emerged out of the 2nd dimension.

Causality

You can also look at this as a Causal Process. The Triality of our Universe can be described not as split segments of scientific information, but as a Process of Causality. We can look at it as a Causal Condition. Instead of calling these three aspects Energy-Space-Time: we can look at what happens to Energy in the context of Space and Time from a more human viewpoint. In fact this description is far more accurate and easier to understand as a combined totality of the three interrelated aspects of Actual Infinity. Since our awareness only exists in the Present Moment, and over the space of only one lifetime, we can look at Energy in two ways; what happens to it in the Present Moment, and over an extended period of Time from the Past into the Present. What is the difference between these two Conditions? Merely the amount of Time which has passed. This enables us to make a relative comparison between two periods of Time: Past and Present. The Causal description of the Universe is based upon the fact that all Energy is alive:

All Energy moving through Space Experiences.
All Energy moving through Time Evolves.
All Energy is Experience Evolving.

Just as Time-Space-Energy are necessary requisites of each other: so are the three aspects of the Universe called: Energy-Experience-Evolution. For example...

All Energy is Experience Evolving.
All Energy is the Evolution of Experience.
All Experience is Energy Evolving.
All Experience is the Evolution of Energy.
All Evolution is Energy Experiencing.
All Evolution is the Experience of Energy.

This description of the Universe demonstrates that on a very basic Causal level you cannot separate the three aspects of Energy, Space and Time from each other. They are in actual fact a single connected cohesive connected-separated Causal Totality. No matter in what order or what way you put these three aspects together, they all mean the same thing. They all signify the same process. By using these terms connectively, the emergence of the Universe can be understood as a naturally unfolding Causal process. The emergence of the Universe did not happen mechanically as Science would have you believe. It happened organically, in all the unimaginable splendor of Actual Infinity. Since Actual Infinity contains within it all Infinite Possibility and Infinite Probability, the process of Infinite Splitting goes through an Infinite Series of Permutations. It gives our Universe an opportunity to explore all the Infinite Possibilities and Probabilities through the process of Dynamically Balanced Splitness by going through an Infinite Series of Permutations. Through the Process of Causality: from the three aspects: Energy-Experience-Evolution, there is one common result: Creative Change. Nothing in the Universe is unchanging. What we as short-lived mammals deem to be permanent or unchanging is merely due to our relative, finite, in-between perception of Infinite Time. But even we can see and appreciate the results of this creative process as it becomes apparent even to our narrow range of sensibilities that things change due to the passage of Time.

Though we cannot measure this infinite range of uniqueness and diversity down to the levels of subatomic particles, it is obvious that every form of energy, every particle of Energy is also unique. The incredible uniqueness of each planet in our solar system goes to show that no matter on what level: from a snowflake, to an eco-system, from an atmosphere, to a planetary crust: by using the Dynamic of Infinite Permutations, the result of all Energy-Experience-Evolution is Creative Beauty. In the 13 billion years of experience through which each particle and each form of energy has evolved and changed, the end result has been creative change, diversity and uniqueness on all levels and in all ways. Each form of energy has had its own unique Evolution of Experience. Each form of energy has gone through its own unique Path of being affected by other energies. Each electron is unique. Each quark is unique. The reason electrons are unpredictable is because each one has already undergone its own set of unique experiences for 13 billion years and also because they are constantly reacting to levels of other energies so subtle that they are imperceptible to us.

Now given these parameters; you can begin to understand what happened. The instant this process of Infinite Splitting began: it became a creative process. As it split, and went on splitting: it did so creatively, through a range of Infinite Possibilities and Infinite Permutations... all dynamically balanced by the act of its own splitting. This is why the first formation of sub-atomic particles were at first only slightly different as energy particles of different sizes began to come together, and then they changed and grew to possess more and more unique characteristics, more complex forms-structures in more and more complex, subtle, interrelations of subatomic, atomic, and molecular bonding. Examine the formation of Hydrogen and Helium. Examine the earliest formation of atoms and molecules; and you will see this ongoing process of creative change unfolding. Basically: how the Universe works is simple. It works by the principle of Dynamic Balance, or the Dynamic of Balanced Splitness which I call The Path of Splitness.

We evolved and developed certain sensory organs that were designed to enable us to survive in a specific environment. In the context of Actual Infinity: due to the finite range of our sensory organs, we as humans are limited in our perceptions of the world around us, and the Universe. So is every other living organism. Each species range of perception-awareness is unique and limited. We can no more understand what a fish feels or what it understands...or what an ant feels or what it understands, than they can understand what we perceive and understand. Simply because they sense energy in ways and on levels which are different from us. In the context of the Actual Infinity of the Universe we are merely ants with slightly better antennae. The reason we do not easily perceive these Totalities-Dualities-Trialities correctly is because we were not designed to perceive them beyond the limited, finite context of the Present we exist in. That context is the perspective of only one sub-species of mammals living upon one planet, in one solar system, in one galaxy: who evolved a limited, sensory range designed only to survive successfully within one unique niche of the original ecosystem we were genetically designed to function in.... That is; in Africa, where we originally came from, as naked apes who stood up and began wondering about things. Human animals were never designed to unravel all of the mysteries of the infinite, creative diversity of the entire Universe in the first place. If we could have witnessed the entire process unfolding as it happened from more than one perspective, then maybe we would be able to understand the basic make-up of the Universe better. Why and how we can even slightly figure out the actual make-up of the Universe as it actually is in any larger context is another question altogether.

Randomness

13 billion years ago, the Universe was an amorphous mass of unorganized Energy which then systematically organized itself into logical, harmonic organic shapes and dynamics of galaxies, stars and planets. You cannot create an organized, organic design out of an amorphous mass of disorganized mass of energy by random chance! Just because the Causal Process of the Universe is Actually Infinite, just because we can never perceive, trace or understand all of its infinite Causal complexity doesn't mean that the Causality of the Universe is random; it is not. The apparent randomness of the Universe is only due to our mistaken, finite misperception of it. If we could trace and understand all of the Causal processes in their entirety we would understand this. Before this book goes any further, I would like to throw out the idea of randomness completely. The concept of Randomness is a complete fallacy. Everything in the Universe is Causal. All results have a logical cause. There is a Causal reason for everything that happens. Just because we do not understand exactly why something happened does not mean it is random: it does not mean that there was no logical causal reason for it to happen.

The Universal Principle of Energy which explains randomness is the Universal Principle of Intelligent Avoidance. All Energy in the Universe intelligently avoids hitting all other Energy as much as possible. The Universe is basically an intelligent, non-violent organism. It avoids violence; it avoids hitting itself by deflecting away from the dangers of any violent impact as much as possible. It avoids the violence of hitting something as much as possible by intelligently going around it. Aroundness and Deflection are Universal basic Tendencies of intelligent non-violence that all the Energy in the Universe and all the Space in the Universe possesses as an intrinsic intelligent part of their intrinsic nature.

Deflection is not randomness. Aroundness is not random. A tree grows organically by using the Dynamic of Splitness as a Dynamic of Growth, its branches do not deflect away from the trunk randomly, they deflect away for perfectly good, logical, reasons. An electron deflects away from an atom for very good logical reasons. It avoids hitting the atom by intelligently going around it instead of crashing into it. That is not randomness... that is intelligent awareness. Causality is not random. The Universe was created organically for logical reasons that are Causal. The Universe is not meaningless. Everything in the Universe can be understood and explained by using logic and common sense. The point is that the Universe is not random. It means something. The Universe has meaning. It has a designed purpose and a designed function.

This chapter shows that there is more than one way to look at anything. There is more than one kind of truth. It also shows that if a truth is universal, you will find that it agrees-with, and connects-to, and coincides with every other universal truth without contradiction. I have given more than one example that demonstrates the Dynamics of the Path of Splitness. I have shown more than one way to look at the Universe. I have supplied more than one model. None of them contradict each other. All of them fit together. All of these models can be crosschecked against each other. All of them fit for a simple reason; they are describing the same thing, only in different ways. They are only different ways of looking at the same thing. They all make sense. There are no contradictions inherent within any of them or between any of them.

Perspective and Distance

Without the technical use of a 1-dimensional point, the idea of distance disappearing into infinite smallness: we would never have been able to accurately render the 3- dimensional world we see onto a 2-dimensional surface as abstract art. This concept of Actual infinity has been used in abstract art on a practical basis for hundreds of years. It is one reason why many artists were ahead of their time. Because when they used the concept of Actual Infinity in their art, it expanded their perceptual awareness. Stretching your vision: trying to see farther than you can see: staring at a non-existent infinitely small disappearing point that is infinitely far away from you, stretches not only your eyes: but your awareness of Space and Time as well. Just as staring up at night at a star that is hundreds of billions of light years away from you stretches and expands your awareness of Space and Time. Even a slight intimation of Actual Infinity expands your awareness of everything else in the Universe. It develops in you a Sense of Pure Wonder. It expands your understanding of everything in the Universe. It widens and improves your perspective on things.

How can we tell that Time is an exponential process of Infinite Splitness? Stand on a long straight highway. And look at the painted line that recedes into infinity. Look at the telephone poles. They recede at the exact same 45-degree angle as the road does. The farther you look ahead, the more everything gets smaller by an exponential ratio of one-half. The principle of perspective in all technical drawing is that an abstract image of a 6 ft man on a piece of paper becomes 3ft tall: when he is  $\frac{1}{2}$  the distance to the point of infinity. And that 3 ft man becomes  $1 \frac{1}{2}$  ft tall when he is half again the distance away from the point of infinity also, etc, etc. Yet the actual distance is exponentially farther than your perception of it. This is the universal relative ratio of Perspective and Distance of Infinity in the Universe. This exponential ratio of Distance and Perspective of  $\frac{1}{2}$ ... not only works when it is put into a context of Actual Infinity. It also works when it is put on a piece of paper into a relative finite context. This explains both why and how Perspective works, and also why it exists at all in the first place. This exponential ratio of Perspective and Distance on paper proves the Actual Infinity of the Universe. It proves Time exists as an exponential Splitting of halves.

Conclusion

Anyone familiar with the teachings of Daoism may mark the similarity between what I have written here, and the ancient Eastern teachings of Dualism, or Daoism. However: the ancient teachings of the Dao have never been connected into a modern context. Its wisdom has never fully explained the basic underlying dynamics of how and why the Universe actually works. This chapter explanation places the Duality of Daoism into its proper context. It explains where Dualism came from. The only explanation that successfully includes and explains every facet of the Universe.... including the phenomenon of Life, and also the Human Condition: is the Principle of Dynamic Balance, or the Principle of Balanced Splitness, which I call The Path of Splitness. The Dynamic of Duality does not explain all of the Universe. But the Dynamic which created that Duality does.

The Principle of Splitness, or The Dynamic of Balance, or The Law of Equality: or as I call it, The Path of Splitness; successfully covers and explains what all other less inclusive explanations do not. The explanation given here is the only one that works because it is based on the actual facts, the actual conditions of our Universe: not upon imaginary abstract concepts, or imaginary abstract mathematics, or imaginary abstract numbers, or imaginary abstract ideas. This explanation is based upon how the Universe actually works. It is based upon the fact that our Universe is Actually Infinite. What is this Principle called: Dynamic Balance, or Balanced Splitness?

It is the Law of Relative Equality.

Everything is equal to everything else relatively... in their relationship to each other. Einstein mis-stated this Law by saying that: 'Everything is relative to everything'... What he left out is more crucial than what he kept in. What he should have stated is: Everything is equally relative to everything because everything functions by the Principle of Dynamic Balance, and everything must obey the Law of Relative Equality. The Universe works, and functions by the basis of seeking out, finding, and establishing relative equalities. It does not seek out, or find, or try to establish relative inequalities. All things which are relatively unequal in the Universe function badly. The principle of Balanced Splitness is based upon a Law, which is far more overriding, and more important, and more powerful than the Principle of Relativity because the Principle of Relativity is based upon The Law of Equality. This one Law is far more overriding, more universal and more important than all of the Laws and Principles and Theories and Models of Science combined. Science has tried to reverse the Principle of Equality. It has tried to make a few discovered, specific, non-universal, general Principles more important than this one single Universal Law. As a result: all of its separate scientific explanations do not fit each other. Or else they fit so badly that scientists cannot find out how to make them work together at all. Instead of many specialized laws, the entire Universe actively obeys only one single specific Law. Because of this, it functions very well. The Universe doesn't balance-out vaguely, or generally. It balances out equally to the last quark, and to the last infinitely small energy particle. Every quark and lepton in your body, in the Earth, in the Sun, in this Galaxy, inside all of the Infinite Galaxies of the Universe: is actively seeking out, finding and establishing dynamically balanced equalities all the time.

All of the Laws of Science and Physics are only one Universal Law. You can call this law the Law of Relativity, or the Law of Equality, or the Law of Balanced Splitness or the Law of Relative Equality. Or the Law of Dynamic Balance... Whatever you want to call it, they all basically mean the same thing. I call it The Path of Splitness. Newton stated. "For every action, there is an equal and opposite reaction." He was right. Without Equality: no

Scientific Law can work. Without the Equality of Dynamic Balance: Scientific equations don't work. Without Equality: the Universe could not work. Every supposedly separate and unique abstract Scientific Law is based upon and dependant upon the Universal Law of Equality functioning universally. Dynamic Balanced Splitness is just Dynamic Equality. The Law of Relativity is just another way of explaining how things tend to balance out equally. The Dynamics of Love and Friendship and Happiness is the human search for Relative Equals and Relative Equality. When we find our match, our equal, our balanced mate, our other half: we fall in love, or become friends. When we become unequal: we fall out of love, we stop being friends. Water seeks its own level because it is always seeking a Relative Dynamic Equality. The idea that the Laws of the Universe apply mechanically only to dead physical objects and not to living humans and all Nature is a fallacy. The idea that Love and Science are based upon different Laws is pure bunk. The idea that humans do not have to obey the one, single actual Law of the Universe is a fallacy. The idea that humans do not have to obey the Actual Law of Equality is crap. The result of human inequality is human unhappiness. The result of inequality is inequity. The result of humans not being relatively equal to each other is; envy, arrogance, hatred, violence, and bloodshed. People may seek to gain a higher Equality, or they may be forced into a lower Equality. Water searches for a higher Relative Equality by Principles called osmosis, and evaporation. It is all the same basic Dynamic. Water searches for a lower Equality by what Newton called Gravity. Regardless of the context or the situation: we, and every electron and atom in the Universe is searching for a Relative Equality. Every human, every electron: is not happy unless they find their own level of Relative Equality, their own niche, their own appointed place in the order of all things in the Universe.

This chapter proves that Lao Tse, Newton and Einstein were correct. Everything in this chapter is merely a logical extrapolation of what has already been discovered and proved to be scientifically true. Einstein proved everything is relative to everything else. He just failed to put Time into its proper relative context. Newton just forgot to universalize his findings correctly. Lao Tse just didn't have the Hubble Space telescope to show him that not only the world of Nature, but the entire Infinite Universe is also organically structured. All I have done is taken their discoveries and other discoveries of Science, and put them into their correct organic context. All I have done here is use what has already been discovered, and put what is already known together, and by backtracking; found the crucial parts of the puzzle and connected the missing dots.

What I have laid down here in this chapter does not take anything away from the discoveries made by Lao Tse, Newton, Einstein and others: it merely connects what is already known into a larger context which makes logical organic sense. The reason Lao Tse, Newton, and Einstein did not discover where the Universe came from, and how it emerged, is not only because they lacked certain crucial scientific facts which have come to light until just recently... but because the entire question about the origin of our Universe did not even exist when they were alive... nobody had asked this question yet. Scientists today are only now just beginning to ask the question of what preceded the Big Bang. It is only in our new Age of Information where many sources of knowledge from many different disciplines are now freely available, that I could assemble the important basic facts and put them together into the single, cohesive, understandable explanation which I have laid out here in this chapter.

The organic logic of the Dynamics of Infinity concerning the Big Bang, which I have presented here in this chapter, is as logical as the symbols which mathematics uses to represent Infinity. For instance: in the mathematical symbols which stands for Infinity: 1/0, One represents the Totality of Everythingness: Zero represents the Totality of Nothingness... which is also a Totality: Also... 1 is the 1st Dimensional Universe and 0 is the 2-dimensional Universe. Not only that... but One represents Impetus splitting Formlessness...and Zero represents Formlessness being formed into a round shape by Impetus. When you look at these mathematical symbols organically: they have more than one level of meaning... yet all these meanings are organically connected, and they all mean the same thing.

Zero over One is Impetus going into an Infinite Totality and is splitting:  $\frac{0}{1}$

One over Zero is Impetus coming out of Totality:  $\frac{1}{0}$  and is not splitting.

One coming out is not splitting:  $\frac{1}{0}$  this gives you a Totality, or One

One going in, is splitting:  $\frac{0}{1}$  which gives you Infinity, or:

 = Infinity     = the Big Bang =  = two 3-D Universes

Actually it is two bangs, not one. The mathematical symbol for Infinity is  $\infty$ ... It is the symbol of Infinite Totality being split into a pair of 2-dimensional Universes. The fact is; the actual truth about where our Universe came from and how it emerged has been staring every mathematician in the face ever since the mathematical symbol for Infinity was first invented. The point is that the mathematical fractional symbol for one and the mathematical fractional symbol for Infinity both represent a Totality: reverse them, and they still mean the same thing... but only in the context of the Universe as an Infinite Totality which is also a Balanced Duality of Two Universes: in no other way. Also... you cannot use any other mathematical symbols or values or numbers when it comes to correctly describing the Infinite Universe as a Totality except as a split organic fraction; not as a decimal fraction. Finite Fractions are just abstract representations of the relative Splitness of the Infinite Universe.

The symbol of Infinity can also be seen in the bow tie.
 The symbol of the 2 Universes is as old as the knot of a bow tie:

The bowtie is the easiest knot to unravel because it is designed to return back into a 1-dimensional condition of the linear line: just as our 3-dimensional Universe is designed to return back to the 2nd Dimension. The mathematical symbol of Infinity is also the sign of the Bow Tie. The answer to where our Universe came from has been staring us in the face ever since we learned how to tie our own shoelaces. Men have been wearing the sign of infinity around their necks for over 200 years now: first as scholars, then as artists, and finally as a fashion statement denoting the highest social status and then by people in the highest educational institutions. Organic Logic is universal: it does not lie.

The earliest symbol of Christianity also represents a Big Bang: it represents the huge expansion of human awareness which had never existed before: namely the revolutionary new concept of a universal humanity, which changed the world for the better. It represents the openness and honesty of a new kind of human with his arms stretched out; waiting to hug everything it can, opening its arms in acceptance and love. With an open happy face.

Impetus + Totality = Organic Birth of the Universe

The truths of how our Universe was created organically can also be seen in human birth symbols which come from the birth of Jesus of Nazareth. The basic organic dynamics of human birth and human life are the same organic dynamics of the birth and life of our Universe. The fact that the mathematical symbols representing the Totality of One and Infinity are almost the same as the symbols representing male and the female gender is not a coincidence. The Universal symbols of Birth and Infinity are semantically correct in English, and in Mathematics, and in Gender. When you use logic organically in the correct logical context: it cannot contradict itself because it is based upon universal Conditions and Dynamics which are all connected to each other.

The dynamic of the male sexual orgasm is exactly the same as the dynamic of the 2-dimensional Universe creating a 3-dimensional Universe. The explosion of a sexual orgasm is also a Big Bang. Why is the dynamic of organic birth the same as the Big Bang?... How is it the same?... It is simply a transference of energy from one dimension into another by diverting its life-energy 90 degrees:

To achieve a sexual orgasm: the male must tense all of its linear muscles and constrict them as tightly as possible in order to force its male Life-energy out from the exact middle of its body at an angle of 90 degrees. The arching of the male body in sexual orgasm re-creates the curve of the Universe being born. It is a recreation of the Big Bang: creating a new Universe in a new 90 degree direction.

This is also why electric motors work. A Magnet penetrating an energized electro-magnetic field at 90 degrees creates new energy... just like the energized male penis does human meaning out of scientific knowledge... you also take all human understanding out of it: and you take out all human interest in Science also.

Another reason my explanation of where our Universe came from is groundbreaking is that it successfully explains the idea of Intelligent Design which Christian fundamentalists use in trying to refute the Big Bang Theory of Science. This chapter not only answers the Intelligent Design theories of Christian Fundamentalists, it supports it. Except it supports it not as they would like it to be supported: it supports it organically, logically, scientifically: using simple common sense. The Theory of Intelligent Design is actually correct. Our Universe actually was intelligently designed: It just wasn't designed by an anthropomorphic God invented by humans. You don't need to include religion or any god to understand the intelligent design of the Universe. This chapter explains where Science got it right, and where they got it wrong. It also explains why the Intelligent Design theorists got it wrong, and where it got it right. Both theories are correct in their basic premise, but that's about all they're right about. This chapter unifies both of these theories into an understandable organic explanation: not into a unified mathematical field theory, not a set of complex mathematical equations, not into a religious dogma. This chapter unifies fields of scientific knowledge and religious ideas of intelligent design by connecting basic facts together organically by using simple logic and common sense.

Einstein's Theory of General Relativity became famous because it tries to connect scientific knowledge into a unified explanation. Until Science learns to connect the knowledge it already has, it will never advance humanity any further. In order to make sense out of scientific data and information: the specialized Fields of Science must be interconnected with each other. Until Science learns to integrate its knowledge into a cohesive, single, organic explanation as I have done here; it will remain a mass of fragmented information which cannot be understood by anyone because it is not put into understandable contexts which are actually correct, and actually connected to each other.

Understanding the Difference between the Infinite and the Finite

Once you understand the Splitness of Time, and how it works; you will also be able to understand the difference between what is Infinite, and what is Finite.

Past-Present-Future = the Totality of Infinite Time

The Present = Infinite Time splitting

Finitude is the act of splitting

Finitude is action, movement.

Finitude is the Splitness of Time

Finitude is the ongoing Path of Splitness

The Infinite Present exists fleetingly between the Infinite Past and the Infinite Future. The energy you are made of is Infinite in nature: it is only your form and motion which is fleeting. All finite energy exists only in the Present; not in the Past or in the Future. What you need to understand is that Infinity does not contradict Finitude. There are no contradictions between these two Universal Conditions. Actual Infinity does not contradict Actual Finiteness. They are part of each other. The Universe is both Finite and Infinite. There is no paradox here. In fact, Infinity could not exist without Finiteness and vice versa. They are necessary aspects of each other. The point is there are logical explanations to not only how and why the Universe emerged; there are also logical explanations to everything which exists inside the Universe. Everything in the Universe can be logically understood and explained if it is put it into the correct connected organic context. Everything in the Universe can be explained and understood by using logic organically.

Expansion of Awareness = Better Understanding

Better Understanding = Expansion of Awareness

When you can understand Infinity;

You develop an expanded Sense of Pure Wonder

Stands for Infinity.

is also the design of the male genitals.

Stands for the birth of the two infinite Universes which can be seen in the fraction:  $\frac{0}{0}$  when 0 signifies an actual Totality; not a zero, or nothing.

Also stands for the sign of the Christian cross: the death of a living god, being split in two, dying in agony, giving up his life as a sacrifice; as a universal symbol of suffering and selfless love. This is exactly what happened to the 2nd dimensional Universe when it died and give birth to two 3-dimensional Universes.

I cannot emphasize enough the importance of connecting facts logically to the actual connections which do exist between them, not false connections which do not actually exist. These symbols are actually connected to each other by organic logic, not by coincidence. They make common sense. They make practical sense. They make organic sense. They make biological sense. They make religious sense. They make mathematical sense. They make mechanical sense. They make geometric sense. They make physical sense. Trying to take all common sense, all practical sense, all organic sense out of Science has turned Science into a senseless accumulation of specialized unconnected bits of knowledge called scientific data. Separating scientific geometric knowledge from scientific mathematical knowledge and the scientific knowledge of physics has turned Science into a useless pile of incomprehensible specialized garbage. Instead of splitting it apart into smaller and smaller unconnected bits of useless junk, it is about time we begin connecting the knowledge we already have together. We live in the time period of the 2nd half of our Universe's existence; not during the 1st half. The Universe has been trying to come together for billions of years now, not explode apart: yet humans are still trying to explode things apart. The result of this obsolete insanity is the atomic bomb and the proliferation of nuclear weapons. If the human species is to stop its suicidal slide into the destruction of the planet it lives on, it must be educated and enlightened as to the actual truth about the true nature of the Universe it exists in, and the true reason we naked apes were put here on this Earth to live.

The origin of the Universe is also the origin of sexuality. The recreated dynamic of the birth of the Male and Female Universe can be seen in the sexual organs of mammals. The female vulva is shaped exactly like the two curved Universes emerging out from the 2nd Dimension by splitting the 2-dimensional Universe apart into two three-dimensional halves. The male penis when it is properly energized by its own sexual Impetus, gives birth to twins: a boy and a girl. These sexual organs recreate the birth of the 1-dimensional Universe 3-dimensionally. It represents the repeated splitting of Formlessness by Impetus until She becomes both a linear and a curved shape. The reason this recreated dynamic of the birth of the first shaped curved 1-dimensional Universes does not match the original dynamic, the reason this recreation of birth only goes halfway in and halfway out; is because it is being acted out in only 1/2 of 1/2 of the original 1-dimensional Universe. Half of the Totality of Formlessness is missing from this dynamic: Nothingness. The other 3-dimensional Universe is also missing. It is an unfinished Dynamic of Splitness for very good logical organic reasons.

You can see the same Path of Splitness in the back muscles of every human on Earth: the linear nerves and spinal column of the body splitting the back with the back muscles curving around the split, creating the exact same curve as the Big Bang created when the two 3-dimensional Universes emerged out of the 2-dimensional Universe.

Why is mathematics based upon the root of 10? It should be based upon the natural harmonic root of 12 but it isn't. The answer is because the two symbols:

Represent the deepest origins of the earliest, most basic aspects of the Universe we live in, namely: Impetus, and the Totality of Formlessness. Impetus was the original Male Creative Force, shaping Formlessness into an aesthetically beautiful, sexy, curved Form to create the 2-dimensional Universe, and then splitting her again into two shapes: a Male and a Female 3-dimensional Universe.

The four mathematical symbols which make organic logical sense are not 1-2-3-4. They are: 0-1-2-3. The mathematical symbol of 0 does not represent nothing, it represents the Totality of Nothingness and Everythingness before it split, it symbolizes the original Infinite Totality of Formlessness out of which our Universe was born. The four mathematical symbols of: 0-1-2-3 represents the four organic stages of development which our Universe went through in order to get to where it is now. 0 represents Formlessness when Impetus first shaped her into a Totality, 1 represents the creation of the one-dimensional Universe. 2 represents the logical evolution of the one-dimensional Universe of Length, into the two-dimensional Universe of Length and Width. The base of the number 2 has the linear 1st dimension which it rests on, and out of that base is created the flat, rounded circle which comes to complete the symbol. 3 represents the 2-dimensional Universe being split apart into a pair of three-dimensional Universes. Even the half-symbols of 2 and 3 can be explained by using logic organically. The missing half of 3 is the other 3-dimensional Universe. The missing half of 2 and 3 represents the other half of Formlessness: Nothingness. Take away the missing half of Nothingness from the symbol for the one-dimensional Universe, which is ↑ and that leaves you with our mathematical half-symbol of 1 as the symbol for the one-dimensional Universe of Linear Everythingness, which is the symbol for only half of Impetus splitting itself into our Universe, with the other half going into the other Universe.

One of the most nutritious foods in the world, the peanut, shows the organic structure of the two Universes beginning to come together. The truth about the organic origins of our Universe can be seen in a nutshell and put into a nutshell. The true nature of the Universe can be seen in the natural organic designs recreated here on Earth. The modern cultivated peanut was created 3,500 years ago by two diploid species of peanut coming together to produce the tetraploid species. This is not a coincidence. You can even see the 2-dimensional 90 degree gridlines of Length and Width marked out on the surface of the shell. The organic designs of Nature do not lie. Mankind did not design the peanut: Nature designed it around 3,500 years ago for a very good logical reason. The Universe is coming together organically and naturally as it is designed to. Why do you think peanut butter, one of the healthiest foods on the market, was invented? It was invented to bring two Universes together even more, it was invented because the Universe has not yet solved the problem of how to connect itself back together, except crudely, blindly and destructively. The modern peanut was created around the same time that modern heterosexual love between equals was created, when Paris of Troy fell in love with Helen of the Greeks, and both the Trojans and the Greeks were almost completely destroyed as a result of two cultures of the opposite sex coming closer together in a lover's quarrel as equals. This is not a coincidence. Human knowledge is coming together into a huge galactic mass of information in the form of the Internet: as tiny unconnected bits of information coalescing together; blindly, crudely. This book connects knowledge together logically and organically so it makes organic sense.

The Difference between Actuality and Abstraction

The difference between organic logic and the abstract logic of mathematics is the difference between an actual thing and an abstract symbol. For instance, what is the difference between

In abstract mathematics, the symbol of 0 called zero stands for absolutely nothing. On the other hand, in organic logic, the symbol of the egg is a Totality which stands for Everything; not nothing. The Earth is also a Totality: it is not nothing. It has a thin shell just like an egg. It is the same basic shape. If you raised a chicken in an environment without any gravity, its eggs would be perfectly round spheres, just like the Earth is.

The mathematical concept of zero is a total abstract fallacy. There is no vacuum inside the earth. The Universe is not a complete vacuum either: it's Space is filled with all kinds of energy radiation emanating from galaxies and stars. The only context in which the mathematical symbol of zero coincides with the actuality of our Universe and organic logic are the macrocosmic bubbles of galaxies in our Universe... and even that is not true because Space is a Formless Medium, and Formlessness is not made up of an absolute vacuum. The term Nothingness is not the same as the mathematical concept of nothing which is zero: both Everythingness and Nothingness are made up of something called Formlessness. The point I am making is that abstract mathematical symbols misinterpret and misrepresent the actuality of our 3-dimensional Universe so much; they reverse the actual meanings of universal organic shapes and symbols in our Universe. An actual egg signifies Everythingness, not Nothingness. An abstract zero signifies Nothingness with nothing inside it. Well guess what: there is no Nothingness in our Universe. Space is not an absolute vacuum; Space is filled with all kinds of radiating Energy and dust particles and gases. Space itself is not nothing; it is a transparent Formless Medium through which Energy travels. The mathematical symbol denoting absolute zero doesn't even belong in our Universe because Space is not made up of absolutely nothing: our Space is a Formless Medium made up of Everythingness: not Nothingness.

A living egg actually exists, it is not abstract, it is not an imaginary figment of the human brain; it is created by two living creatures coming together to give birth to another living creature; not splitting apart. An egg signifies birth. A zero signifies death. This is one reason why organic logic is superior to abstract mathematical logic. Organic logic is based upon actuality, while mathematical logic is based upon imaginary 2-dimensional symbols which do not accurately represent our 3-dimensional Universe. Organic logic does not lie. It does not deceive you about the actual meaning of its symbols. It does not reverse the meanings of things. It doesn't misinterpret the meanings of 3-dimensional things which actually exist in our Universe.

The mathematical abstract symbol of 0 also represents the concept of identity and the idea of duplication. Actual living eggs are not identical to each other. Each egg gives birth to a uniquely different living creature. You were born from a unique living egg; not from an identical imaginary zero. Your human uniqueness is not the identical duplication of a zero. Your humanity, your personality, your intelligence is not an identical duplication of other living human beings. When human beings value the identical duplication of an abstract symbol of a 2-dimensional symbol denoting nothing, over and above the uniqueness of an actual living egg, when human beings value identically printed pieces of paper with zeros on them over Life itself, when the more zeros there are on these pieces of 2-dimensional piece of paper, the more people value them, when people value abstract numbers over actual living organisms, you end up valuing death over Life. When this happens; then the entire system and structure of human values is reversed and turned upside down, until people are duped into the belief that money is more important than human life. Then people waste their lives on abstract numbers; then the only thing which matters in Life is increasing the number of dollars in your bank account, then avarice and greed becomes the dominant culture of human civilization; then billionaires spend their lives amassing billions of dollars for no rational reason other than the love of money and status, then the love of money eclipses human love and people become inhuman, uncaring monsters who only care about how much money they have and what their money can buy and how many zeros are printed on their paychecks and on their bank account statements.

One reason why Science cannot figure out how the Universe was born is because their mathematics lacks the organic symbol of birth. The abstract logic of mathematics leaves out the actual birth of the Universe. This is why the Organic Logic of 0, 1, 2, 3 is correct and the abstract mathematical logic of 1, 2, 3, 4 is false because it starts from zero, which represents nothing: not from an actual living birth. Organic logic includes the birth of the Living Universe: abstract mathematics doesn't. Science uses the organic symbol of birth as a mathematical symbol denoting nothing instead of everything: this is fundamentally wrong! Because of this, its entire accumulation of logical deductive reasoning is suspect. The very fact that the abstract logic of mathematics begins with a symbol denoting nothing instead of the symbol of birth, is one reason why educated people have an unconscious mental block when it comes to exploring and understanding the origin and birth of anything... never mind the birth of our Infinite Universe. Their educational training programs them into an unspoken assumption that you begin from nothing and then magically arrive at the number one... which is basically the fallacious idea of something coming out of nothing. This false assumption is subconsciously embedded into the false logic of abstract mathematics which educated people use as tools to think with logically; especially scientists.

The actual truth is that 0 does signify both Everything and Nothing... but only relatively, and only in the context of the prehistory of our Universe: not absolutely. The symbol of organic birth: 0 does signify both Life and death; it signifies both the death of the shell of the egg, and the birth of the living fetus emerging out from inside that shell into the world; not only in our Solar System and on Earth: but in the 2-dimensional rings of Separation and Connection that were broken apart and died to give birth to two three-dimensional Universes. The point is; to make sense of the meanings of abstract symbols; you must put them into their correct organic context. The organic symbol of 0 does not signify absolutely nothing. The creation and birth of a new living organism does begin from a small seed or singularity; but not from absolutely nothing; its birth comes out of two pre-existing Totalities coming together to create new Life. A living creature does not come out of absolutely nothing, and neither did the Universe. The abstract symbol of 0 does represent both Everything and Nothing, which makes balanced sense. But only in the right context and only if you understand that the pre-history which created our Universe was a dynamic based upon balance. When you use organic logic in the proper context, then everything becomes clear and makes sense because it is all logically interconnected without any contradictions or paradoxes.

Once you understand that our Universe is designed organically, the question of what came first; the chicken or the egg becomes ridiculous simply because it doesn't go back far enough. Simple single celled creatures existed long before chickens did. Single cell creatures are also eggs. The macrocosm of the Universe is also cellular in design; bubbles of space with thin shells made up of galaxies. The entire Totality of the Infinite Universe is an egg, the Earth is an egg: the design and shape of a round Totality was created long before our Universe was created. You need to understand the larger context of things in order to understand the world you live in. The organic design of the round egg is not limited to just the surface of the Earth; it is not limited to just chickens.

How old is the Big Bang theory? It was proposed more than 80 years ago, before 1929, for chrissake! And what has Science done with it? Not a damn thing. Has it advanced this theory by one iota? No it has not. Science is now so hidebound and wrapped up in its obsolete traditions and illogical fallacies; it has become a semi-religious institution. Science is not interested in true science anymore: Science is now only interested in is keeping its sinecures and jobs and grants and positions of power, and preserving untouched and unchanged its sacred obsolete texts. Hiding the fact that the basic principles it preserves have been disproved long ago by its own scientists. Bringing up new fads and theories which have no proof and are not even testable. Wild conjectures without any scientific proof is not Science. Logic that contradicts itself is false logic. Fad theories which contradict each other and are not testable is not Science. Science fantasy and science fiction mixed together with pure conjecture is not Science.

The organic truth of how the Universe emerged can be seen in the symbol of the fish: One half of the two Universes emerging out from the 2-dimensional Universe. Most of the forward Impetus of a fish comes from its tail, which is quite small compared to its body.

The tail of the fish shows a small part of the Impetus of the other Universe which helped the Impetus of our Universe to go forward. The explosive forward Impetus of our Universe did not come from nowhere: it was balanced by another Impetus in the other Universe: Two Impetuses pushing against each other; deriving their power from each other by pushing against each other... thus exponentially magnifying their forward Impetus and Power. This helps to explain why the Bang was so Big.

This is the actual origin of the organic reason why fish have tails. The tale of their past, the history of their forward Impetus goes all the way back to the original Impetus of 2 Universes, emerging out from both sides of the 2nd-dimension; both using each other's Energy by both pushing against each other; thus creating the new 3rd dimension of Depth.

Be it an owl, or an orangutan... you can see the same Organic Design of Splitness in the eyes and faces of all living creatures: the two irises expand and contract just like the twin 2-dimensional Universes once did.

The Impetus of your Energy comes In and goes Out from between the eyes through your nostrils. Your own eyes and face is a living recreation of the entire Dynamics of the origins of the Universe you live in. Every time you look into the face of another living creature, you can see the same dynamics of these origins the Universe you live in staring back at you. The whole world is filled with such examples of obvious organic truths and organic logic which make logical sense and do not contradict each other. It is high time that ordinary people understand the origin of the Universe and where it came from without being lied to, led astray and confused by the misinterpretations, misperceptions and dogmas of Science and Religion; both of them are wrong.

You can see the balanced splitting of four 2-dimensional Universes recreated in the design of the most delicate insect on earth: butterflies. Two Everything Universes balancing two Nothing Universes. Organic logic does not lie.

You can also see how the Universe was born in the organic design of the apple. If you split an apple apart, you can visually see the basic dynamics of The Path of Splitness. Just as the Universe was born out of a small seed, or singularity, the apple tree is also born out of a small seed, or singularity. Both give birth to the form of a 3-dimensional globe. But it must be put into the right context to be understood. Only when you compare an apple to a butterfly in the same 2-dimensional context does it make logical sense. Apples have the same 2-dimensional design as that of butterflies; right down to the stem emerging out from the middle, which represents the Impetus Energy of sexual penetration-birth-creation-Life.

The organic design of the apple is not an abstract concept invented by humans. The fundamental design of organic cells splitting is nothing new. Anyone who has taken Biology will recognize it. How organic cells split, how Life works is nothing new. Living cells split to create new Life. Well guess what; that's how our Universe was created also. The reason living cells split is because the 2-D Universe originally split into two 3-D Universes. If this had not happened, then there would be no Organic Life on Earth, and living cells would not split spontaneously as if by magic. There is no hidden magic in the spontaneous splitting of organic cells: there are logical reasons which explain why they do this. Seeds are singularities that recreate in infinite permutations, the original organic birth of our Universe. These natural dynamics go all the way back to before our Universe was born.

What are flat, 2-dimensional things doing hanging on a 3-dimensional tree? Leaves are a recreation of the 2-dimensional Universe. They are leaving the 2-dimensional form to crumble and fall into tiny bits so they can recombine themselves again back into three-dimensional living organisms. All organic decomposition is a recreation of the splitting up of 2-dimensional living rings, into tiny bits of living Energy which happened during the Big Bang. The 2-D Universe was alive and then it died. The reason organic leaves do not last long in our 3-D universe is because they are not designed to last; they are obsolete recreations of a dead past which has disappeared and is gone... they are leftovers of a once-living 2-D Universe that was alive and died and is no more. The cycles of Life and death on Earth are recreations of the Life and death of a living 2-D Universe dying to give Life to a pair of 3-D Universes. The bursting-out shape of leaves recreates the bursting-out of 2-D Life-energy, out into a new dimension, a new 90 degree direction; thus creating our 3-Dimensional Universe.

The first experience of Life and death ... the experience of Infinite Life and Infinite death and Infinite birth, happened only once in the beginning when the two 3-dimensional Universes were first born out of the single 2-dimensional Universe of Everythingness. Now it is being recreated on a finite level, over and over again on the Earth in infinite permutations, never repeating themselves exactly. The bursting out of leaves in the Springtime is an infinite permutation of the original infinite bursting-out of our 3-dimensional Universe into new forms of Organic Life. All Organic Life on Earth is a literal recreation of the entire past history of the Universe; it is a compressed transliteration of both the 1ST half and the unfinished 2nd half of our Universe's existence. Once you look at our Universe this way then it all makes perfect logical organic sense. Everything around you is a recreated permutation of the past... a past going back beyond the birth of our living Universe, all the way back to the original Conditions and Dynamics of formation which happened before our Universe was born.

The point is that our Universe is not a mechanical construct, it is not dead; it is alive. It was not designed mechanically. Our Universe is designed organically as we are, and just as alive as we are... the only difference is that it is infinitely larger than we are. Quarks are just as alive as we are also... the only difference is they're much smaller than we are. Just because something is smaller or larger than you doesn't mean that it is not alive. Once you realize the fact that regardless of size; everything in the Universe and the Universe itself is organically alive and designed to function in certain living organic ways, then you will throw away the obsolete mathematical models which Scientists use, and the myths and dogmas of Religion and see the Universe with new eyes, with a Sense of Pure Wonder at the living harmonious, aesthetically beautiful, organic designs of all forms of Life and the living Universe we live in and the living Earth we live on. Does a flea understand that it is living on a living organism? It lives in a forest of hair, just like we once lived in a forest of trees as hairy apes... scratching our skin, irritated by fleas biting us. A flea drills into the skin it lives on for its sustenance; just as we drill into the living skin of the Earth for water and oil. Does a flea understand why its world shakes? It flees from the area of shaking, just like we flee from areas where earthquakes are happening.

The point is that all knowledge should be organized organically and understood organically because that is how the entire Universe is organized and structured. The digital machine knowledge of 1 and 0 cannot explain a damned thing because it is not of human origin. Hell, it isn't even of this Universe. 3-dimensional organic living creatures cannot be explained by 2-dimensional 0's and 1's. Dead machines will never become organically aware and they will never become organically intelligent. The point is: we do not need machines to understand the origins of our Universe. We owe it to ourselves to become intelligently enlightened and educated by using our own minds and common sense to make sense of the Universe we live in. Science has abysmally failed all of mankind in its inability to explain the Big Bang. Science has failed to explain and understand its own discoveries for a simple reason; it is not organically logical. Mechanical logic does not work when you try to apply it to living organisms. Mechanical logic cannot explain Organic Life or the Universe. Mechanical logic and mathematics cannot explain where the Universe came from.

One serious problem with Science is that the institutions and sinecures of science have become a hiding place and a breeding ground for mentally and emotionally deficient cripples who are attracted to professions and careers which are not connected to Life and have nothing to do with practical physics and how the Universe actually works. Their irrational theories are of no interest to the rest of the world because they have no basis in actual fact and are of no practical use to anyone. People who make a religion out of logic and then refuse to follow the logic of their own proven facts should not be given any respect; much less any recognition or authority; or a job working in any responsible scientific capacity.

One example of how wrong Science can be is the discovery that stars in other galaxies orbit at higher speeds than here in our solar system. This has produced the false idea that the energy and gravity in our solar system is not the same as the rest of the Universe. It has also produced the false idea that there is more energy in the Universe than we can see and measure with our scientific instruments. It has produced the idea that there is some invisible thing called 'Dark Matter' in the Universe.

These supposed inexplicable anomalies are explained very simply. The fact is; our Earth is situated in the exact center-point of the Infinite Universe, and the entire Infinite Universe is revolving at an incredible speed around us as a single unit. The Infinite Universe is going around as an organic whole: not rotating in any predictable repetitive orbit. The result of the speed of the revolving Universe going around as an organic whole is that all mass and mass/speed ratios are less in the center-point of the Universe than farther away from the center-point of the Universe. The farther away from the center any mass is, the more these dynamics make it seem like they have more mass, energy and speed.

Until Scientists realize that the Infinite universe is rotating and going around as a whole and the Earth is situated in the exact center of the Universe; all of their mass/speed ratio measurements of the Universe will remain invalid. This explanation wipes out the false scientific conjectures of ‘dark energy’ and ‘dark matter’ which try to explain this phenomenon... There is no ‘dark matter’ or ‘dark energy’ in the Infinite Universe. Science just made the mistake of assuming that all mass/speed ratios in the Universe should be homogeneous: they aren’t. Science is not aware that not only are all the galaxies and stars and planets in the Universe going around... but the entire Infinite Universe is also rotating around at an incredible high speed as a whole. Science cannot perceive the Universe going around as a whole simply because when you’re inside something that’s going around as a whole: you can’t tell whether its going around or not because you have no outside perspective, no outside comparison, no outer point of reference.

This is the exact same experience which astronauts have living inside a rotating space station orbiting weightlessly in space. Inside the station, they do not perceive the space station is going around, all they can perceive is the farther out from the center they go, the more they weigh, the heavier they get and the faster things move and fall. This gives the illusion that the farther away from the center of the space station you are, the more mass objects have, and the more energy that mass has. Only if they go outside the space station, or have an outside reference point, can they know for sure whether the station is going around or not. The fact that the Earth is situated in the exact center-point of the Infinite Universe is directly connected to the importance of the newest, most evolved intelligent species on Earth: humans. Humans have a vital role to play in the infinite Universe because we live in the exact center-point of the Infinite Universe. Humans were organically designed to solve the problems of the Earth... and the Universe. We were evolved here on Earth for a specific intelligent purpose: not by any anthropomorphic God, but by the evolutionary creativity of Life Energy evolving into more and more intelligent, aware living organisms over billions of years of creative evolutionary change.

The phenomenon of Organic Life on Earth is the most creative and most organized and most intelligent and most aware form of Energy in the Infinite Universe... This book merely lays the groundwork for a larger expanded understanding of the Earth as the actual center point of the Infinite Universe. First you must know the whole story of the human species before you can fully understand how we humans and the creative intelligence of Organic Life fit into the Organic Universe. This book only covers the history of humans in the context of living on the Organic Living Earth. Before you can understand the greater context of how you fit into the Universe, you must first learn how you fit into the World around you here on Earth and how you fit into yourself. This chapter not only enlightens you about the true origins of our Universe, it makes you smarter than all the Cosmologists and Astro-physicists in the world. The mystery of the origin of the Big Bang has now been solved. Now you can tell everyone you know and explain the Big Bang to them so they can understand it also. The conclusions of this chapter are both mind shattering and logical. The Dynamics which created our Universe also created Life on Earth. Life is not a random accident as Science would have you believe; nor was it created by some anthropomorphic human god: Life actually has a designed purpose; it was created out of natural Organic causal sequences, processes and dynamics which existed long before our Universe was ever created. These Organic Dynamics were responsible for the creation of our Universe. The origin of the Universe is not a religious mystery; neither is it a scientific mystery. The organic structure of our Universe is not a random design.

The structure of the apple is not a random design either: it is an organic design. It wasn't just Einstein who made mistakes and crucial errors of perception and judgment: both Newton and the church had already swindled people into believing that there was such a thing as a mass that is individually sanctified by the common urge to gather together in great numbers and focus inwards upon itself. This graveness of spirit which became known as gravity was wedded to the lowest common understanding of reality, it comes from the ancient Latin word ‘gravitas’, which is the graveness of pride; one of the first and worst original sins of Mankind. These swindles of misperception and evil go all the way back to the first God and the first man. The apple, the forbidden fruit of knowledge was forbidden by god for good reason. God did not want Man to have the wisdom of organic knowledge. He did not want Man to bite into the apple and discover that our Universe was born organically out of a tiny single seed, naturally, just like the apple trees in the Garden of Eden and every other living thing on Earth is born from... not by a magic trick, out of nothing... which is how the Old Testament tries to explain the birth of our Universe.

This book exposes the untold story of our past: what actually happened, how it happened and why it happened... logically, causally analytically and critically. It is only when you understand the full story of the human species, beginning from the start, that it will all make sense. To make sense out of my own Life as a human being, I had to make sense out of the entire history of human beings; beginning from the start. Unless you have the whole story beginning from the start, you cannot make sense out of yourself. Unless you evaluate and compare everything and discover the connections which actually exist and connect all the dots and fill in all the blanks, unless you put things into their proper context, unless you develop a perspective which allows you to see the entire picture as a connected understandable whole, so you understand the story of the human species as a whole; you will never understand yourself as a whole human being and what your designed purpose is here on Earth.

Anyone who doesn’t want to understand himself better as a human being is wasting their time reading this book. To make sense out of being human, you need the whole story; you need to know the whole story of where you came from, and the whole story of where you are now, and the whole story of where you should be going, and the whole story of what direction you are headed in now. To make any sense out of your own life and what it means to be human, you need to put all of your understanding into a connected Organic Whole. This book explains the true meanings of things by tracing and exposing the true origins of the Universe, Life, the Human Species, civilization; and then comparing them, evaluating them, analyzing them, putting them into their proper context and developing a larger perspective; and then coming to rational, logical, understandable conclusions. You cannot understand the true meanings of anything unless you understand its true origins and where it came from and why it happened, when it happened and how it happened. Once you connect most of the missing dots together; then everything falls into place. Then the puzzle of the Meaning of Life; the reason you were put here on this Earth, which is supposed to be such a great mystery becomes obvious to the meanest intelligence.

We as human beings are designed to come IN together: selectively, organically and intelligently. We are designed to come together naturally, in small organic communities of 12, 24 and 36 individuals: not as huge masses, not in huge cities, or in faceless crowds or as mindless mobs, not in stadiums. We must all learn how to create and form our own small communities based upon the mathematical organic logic of how the Universe is structured. Beginning with the coming together of six boys and six girls into a natural, balanced, organic circle of friendship composed of twelve individuals. One reason why civilization and human societies do not work is because they are not organically organized. The first thing you must do is to organize yourselves intelligently as a human society: everything else is of secondary importance. You are designed to live in selective organic groups made up of 12, 24 and 36 individuals. Everything else is secondary to the Moral and Ethical Imperative of creating a social community and a social harmony which is both mathematically and organically logical. If you do this you will not have to read this book any further.

Proof that the Universe is made up of three distinct Dimensions can be found in the structure of your Inner Ear; it has three distinct loops which make up your Organs of Balance. Each loop is oriented 90 degrees to the other two... Without them you would not be able to balance yourself or stand up; you would fall over. The Organic structure of our Inner Ears does not lie: the complexity of our Organic Universe is not 2-dimensional; it is 3-dimensional. This is why all of the abstract 2-dimensional symbols of mathematics cannot and will never be able to explain how our Universe works and where it came from because the mathematical symbol for Infinity;  $\infty$  is missing the 3rd loop of Infinite Depth... You can even see how the 3rd loop of Depth is distinctly separate from the 2 connected loops of Length and Width. This is not a coincidence! The origin of the first 2 dimensions of our Universe are much older than the 3rd dimension; they are older than Time and Depth. The design of your inner ear proves that Time and Depth are one and the same thing.

You can see the design of the infinite spiral which traces the history of our evolving Universe back into the depths of the origins of Time in galaxies; it can also be seen in the spiral design of your Inner Ear. Snails have the same spiral design as your Inner Ear, but they have no sense of balance because they lack the 3rd loop of 3-dimensional awareness; which is why they use a gluey slime to keep themselves from falling off surfaces. The awareness of 3 dimensions is a brand new development in our Universe and should not be dismissed or taken lightly. We humans have developed our 3-dimensional awareness further than any other form of Life for very good logical reasons. This is why every human on Earth can easily develop an Inner Understanding of the True Infinite Nature of the Universe and how it works without any complicated mathematical mumbo-jumbo. The 3rd loop of Infinite Awareness is not missing from the human body; it is not missing from our Human Senses, it is not missing from our brains: it is missing from the models and theories of Science. This is why mathematics will never be able to explain where our Universe came from. This is why all of Science's misguided attempts to understand the Universe using 2-dimensional symbols is a complete hoax and a bunch of crap.

This book and my explanation of where our Universe came from will not be welcomed by millions of people who call themselves scientists. My explanation and my book will not be welcomed by the govt organizations which fund NASA and all of the other ludicrous wastes of tax payer money spent on pointless scientific projects and experiments that are of no use to Mankind. My explanation will not be welcomed by the educational institutions that sanctify and glorify Science and scientists as if it were a religion... Scientists are not wise men who know more than the ordinary citizen does; they know even less than you do and their closed minds will refuse to accept the simple obvious truths which blast their ludicrous models, theories and swindles to pieces. Don't hold your breath expecting Science to admit its mistakes. Don't expect scientists to read this chapter and go;

Eureka! He's explained where our Universe actually came from!

On the contrary, every scientist and every University professor and academic will hate this book because it destroys all the fallacies, swindles and hoaxes which their livelihood depends on. They will hate this book because it destroys the very bedrock which their comfortable, salaried positions of social status and self-importance are based upon. All of them will try to pretend that this book does not exist and that my explanation of How the Universe Emerged does not exist and hope that my book will disappear and go away.... But it will not go away; it has been published on the Internet for free and there are already too many copies of my book uploaded for it to be burned or banned or censored by anyone.

This is why I have made my book free for anyone who wants to know the truth. This is why I will not allow anyone to sell this book for a profit including myself. This is why I am not making one cent of profit from a publishing the results of a lifetime of Curiosity and Wonder about the irrationality of civilization and why many things don't seem to make any sense... when they actually do make perfect sense if you understand the full story of their true origins.

Because this book is free for anyone who wants to read it, it will spread until everyone who has a sense of Pure Wonder about Life and the Universe we live in can read and understand the simple logical organic truths and explanations about the true Nature of our Universe written in this first chapter. This book exposes the hoaxes and swindles of Science and how Science is used for the mass brainwashing of young minds, teaching them how not to think logically, how not to ask intelligent questions, how never to question authority figures, how never to rebel against the system, how never to think for yourself, how not to use your own mind, how not to connect obvious facts and truths organically and correctly place them into the correct context.

Once you have read and understood the organic truth of how the Universe emerged: you will lose all respect for the lies you have been told; you will lose all respect for the liars who call themselves scientists. You will lose all respect for every authority figure that lies to you; whether out of ignorance or corruption. You will be freed of the lies they have tried to sell you, you will be free of the illusions and delusions of abstract symbology; you will see the actual Universe and the World with a new Sense of Pure Wonder and Life will no longer be a meaningless, random event which seems to make no logical sense.

Basic Structural Dynamics of the Universe and Life.

The Triality of the Universe

The Universe consists of three basic Conditions: Energy, Space and Time. The basic Nature of these Conditions is a Dynamic Triality. The Universe is a Dynamic Triality. Everything in it is designed to function as a Triality. The Energy of the Universe is also designed to function as a Dynamic Triality. A Triality of three interrelated, Dynamically Balanced Aspects, or Conditions; playing off each other, in a state of Dynamically Balanced Splitness. In other words: for Energy to function dynamically in 3-dimensional Space: there have to be three energies: not two.

In other words:  $A - c - B$ : is a balanced dynamic of Triality.

Not:  $A - B$

There has to be a third element in-between any Duality for it to balance dynamically as a Triality in our 3-dimensional Universe. Just like you need greased bearings between a rotating wheel and an axle for it to work properly. Just like you need oil between gears for them to work properly. Just like you need a fulcrum set between a lever and what it lifts for it to work properly. What is crucial to understand in our 3-Dimensional Universe is that for anything to work: there has to be a 3rd factor, a balance point between things in order for them to work. It is this 3rd factor: the balance point, which makes all the Dynamics of the Universe a Triality. It is an inseparable aspect of the Universe. You cannot separate the aspect of Dynamic Balance: 'c' from the any Triality. You cannot separate the aspects of Duality: A-B from any Triality. Nor can you separate the aspect of Totality: (A-c-B): from any Triality. All aspects of our 3-dimensional Universe can be described in these three basic ways. A Totality, a Duality and a Triality. Whenever any aspect of the Universe is examined: you will find that it functions in these Three Root Ways.

What can be deduced from these basic principles of how the Universe works: is that it is intrinsically creative, and its evolution is always towards a more dynamic level of Balanced Splitness through creative change. By using the Dynamic of Permutations of certain basic structures: the Universe is continually creating a more Dynamic Balance by the permutation of certain basic structures already in existence.

Another obvious thing about the Universe is that the Dynamic of Permutations grows out of the cyclical nature of its patterns and basic structures. All cyclic patterns are merely a natural outgrowth and evolution of the Dynamics of the Totalities, Dualities and Trialities which are involved in these basic patterns and structures.

These cyclic patterns act as Totalities, but they are also Dualistic and Trialistic in nature... merging into larger cyclic patterns in overlapping series of Totalities... which in turn, becomes a part of other Dualities and Trialities. These patterns act as highways for energy to continually flow-through these cycles. The cyclical patterns may persist generally, but they themselves are also constantly changing; as avenues for energy to flow-through and undergo new experiences, through changes in these cycles.

The Totality of Twelve

Twelve is the smallest Totality inside which both balanced Trialities and balanced Dualities can balance.... as an integral complex dynamic... an interlocked, integrated balance of balances. The number 12: is the smallest number which has all of these interconnected balances balancing each other at the same time.

2-2-2	—	2-2-2:	(3-3)
3-3	—	3-3:	(2-2)
6	—	6	(1-1)
2-2	2-2	2-2	(1-1-1)
4	4	4	(1-1-1)

Notice: 3 of these dynamic balances have Energy in-between them to act as a balancing buffer. 3 of them have Space in-between them to act as a balancing buffer. Even the balance-points are dynamically balanced. Notice: the balancing singularities, pairs and triads also balance each other dynamically. Twelve is the smallest number that can balance a Totality, a Duality and a Triality at the same time on many, many levels, and in many, many ways. All cycles in the Universe are based upon 12, because 12 is the smallest number, which can be balanced dynamically in all three ways: as a Totality, a Duality, and as a Triality. This is because our Universe is 3-dimensional: everything is based upon that fact.

This is why up all the Energy in the Universe is made of 12 basic ingredients: 6 quarks and 6 leptons: a Balanced Duality. This is why when they are broken up they decay into 3 kinds of Neutrinos: a Balanced Triality. This is why a day has 12 hours: balanced by a night that has 12 hours. This is why the moon orbits the Earth 12 times a year. This is why the smallest groupings of subatomic particles exist in units of three and two: like baryons and mesons. This is why mathematical functions and values work best when they are based on the root 12. This is why when life evolved; it evolved into three basic kinds of animals: Sponges, Cnidarians and Flatworms. This is why animals have two pairs of twelve ribs. This is why the spines of mammals contain 24 vertebrae. This is why there are twelve notes on a musical scale.

This is why there are twelve inches in a foot. This is also why in Chinese traditional medicine there are twelve meridians of the human body. With one buffer Meridian in-between the two halved-Totalities of the Body: splitting into the body into a balanced pair of Dualities... with two ears, two eyes, two hands, two arms, two legs, etc. Just like oil in a working engine: this 13th Meridian is needed as a buffer for all the other meridians of the human body to work properly and balance each other dynamically.

Now you know why the magic number of twelve should be the universal root and size of all human communities all over the Earth. How should these groups of twelve be organized? By intelligently having everyone in the community born in the same year, each with their birthday in one of the 12 months of that year; giving a balanced dynamic range of 12 different personalities born in twelve different months and a balanced interaction between all twelve individuals: 6 boys and 6 girls; alternating boy-girl-boy-girl, in a circle of balanced friendship and happiness. Twelve is the missing number in human society which must be recognized as the most important base for all human social bonding and structure. 12, 24 and 36... three communal circles: a Triality of Twelve, joined in mathematical harmony with each other; organized by year and the month they were born. So each group of twelve acts as an independent unit, yet is also part of a larger interconnected Totality of Three.

The entire Universe is harmonically balanced, but it is not balanced perfectly. If it were balanced perfectly then the Earth would change its orientation to the Sun every 24,000 years, not every 23,000 years, then the Earth would rotate around the sun every 360 days: not 365 days, and lunar cycles would be exactly 30 days instead of 29, 30 and 31. For instance, even though their math was not based upon the root of 12, the Mayans considered their calendar year to be 360 days instead of 365. Why? Because they divided their numbers into groups of 20 called 'toons'... not 10, and because they regarded the number 13 and the number 20 as sacred numbers. So...  $13 \times 20 = 360$ . Since harmonically, the number 13 is actually the number 1, it represented the strongest movement of all things to the Mayans. This demonstrates how even though you may have the wrong mathematical system based upon 10 instead of 12; you still end up with a harmonic balance based upon 12 because that is how the Universe is actually structured.

All Energy vibrates through levels of harmonic Totality, Duality and Triality. This is why light has only three primary colors. This is why light possesses the dualistic properties of both waves and particles. This is why the main vibration of any musical note exists as a whole, a half and a third. This is why the totality of a musical octave contains twelve notes. This is why the Earth's Crust has twelve major Tectonic Plates. This is why there are twelve pairs of cranial nerves arising from the base of the human brain. This is why the moon rotates twelve times around the earth for every single time the Earth rotates once around the Sun. This is why Ice Ages happen every 12,000, 24,000, or 36,000 years.

What about the odd numbers? Odd numbers are merely odd fractions of a 12- Totality. They are merely Trialities or Dualities, or Totalities: with an in-between buffer that balances them dynamically: like this:

1-1-1, (3)... 11-1-11, (5)..... Or 111-1-111 (7)... etc, etc.

Fractions inside a Musical note that are odd: 5ths, 7ths, 9ths, 11ths... clash with each other. They sound horrid when played together. We use notes that are in vibrational harmony with each other because they are more pleasing to the ear than dissonant odd-fractions of notes, which do not fit harmonically with each other. What is a harmonic? It is something that fits with everything else around it. It is something that can be divided by everything else around it. It is something that balances with everything else around it. That is why they balance more dynamically with each other. Odd numbers: 5ths, 7ths, 9ths 11ths: do not fit with everything else around them. They cannot be divided by everything else around them. They clash with everything else around them. This is why chords based upon natural thirds and halves and quarters and sixths: are pleasing to the ear and full. While the odd-fraction notes are drowned out by harmonic notes that are natural mesh with each other.

In the same way throughout the Universe: the odd fractions of a Totality do not fit together, and they are not as stable as are Totalities, Dualities and Trialities. They exist as fleeting undertones or overtones of energy inside a 12 Totality. The entire Universe is harmonic. It is harmonically structured. It is designed to function harmonically.

Energy works in overlapping harmonic Totalities, Dualities and Trialities of: 1-2-3- up to 12... Where every 1 is a 2, and a 3 and a 12... and every 2 is a 1, and a 3, and a 12 ... and every 3 is a 1, and a 2, and a 12... and every 12 is a 1, and a 1, and a 3... etc, etc; ad infinitum. The odd fractions like a 5th, 7th, 10th or 11th are not as prevalent because they are not as interconnected to all the other dynamic balances. As a result: they clash with each other and tend to cancel each other out and do not affect the others dynamic balances very much.

Notice:  $1+2$  equals 3

All Totalities of Twelve; are just Trialities which are made up of Dualities and Totalities.

This is how incredibly simple all of the energy structures and dynamics of the Universe actually are.

Everything in the Universe is Connectively Fractionalized, Dynamically Split, Balanced and Harmonized in this manner. If you examine the Universe and look for examples of these Universal relative relationships: you will find them everywhere.

Look at the Carbon Cycle of Life. Why is it so creative? Because the Carbon atom has a weight of 12. It is a 12 gateway atom. It allows other atoms to combine with it naturally because it is a natural Totality. It combines with larger natural totalities and smaller ones simply because of its atomic weight. The magic number 12: can be found in all recurring cycles, as the smallest possible Totality, and the most stable recurring cycle.

Look at how elements are created inside stars. Through a dynamically balanced process of: Fusion and Fission. Neither process can occur without the other. Though this process is by no means a pure example of harmonic balance, due to so many other energy levels and forces overlapping each other; the basic process of Fusion is harmonic. Fusion begins with Hydrogen atoms fusing into Helium atoms; and then both Hydrogen and Helium: fusing into Carbon atoms. The carbon cycle of massive Stars... is even more dynamic than the fission-fusion of Hydrogen and Helium in smaller Stars; because much of their fission-fusion reactions are based not upon Hydrogen; which has an atomic weight of 1, but upon Carbon; which has an atomic weight of 12. This energy creates an even more complex series of thermonuclear reactions than the simpler thermonuclear reactions in smaller stars.

The Hydrogen atom acts basically as a Totality, with only one proton and no dualistically balancing neutron. Helium is basically a dualistically balanced atom with 2 protons and 2 neutrons. Carbon is not only a trialistically balanced atom: 3 protons balanced by 3 neutrons, but it is also a doubly balanced Dualistic atom; with its protons and neutrons balancing also; 6 protons and 6 neutrons. Moreover, the Carbon atom is not only a Totality, a Balanced Duality, and a Balanced Triality; but has a totality of 12 as its atomic weight: which is the gateway to a higher level of molecular combinations. As a result of this, the Carbon atom can structurally combine with more elements because its 12-6-4-3-2-1 makeup: can accommodate almost any element that has one of these harmonic structures.

The formation of larger and heavier elements within the fusion process of Stars makes up the entire periodic table of elements occurring naturally within the Universe. They are the result of further combinations of Atomic Totalities, Dualities and Trialities beginning from the three basic atoms of Hydrogen, Helium and Carbon....

Why does the process of Fission within simple Stars end just short of Iron?

Iron has an atomic weight of 26: not 24.

The atomic weight of 24 or 12-12 obviously should be the totality of the cyclic process for Fission-Fusion occurring within Stars. This apparent mathematical disharmony in how the Universe functions has puzzled Scientists. They expect the Totality of 12, to jump immediately up to 24 without a hitch.

Chapter Two: Life

They do not realize that there might be gateway factors between each 12-Totality. Or any other Totality for that matter. All Totalities have an in-between gateway factors: Whether the Totality is a 3, 6, 9 or 12, etc: There is always a 13th gateway element in-between each 12-Totality.

This in-between factor is the invisible balance point: it is why the process of Fission within Stars ends at 26, and not at 24.

$$12 - 1 - 12 - 1$$

$$13 + 13 = 26.$$

Is a balanced, buffered dynamic balance that is insulated from other dynamic balances because there is an invisible balance point that is imperceptible to scientific instruments. This is why it repeats itself over and over again without changing. It is an unchanging vicious cycle. This is how and why vicious cycles work in the Universe.

This is why the fission-fusion process inside simple stars ends at 26: not at 24. This is why this cycle never stops until its inner dynamics break down. It is insulated from other dynamics outside it. It is not affected by any other energy dynamics outside it.

However, if there is only one 13th element gateway factor in this process of element-building instead of two...then the Atomic Weight of 25 becomes a gateway number for a new series of Totalities-Dualities-Trialities: beginning at 25 and ending at 37 instead of 26.

Depending on whether there is a 13th gateway factor in-between the next 12-Totality series or not; every successive larger totality; can be added up to have either odd or even numbers. This is one major reason why Science sees the structure of the Universe as being random-chaotic. It is not. Science has propagated the idea that the Universe is a random series of events. It has spread the false idea that energy interacts randomly: without any understandably logical basis. Science has created the false idea that the Universe is randomly meaningless in how it works. This idea is not only a myth: it is a lie. All energy; every atom: functions according to the logical dynamic Principles of the simplest mathematical structures possible. All energy dynamics can be reduced down to the simple, easily understandable dynamics of 1-2-3-12.

The same dynamic can and does happen at the Atomic Weight of 13... which is why in many other chemical processes: the next 12-Totality is actually counted from 14, to 26; not from 12 to 24... with the next 12-totality starting from 28 to 40... Not from 24 to 36. Because the 13th factor is a buffer in-between two dynamically balanced totalities.

If there is a 13th gateway totality in-between each totality of 12... then you will get a series that looks like a bunch of inexplicable odd numbers. Add up a bunch of 13's, and what do you get? A series that looks completely random: 13-26-39-52-65-78-91... But it is not random. It is completely logical and understandable, that is: if you can find where the invisible balance points are.

If there are any Totalities involved that are Totalities of 3, or 6, or 9 instead of 12... then the sequences will seem to hop around so inexplicably; as to seem to have no rhyme or reason. But if you can identify the in-between balance points correctly: it will make perfect harmonic mathematical sense.

In-between gateway factors, or balance points; are the structural reason why the Universe is not perfectly harmonically structured as a simple 1-2-3-12 sequence. Science does not understand the harmonic structures of the Universe because it does not correctly identify the (1) buffers between (12) Totalities. It also does not correctly identify the (12) Totalities themselves.

The Universe is not perfect. The entire Universe is flawed... Literally. Because these 13th gateway atomic weights in-between 12 Totalities are used as buffer zones. And these buffers are not predictable. Sometimes they are there, and sometimes they are not.

Why are they there at all?...

They are there because:

No Totality wants to touch another Totality

Totalities do not want to deal with other Totalities that are equal to it.

Smaller Totalities do not want to be dominated by larger Totalities.

Smaller Totalities do not want to be sublimated into larger more complex Totalities.

This is why the inner core of stars does not take part in the rest of the dynamic energy of the star. Its dynamics remain unchanged; regardless of what happens outside of it. The atomic weight 25 acts as a buffer zone between the atomic weights of 24 and 26.

This is why Stars have inner cores that for most of their life span: are not affected by what happens to the rest of the star. This is why cooling Stars end up as dead lumps of heavy metals: whose atomic weights begin either at 26, 38 or 50. Because the gateway 13th atomic weight keeps each 12, or 24, or 36, or 48 cyclic process in a vicious cycle that endlessly repeats itself.

Only by exploding apart, or by intense compression; does the inner core of any star change its basic make-up. Those changes are destructive: destroying the atomic structures of the heavier atomic elements: which must then once again go through the entire process of star formation from the beginning: to create larger atoms all over again.

Because these 13th factors act as buffer zones: the Entire Universe has become frozen into certain vicious cycles, which constantly repeat themselves. The only kind of changes that ever happen in our Universe; are merely Permutations of the same basic vicious cycles.

But these vicious cycles never duplicate themselves identically. They only go through infinite progressions of permutations of different infinite possibilities and infinite probabilities. Science calls some of these vicious cycles: General Principles... and has hoisted them above the one law of Relative Equality which actually governs the dynamics of the entire Universe... Simply because these general principles repeat themselves over and over generally... and can be easily recognized as being generally the same.

But the Principle of Dynamic Balance is so Universal, and permeates all other Dynamics, and is the underpinning of all other Dynamics in the Universe: that it is taken for granted. It is an Unspoken Principle of Science. It is an Unspoken Assumption. It is an Assumed Principle of Science. Just as we take the air we breathe for granted: Science takes the Principle of Dynamic Balance for granted. When it is far more important than all its other Principles and Dynamics put together.

You can see this idea of everything being connected to everything else based on the Totality of 12, in the TV series called: Star Gate. The series has a machine that is round and has 12 numbers around an opening and closing orifice that can be adjusted to connect to any point in space in the entire universe to any other by simply turning the huge, round dial.

The Human Subconscious knows that Twelve is the last number you ever need to learn that is important. After Twelve: comes a repetition of 'Teens'... based on the root of ten, not twelve. What is Twelve? It is the combined Totality of your Selves as a whole. It is the Truth of your Whole Self as a unified Totality. It is the Totality made up of Twelve Selves. It is the Totality of the Twelve major organs of your body. It is the Totality of the Twelve minor organs of your body, it is the Totality of the twelve major nerve groups leading into your cranium... your twelve ribs, etc.... all put together... all totaled up, added up, connected up into a single Totality which is you.

Science

The Dynamic-Principle-Law of Dynamic Balance: balances everything to everything else: relatively. It creates Relative Equalities that Science takes for granted. Besides: most Relative Equalities: are always changing so dynamically, and so subtly, and so fast... that they cannot be measured by Science in the first place. So Science does not even try to measure them. But the Dynamic of Relative Equality: determines and governs the exact outcome of every new permutation and possibility in the Universe. Not the dynamic of vicious cycles. Every vicious cycle is ultimately destroyed. Over and over. Only to be re-created again in a different permutation which is more dynamically balanced. The Law of Relative Equality on the other hand is never destroyed, and never has to be recreated. It simply is: it is the only unchanging norm of the Universe which is never noticed because it is everywhere, all the time, and never goes away.

Rather than draw attention to a single law that is much more important than any of the general principles of repeating vicious cycles... Science has sanctified vicious cycles that generally do not seem to change: and turned them into Laws that are not actually universal.

Science does not dare print and explain the scientific truth of Dynamic Equality. Why? Because if Science explained that the Universe functions by the single Universal Principle of Dynamic Equality. Then it would have to categorize all its specific, specialized Laws as being only minor examples of this one all-encompassing Universal Law. If it explained that Principle of Dynamic Equality is so dynamic and so complex, and so interconnected to everything: that it can never be accurately scientifically measured because it includes too many factors whose actual dynamic relationships are too complex to ever completely fathom...

Then what is scientific measurement good for?

Except for measuring things that are taken out-of-context, and drawing mistaken conclusions from interpreting specialized data out-of-context. Which is exactly what Science does. Except to only measure what is predictable. The idea of measuring things that are predictable vicious cycles. If you already know what is going to happen: then why the hell are you measuring it in the first place? Just to see a slight change in permutations? Watch the trees turn color in the fall. Every year, each tree turns a different color. Every single leaf turns a different color... so what? You want to pick up all the leaves and notice how every one is a different color? After wasting your life doing this: what have you learned? Anything useful?

If you already know that what you are measuring is only one limited, small, bunch of factors... and you already know that you are not measuring countless other factors that are connected-to, and influence what you are measuring... then what the hell are your measurements good for anyways?

Science does not want to admit or notice this trite truth. Science does not want to admit that only connective facts are relevant. A fact that connects billions of other facts into an understandable structure is far more important than all the trillions of unconnected facts science has accumulated which are not connected to any other facts. Science ignores this truth. Instead: Science is obsessed with collecting unconnected facts. Science is not interested in connecting facts. Science is only interested in collecting them and accumulating these unconnected facts. This is one basic reason why most of Science is of no practical use to mankind whatsoever.

Oops. Let's not talk about that right now...

Science uses certain 12th's or 13th's as universal constants... simply because they do not seem to change, while everything inside and around these 12th's and 13th's... are constantly changing. That is like using oil as a constant because it keeps your engine running smoothly. It is not a constant. It is just constantly there. When it is not there: things go haywire, and you notice that this so-called constant is missing.

When you split a musical note in half on a stringed instrument: the harmonic note called an octave is not apparently buffered. But it is buffered by a balance point. Not by anything in the string. Not by anything in the sound waves. It is your finger that acts as the buffer between the two half-notes. If your finger was not there: you would not hear the two higher half-notes. All harmonic notes can only be sounded if there is the buffer of your finger to separate one wavelength from another. All stringed instruments with frets use metal bars as buffers to separate one particular wavelength from the rest of the wavelengths on the string. On fretless stringed instruments: it is your fingers that act as a fret.

You can find this buffer-harmonic-invisible balance point in-between 6ths, 3rds, and ½'s on a stringed musical instrument by simply touching the string at the right point. A 6th is half of a 12 Totality, and a 3rd is half of a 6th Totality... they are all trying not to touch each other. In this way: literally all of the Energy in the Universe is buffered, and kept separate. In this way: all harmonic wavelengths try not to touch each other. They actively avoid touching each other.. This is why thousands of different wavelengths of energy in the form of radiation can pass through each other in the air instead of colliding with each other.

The Principle of Dynamic Balance. (A-c-B) can be demonstrated on any fretted musical instrument. Your finger on a fret of a stringed instrument physically demonstrates and proves how all energy works in the Universe. All Energy in the Universe is trying to balance itself harmonically by the use of buffers. If there are no buffers: then smaller totalities are absorbed into larger totalities. Then you cannot hear the ½ note. Or the 1/3rd note. Or the ¼ note, or the 1/6th note of an open string: because all these smaller totalities are sublimated into, and dominated by the larger totality of the entire open string sounding itself as a single whole: and not different, smaller, weaker, separated harmonic waves. Simply because there are no buffers, no fingers, no gateway in-between factors that could and can instantly create new harmonics, new dynamics of energy if they were there.

This is also how DNA molecules work. This is why whenever a DNA duplicates itself, it automatically separates. Whenever there is a conflict that becomes too intense between two 12-Totalities of DNA structures that are too close to each other without any buffers, they go away from each other to escape conflict. Whenever a new gene is introduced: the entire Gene changes its Energy level. By using a gateway gene, it creates a buffer-zone, a harmonic gene that vibrates and controls all of the other totalities within its specific Gene Totality to skip onto a new energy level: just like touching a string with your finger somewhere on a string creates a new harmonic note.

Science calls the genes which create these skips: gateway genes... because they creatively open up an entire new level of harmonic adaptive changes that somehow seem to be able to spark even more gateway-skips of other genes harmonically... Actually: this dynamic is only the natural harmonics of 12-Totalities, or 48 Totalities, or a 36-Totality... re-structuring itself by the dynamic balance of its 13th, or 25th, or 37th, or 49th in-between buffer-zone totality-of-one; being used by the totalities to avoid touching each other. Because DNA molecules do not want to touch each other directly: they have created two basic tactics of avoidance: these two tactics are:

Instinct and Evolution

Evolution: is merely a genetic set of vicious cycles which allows the same species, the same DNA sequences... to be re-created over and over again.... with only slightly different permutations of the same basic DNA structure.

This re-creation of the same basic species, the same basic DNA patterns: creates within each living organism: a set of basic behavior patterns with only slightly different permutations: are called instincts. The Instincts of each species are basically the same because the DNA structures and patterns of each species are basically the same. Instincts are a way of preserving a species: by changing its basic behavior as little as possible. Evolution is also a way of preserving a species: by changing its basic genetic design as little as possible.

How?

By inventing countless different permutations of the same basic behavior instead of changing the basic behavior itself. By avoiding learning anything new. By avoiding doing anything new, by avoiding acting or reacting in a new way. By avoiding experience. By avoiding learning. By avoiding learning from experience. By avoiding experiencing experience. By avoiding experiences. Instinct and evolution are the two basic ways which Life-energy has avoided experiencing itself. Why? Because ever since the Universe first came into being: the energy in it exploded apart into infinitely small particles that have avoided each other as much as possible.

It may sound strange, but the vicious cycles of the Universe actually do function very much like the mechanical workings of a clock, touching each other as little as possible. One large wheel is connected to many other smaller wheels: all rotating at different speeds, performing different functions... all trying to touch each other as little as possible. With the lubricating invisible oil of 13th, or 25th, or 49th balance-point factors that act as hidden, unseen buffers, or oil, or bearings... that lie hidden in-between the infinitely complex dynamics.

Instead of evolving and changing on basic levels as it should: the Universe only changes superficially: through the most superficial permutations of unchanging basic, vicious cycles. The basic vicious cycles themselves never change. Each 12, or 14, or 36, or 48 cycle remains basically unchanged as a dynamic process of buffered Totalities interact with each other as little as possible. This is why the permutations of the designs of snowflakes are infinite: but their basic hexagonal structure never changes. The basic unchanging structure is evidence of a vicious cycle. The permutations of the design operate by the avoidance of energy from experiencing that structure. If snowflakes experienced their hexagonal structures completely: they would never form themselves into hexagonal snowflakes again. The second time they froze inside a cloud: their molecular structure would be completely different. This would force weather systems to change their dynamics also. This would force other cycles to change also. This has not yet happened because energy avoids experiencing itself. By the dynamics of vicious cycles never repeating themselves exactly the same way ever.

Energy Totalities in energy cycles may, or may not have a 1, or a 7th or a 13th or a 26th, gateway buffer in-between them. And what's more... these gateway buffer zones may allow entire parcels, and bunches of 3's, 4's, 6'th's 12's, 24's, 48's to slip in-between other energy cycles as complete packages of vicious cycles. This is why the Universe is not mathematically harmonious.

It is almost impossible to identify and locate where all of these hidden 13th factors are. But they do exist. They exist as fingers on a musical string. Separating one set of energy from another. These fingers exist on different levels of energy, and act in different ways. Some are invisible, some are visible. Some are measurable; some are not measurable.

Why the Universe is beautiful.... Why Nature is beautiful... Is because all of the progressions and permutations of energy, all of the permutations of DNA are harmonically structured and designed on the mathematical relationship of 1-2-3-12. It is beautiful because all of the supposedly random atoms and molecules and DNA, and chemical and atomic and physical reactions and actions are not random at all, but are mathematically structured in a way that harmonizes with everything else in the Universe. Nature is beautiful because everything in Nature harmonizes with everything else in Nature mathematically. Because all of it is structured on the mathematical relationship of natural organic fractions... that happen to be mathematically logical, and designed to function mechanically also.

You could say that the Beauty of Nature and the Universe is a random design of certain basic structures that are designed to harmonize with each other. But the apparent randomness is only a symptom of its imperfection: not its overall harmonic design. For instance: if you tune a lute harmonically so that all the strings are in harmony with each other; based upon the mathematical harmony of thirds, halves, sixths, and twelve's... Then no matter how randomly you put your fingers on it: most of what you create will be music that harmonizes with itself.... With a few dissonances to make it interestingly different-unique-creative. Another example is the steel guitar. It is tuned harmonically. You can slide an iron bar anywhere: and it will still sound beautifully harmonic, all of the strings will still be in harmony with each other.

If you could correctly identify exactly how and why the fractional splits of the Universe are arranged and structured and where the invisible balance points are; then you could explain and understand everything in it. By using the base root of 12-1 as the functioning model of all energy in the Universe; you will not need any irrational numbers, or random numbers, or imaginary numbers to explain and understand the Universe. Then all of the mechanical functions of the Universe will be mathematically reduced into simple 12th's, 8ths, 6ths, 4ths, 3rd's, half's, and 1's... called simple fractions. If you do this: you will have to throw out all complex mathematics and every complex mathematical model and idea ever invented; as being completely out of date, obsolete and useless.

Why? Because our system of mathematics is obsolete: it is based upon the base root of 1-10... not on the root of 1-12. This is the reason why literally all scientific measurements that try to be exact: end up in insane decimal fractions that never end, and cannot be simplified. This is why the value of Pi is an endlessly repeated decimal fraction of a vicious cycle. If you used 1-12 as your root: the value of Pi automatically becomes a simple fraction. The Universe cannot be accurately measured by our ten-base system of mathematics. It can only be accurately measured: fractionally and relatively: by using 1-2-3-12: as the base root of all structures of Energy. Or: A-c-B four times: A-c-B D-f-E G-i-H J-l-K. But you need to look for the correct hidden in-between buffers.

If you use the proper mathematical model of 12 as a Totality: you will become able to detect the hidden buffers: simply by noticing when and where the natural 1-12 structure is interrupted and dynamically balanced by that buffer. All the inexplicable mysteries of the Universe can be solved and understood if we look at how the Universe actually works logically, and do not stick to the mistaken perception of having 10 appendages on our two hands when we actually have twelve.

Humans created the 10-root decimal system of mathematics because we have 5 digits on each of our two hands... which adds up to the number 10. This assumption is a simply case of misperception. We actually have six extremities on each hand, not five. We take the 6th one for granted and don't count it. The sixth extremity of our hand is our forearm... which is right in front of our nose, and taken for granted, and not included. The physical structure of our hands proves that the Universe is harmonically structured and based upon the mathematical model of 1-2-3-6-12: not 10. We have just have not noticed this because it is so obvious we ignore it.

If you use a mathematical model based upon the base root of 12, you will only need one week to teach every human on Earth a mathematical system that is universally useful and applicable. And fire every mathematician alive, and close down all of the mathematical Departments in all the Universities, and throw out all scientific data that has been collected, measured and stored in the old obsolete way: and re-measure everything using a 12-root base instead of a 10-root base. This should have been done ages ago.

As long as you use the model: 12-1-12 properly in each context of whatever you are measuring. Then all you have to do is understand the basic Universal Law of Dynamic Balance... and search for the balance point, and you will not have to go to school ever again to understand anything scientifically. Then you can close down all of the Universities and all the Schools. Since they are all obsolete, and do not teach the actual truth, or how the Universe actually works. And open up new schools that teach the actual truth about how the Universe actually works.

What is the most highly balanced dynamic in sports? Two equal, opposing teams with an object in-between, which they vie for. What is the dynamic of electricity? Electrons caught in-between two different potentials, trying to balance out these two uneven potentials. The only reason electricity exists is because the moving electrons are trying to balance themselves equally between two imbalanced potentials. The only reason electricity exists is because the moving electrons are trying to balance themselves dynamically between two imbalanced potentials.

The Universal Law of Dynamic Balance governs them. All the other laws of Electricity are window-dressings compared to this Universal Law. The sustained orbiting of planets; is a result of gravitational attractions naturally finding and sustaining a Dynamic Balance that is constantly equalizing itself. The Universal Law of Dynamic Balance is the reason we do not have to worry about the Earth suddenly crashing into the Sun. The orbits of all stars, planets and galaxies work in predictable vicious cycles without ever slowing down because they have the best oil in-between them to insulate them from each other: Space. Space is used as the 13th in-between buffer in countless energy dynamics. But Science does not recognize this 13th factor of Space as being relevant to the dynamics it studies. It should.

Throughout the Universe, the one universal tendency of all things-forces-energies is to seek, find and maintain a Dynamic Balance and Condition of equality. In fact, I will go even further than that: everything in the Universe is designed to actively seek the highest possible Dynamic of Balanced Equality.

What makes any Balanced Dynamic more dynamic; is when it is more equal. When that Duality is not only evenly balanced... but also more finely balanced. So: when two equally balanced factors are on either side of a third factor, then the finer the balance, the more reactive, the more equal; the third factor can be to its environment. The more sensitively it can experience its environment: the more it can evolve to a higher level of Dynamic Balance. All evolution is merely Energy seeking a higher level of Dynamic Balance. All evolution is merely living things seeking a higher level of equality. Even the simplest Totality of 3 can have a gateway-level inside it, as an intrinsic part of its own Totality...

Anything that becomes more equally balanced... also becomes more dynamic.

Anything that becomes more dynamic... also becomes more equally balanced.

How and Why Life Emerged

The basic scientific reason why Life happened on Earth is Positive feedback. Positive feedback happens for a very simple reason... All Energy is Positive. This is the most crucial thing you need to understand about the Universe. Nearly all of the Energy in the entire Universe is Positive. If all the Energy in the Universe were not Positive then Life could never have happened; period. Negative Energy is an anomaly in our Universe; it is the exception to the rule.

The positional reason why Life emerged on the surface of the Earth was because of the Positive feedback of its Energy and its position in-between two Dynamically Balanced Positive Energies: the molten core of the planet Earth, and the energy radiating from our Sun. The arena where these two energies met and merged on the surface of our planet became dynamically balanced to such a delicate degree, that in-between these two energy sources; all sorts of new, more dynamically balanced processes could be created that are even more delicately balanced. The more delicate something is: the more delicious and delightful it is. The more it has fun enjoying the dance of Life's infinite harmonies and permutations.

The energy level between these two balancing energy sources was just the right level of energy needed for water to exist in all three physical states: gas, liquid and a solid; with the bulk of it existing in an in-between state called liquid; balanced in-between the gaseous and solid states of water. This new level of this more dynamic balance allowed the surface of the planet to be made up mostly of liquid water.

Liquid Water is capable of combining with more different elements than any other known substance. It became a new inclusive highway of energy-flow that was used by other substances-energies to combine-mingle with each other and in doing so; change the dynamic balance of their energy... to such a subtle, highly balanced state, that chemical processes could become dynamically active on the diluted level of parts-per-million in the liquid medium of water.

In order to make water; the pair of Hydrogen atoms cannot not do it alone: they need a buffer between them to work properly: Oxygen is the buffer. The water molecule: H-O-H contains the simplest, the earliest formed, most dualistically balanced pair of atoms: Hydrogen, or  $H_2$ . And between this balanced pair of hydrogen atoms is the oxygen atom with its own unique characteristics to make the Triality of this sensitive, yet stable, and very, very delicately balanced molecule. This gives you a Totality, a Duality and a Triality all in one molecule.

What created Life was:

1. The oxygen atom balanced between two hydrogen atoms.
2. The water molecule as a liquid, balanced between the solid and gaseous state.
- 3: The liquid Medium of Water on the Earth's surface balanced between two energy sources of the Sun and the Earth's Core.

These are the basic mathematical, structural dynamic reasons why on the surface of our planet, the Condition of Dynamic Balance was raised to such an extremely sensitive degree: allowing the processes needed for the creation of Organic Life to occur. The dynamically balanced condition of  $H_2O$  literally took over the entire surface of the Earth in three conditions: as a gas, a liquid and a solid. As a Dynamically Balanced Triality of Conditions and a Dynamically Balanced Medium for other Energy to pass through it, in it and around it. As time went on, both the land and the atmosphere that were created from the in-between buffer condition of water as a liquid became permeated with this medium... enabling more Energies and Energy-forms to flow in more complex, subtle dynamically balanced inter-minglings. Until this loose all-encompassing energy-flow system became the condition of the Earth's surface; where more energies could meet-mix-join-connect to each other through the incredible medium of this highly dynamically balanced substance. In this primordial soup of dissolved-diluted elements and substances, the basic condition of that soup was one of super-sensitized Dynamically Balanced Energy.

Life was created because of the Dynamic of Positive Feedback which exists whenever Positive Energies comes into close contact with each other. The more dynamic Energy becomes, the more sensitive it becomes. The more sensitive it becomes; the more dynamic it becomes. That is Positive feedback.

Life began because of :

1. The Triality of the oxygen atom balanced in-between two hydrogen atoms.
2. The Triality of liquid water molecules balanced in-between the solid and gaseous state.
- 3: The Triality of the Earth's surface (Gaseous, Liquid, Solid) balanced in-between two energy sources: the Sun and the Earth's Core.

Thus giving you the super-dynamic balance of a Triality-within a Triality-within a Triality... resulting in a Dynamic Balance of Balances. Each Dynamic Balance exponentially raises the sensitivity of the entire dynamic to a higher level by creating a more dynamically balanced environment inside which an even more delicately balanced Condition of Energy can exist.

Except for our bones; our bodies and brains are made of more than 75% water. All living organisms on this planet, all living species that ever existed and went extinct are merely more highly evolved forms of water; with a bit of all the other elements mixed in, to make the water more inclusive, and more dynamically balanced. All water is doing by creating Living things, is creating the highest dynamic balance possible in such a way that virtually every other level of Energy, everything, be it gaseous, liquid or a solid, can be included in this highest of all possible dynamic balances and share the same experiences along with the experiences of water. Water is the purest sharing substance in the Universe. It shares itself by including every other Element within it. It is the closest thing to a universally inclusive substance. It can be mixed with almost anything. Not only that: it includes everything within it in proper relative-proportional amounts. It includes hydrogen as the huge majority, and mercury as a tiny minority. Because there is proportionally a million times less Mercury in the Universe than there is hydrogen, so too there is a million times less Mercury dissolved in water than Hydrogen.

The reason Life came out of the oceans and began spreading out on dry land is very simple: It was a more dynamically efficient use of the medium of water as a form of Life Energy. Instead of raising the Experiential Dynamic Balance of other Energies by dissolving them slightly as parts-per-million in trillions of tons of water. Water found a more efficient way of processing all other Energies through it; by reversing its original process. Instead of these Energies being dissolved in water, instead of these living organisms living in water... The living organisms were taken out of the water... So the water of Life was inside them: not outside them. They became miniature oceans of water that could do the same job the huge oceans could do... only better, more diversely, more creatively, and more economically... using much less water.

Life never created itself. Nor did a God ever create it. Life was created by the medium of liquid water existing as the most delicately balanced condition of Energy in the exact center of the Universe.

One fact is very important to understand: the in-between condition of  $H_2O$  as a liquid does not exist anywhere else in the Universe except here on the surface of the Earth. I know this fact is stunning, but it is true. Science has never bothered to notice this fact.

Science has never bothered to even look for the existence of  $H_2O$  as a liquid in the Universe. Science has never correctly recognized the uniqueness and importance of the condition of  $H_2O$  as a liquid as the most dynamically balanced medium in the Universe. But this is the actual scientific reason why organic Life exists at all. This is the actual scientific reason why organic Life can only be found on the surface of the Earth and nowhere else. Until Scientists can find water existing as a liquid anywhere else but on Earth; they are wasting their time and money, their lives and our tax dollars searching for something that doesn't exist. This fact alone makes all scientific exploration into the Universe searching for some other kind of life not only pointless, but a total hoax and a farce.

The point is; Organic Life was created inside the Condition of water as a liquid. Not inside water as a solid or as a gas. It was created from the in-between condition of water as a liquid: not as ice, not as air, in fact the Condition of Energy as a Liquid does not exist anywhere else in the Universe except on our planet. Life was created because the in-between condition of water as a liquid; can allow more kinds of Energy to dissolve into it, and dissolve into more other Energies more dynamically than any other medium in the Universe, and can balance them more dynamically than any other condition of Energy in the Universe. In doing so the Universe found a very nice way of dynamically balancing itself even better. Water as a liquid is not only the Medium of all Organic Life, it is a Condition of all Organic Life, it is the source of all Organic Life; it is the origin of Organic Life. .

However, water is not the only thing that is creative in the Universe. Everything else in the Universe is also creative. Water as a liquid just happens to be one of the most delicately balanced dynamic elements in the Universe. Why? Because as a formless fluid it has unique properties. A fluid is an in-between form of energy. Fluid Conditions exist in-between the Conditions of Gases and Solids. Water as a liquid just happens to be one of the most delicate, dynamically balanced substances in the Universe and so naturally, it is one of the most creative substances.

The Dynamically Balanced Condition of water as a liquid medium allowed other forms of Energy inside this formless liquid Medium of water to become even more Dynamically Balanced and create new forms of Energy. By the Impetus of Energy working through the Formlessness of the Medium of liquid water, it creatively found a way of delicately balancing other molecules in it even more dynamically by creating an almost perfectly balanced, paired-row of self-bonding and un-bonding molecules called: D.N.A. This new Structural Form of Energy then went about creating other new Forms by making Connections... creating new connections, making new friends, creating new bonds, new communities.

DNA is made up of hydrocarbon molecules: the material of all Organic Life is made of hydrocarbon molecules. Not surprisingly, Hydrogen and Carbon are the two most combinable, inclusive Elements in the Universe. Why? Because the atomic weight of Hydrogen is One and the atomic weight of Carbon is Twelve.... 1-12, get it? A mathematical organic Totality based upon Organic Mathematical Logic. Within this one-twelve mathematical model, beginning with the first atom created by the Universe and the twelfth atom created; all the rest of the atoms and all the Energy of the Universe is designed to combine with it mathematically and organically. The creation of Life as a hydrocarbon is mathematically logical; it was not a random event. The Universe is mathematically logical! It is not a random event! The design of Organic Life is mathematically logical. Life is not a fucking inexplicable mystery, it is not an exception; it is not an anomaly; it is an explainable understandable logical phenomenon which can be explained scientifically and mathematically!

The first paired-balanced-bonded DNA molecules were probably only a few in number... finding more and more combinations of the four basic units to join next-to in paired unison... growing longer as time went on. Each side of this incredible chain of delicately balanced molecules matched the other side exactly in a near-perfect dualistic dynamic balance. This incredibly delicate balance of paired molecules found a way of spreading and disseminating itself throughout the Dynamically Balanced medium of liquid water. Each side of the paired row of molecules found other molecules to match with and bond-to on the other side until there were 4 chains of bonded DNA molecules instead of 2.... Thus doubling itself in size and number exponentially; this is what we call 'growth': connecting molecules of air, water, minerals together, creating friendly bonds between atoms and molecules where previously none had existed.

Only when all four of them are all perfectly matched and balanced, do the two original chains of paired molecules separate from their originally paired connections to each other and go off on their own. So: one paired row became a double-paired row, and then this double-paired row splits only after their connections to the new row of outer-paired molecules are completed.

It is the order of this process that is crucial.

Connection always happens first:

Separation always happens second.

In other words: Hydrocarbon DNA molecules create mathematically logical Connections because they are based on the Organically Organized Logic of 1-12. Living DNA creates more and more Life because it organizes Atoms and Molecules Logically; including more and more atoms and molecules into its organized logical structures. This is why minerals in the soil are turned into plants, this is why the oxygen atoms in the air become part of our bodies. This why photosynthesis turns light into chlorophyll. This is why complex eco-systems exist.

Why is this important to understand? Because during the 1st half of our Universe's existence: the Separation of Energy happened First, and the Connection of Energy happened Second... Now!... Connection is happening First and Separation is happening Second because the Universe is coming IN not going OUT. In other words, all the Energy in the entire Infinite Universe has reversed all of its Dynamics from Separation to Connection, from Destruction to Construction, from Decomposition to Composition and Re-composition because the Universe is now coming In instead of going Out. This in itself is an astounding turnabout and needs to be fully studied and explored and digested because everything that is happening now in the Universe is based upon this important crucial fact which Science ignores. This is the Causal Order by which the Entire Universe works now. Why? Because this was the original Causal Order by which the 2-D Universe was originally formed. A Duality always originates from a Connected Totality. In this 2nd half of our Universe's existence, where Energy is coming together again: the Dynamic of Connection not only existed before Separation, but new connections are now constantly being created. This is why Life is so much Fun when you make new Friends. This process always goes in the same Causal Order. There are no exceptions to this. Connection always happens first: Separation always happens second.

The chemical makeup of DNA is an example of increasingly dynamic, sensitized, Balanced Connectedness. Hydrogen was the first atomic element that was formed: as a result: it is the most abundant, and occurs most naturally as a pair of dynamically balanced atoms: H<sub>2</sub>... Connection happened first: separation happened later. Carbon is the most purely Trialistic in its bonding structure. Carbon molecules are capable of forming single, double and triple bonds. In fact, the covalent bonds of hydrocarbons are so evenly balanced; that their make-up is considered to be non-polar. For instance: a Hydrocarbon molecule balanced between two amino acids: is a protein: which gives you yet another higher, more dynamically balanced level of molecular interaction ... another level of Triality on top of the other Trialities, and so on, and so on... larger organized structures balanced more and more dynamically with more and more complex connections and interconnections created.

The alpha-helix structure of proteins is yet another, higher level of Dynamic Balance; these are so complex that the ensuing structures and bonds created can only be fully appreciated and understood by using three-dimensional models. The higher level of enzymes reacting chemically as catalysts; demonstrates the obvious dynamic of Connection happening before Separation.

Merely to study and note the causal sequence by which all these molecules inter-act... the countless number and kinds of Dualities within Trialities... Trialities within Dualities... Totalities within Dualities... Dualities within Totalities... Trialities within Totalities... Totalities within Trialities, is fascinating. These chemical-organic building blocks of Life are a history of the Evolution of Totalities, Dualities and Trialities continuing to produce ever-higher, more sensitized levels of Dynamically Balanced Splitness. DNA molecules splitting, living cells splitting: it is all the same dynamic of Splitness. The most highly dynamic, dualistically paired atoms of Hydrogen combining with the most highly dynamic, Trialistic atom of Carbon, within the already highly dynamic medium of liquid water: gave rise to the phenomenon of paired DNA molecules, or Life. What is most crucial in all this is how dynamically balanced it is. The level of increasing Dynamic Balance affects everything: everywhere: in all ways and on all levels.

Dynamic Balance is crucial in the health of all living organisms. Imbalanced organic molecules missing an electron create disease. These electrons are called free radicals. The more free radicals an organism has, the sicker it gets. The research done on free radicals clearly shows that a major cause of all disease and aging is due to the damaging effect of imbalanced molecules inside and outside living cells.

The process by which all Life was and is formed, the processes by which it regenerates itself: from cloning to mitosis-sex: it is all a process of Dynamically Balanced Connectedness. Scientists are trying to duplicate this process in laboratories, using the same basic ingredients that existed billions of years ago. To expect their tiny quantities to undergo the same number and kinds of chemical interactions and molecular bondings as all the oceans of the world did 4 ½ billion years ago; is mathematically ridiculous. Nor can they reproduce the volcanic upheavals of a cooling, molten planet, or duplicate the particular kinds of radiation being absorbed by an Earth without an atmosphere to filter out certain wavelengths, or any other factors that were crucial to the creation of Life over 4 billion years ago. The idea of trying to recreate any event that happened 4 billion years ago is a ridiculous waste of time simply because it cannot be done. The Universe never repeats itself identically.

In the beginning; our Earth was a chemical laboratory in which trace amounts of dissolved elements and minerals; performed a near-infinite number of unique bonding and un-bonding experiments in liquid water. These permutations can never be duplicated again and will never be duplicated again. The idea of scientists duplicating the exact permutations of these dissolved elements and chemicals in water: and expecting to duplicate the one permutation which created living DNA in a laboratory is as silly as scientists trying to duplicate a snowflake found in Nature, in a laboratory, and expecting to succeed. No snowflake ever created will ever be created again as an identical duplicate of any snowflake that was already created. Nothing in the Universe can be duplicated identically.

All Experience, including the Experience of every molecule; is unique and can never be duplicated. This is another simple organic reason why Science will never be able to create Life in a laboratory test-tube.

Today, we know that all radioactive radiation causes mutations in living organisms. This is because of the Energy itself evolving through experience-exposure to other Energy on a level even more basic than organic evolution. In fact: organic evolution is based upon Energy evolution. In this case: radioactive mutation. What kind of radioactive radiation did the planet absorb from the Sun, back when Life was being created? How much did it absorb? What was the crucial right amount for this chemical soup to produce Life? We do not know. All we know is that it created Life. What kind of energy it was is unknown. But one thing is certain: life was only created when the energy of the sunlight coming from the Sun, and the energy of the minerals dissolved in water in the oceans of the Earth, and the energy of the water itself heated by the Earth's core: when they had radioactively aged and mutated to a specific atomic weight that only existed 4½ billion years ago... and will never exist again.

Atomic decay and radioactive mutation are basically the same dynamic. The Energy of the entire Universe is aging. Every atom, every electron, the subatomic particles inside every form of energy is getting older. The atomic weight of every atom is continually changing. They cannot change back to their former atomic weight. It is a one-way process. Scientists are foolishly expecting that energy particles today; can recreate what energy particles did 4 billion years ago when they were 4 billion years younger. Try doing what you once did 40 years ago and see if you can do it. The entire idea of trying to go back in time to recreate past events; is one of the most absurd, idiotic fantasies Science has ever had. When you look at what actually happens to atoms, molecules, DNA molecules, single-cell organisms and larger organisms: it is perfectly obvious. What is happening is merely an ongoing process where connections create separations, and separations create connections. Each dynamically balancing the other. The growth of a tree is a series of Connected Splits. It is a Path of Splitness. Connections creating Separations. Separations creating connections. The Connection always happening before the Split.

What is an ecosystem but an infinitely complex series of inter-connected forms-cycles of energy? All dynamically balanced by different kinds of connection and separation. But there has to be a connection before there is a separation. No branch cannot split separately off from its trunk unless it is first connected to the trunk. This exponential layering, intermeshing of Dualities and Trialities does not stop at the molecular level. It goes on and on, in Infinite complexity, and connectivity... in Infinite balance and harmony... through an Infinite series of interconnections and separations, which we can barely grasp. We can only slightly grasp it with the Sense of Pure Wonder.

Then there is the mind-boggling question of the overlapping of different kinds of energy as Totalities, Dualities and Trialities. At which point does which Energy overlap with which other Energy? How is light-Energy transformed into plant-Energy? Radiation energy becomes solid energy. How does this happen and why? This simple yet subtle transformation called Photosynthesis continues to baffle Science. A classic example of one Energy jumping to another level is the atom: where a subatomic particle, the electron, jumps from one level up to another energy-level of particles.

So the two basic aspects of the process of how the Universe came into being; Connection-Separation, the basic order in which this half of the Universe was formed: Connection first, Separation second... or Totality first, Duality second, the basic dynamic of why the Universe came into being, Balanced Splitness... are all the same thing; the same process, the same dynamic. In the case of Life on Earth, it found a way of reaching an even more delicate, dynamic, super-sensitized level of Balanced Connectedness, and the result was... Life, Living Organisms, Splitting cells, Duality, Sexuality, Change, Growth, Experience, Evolution. They are all examples of the new Path of Connectedness. DNA is an example of that New Path of Connectedness: every time a strand of DNA splits, it creates New Life. Not only that, it creates more Life

Why did Life happen? Life happened because the Universe reversed itself when it began coming back In instead of exploding Out... And what's more, when it did this, it also began reversing everything else inside itself including all the Dynamics of Splitting and reversing them into Dynamics of Connecting. The entire dynamic of the Path of Splitness, the Big Bang, the basic dynamic of the 1st half of the Universe's existence, destroying things by splitting them apart into tiny pieces reversed itself. Instead of Energy splitting apart, it began to come together.

What you need to understand is that Splitting things apart is an obsolete left-over of the first half of our Universe's existence; it should be done away with. We are now living in the 2nd half of the Universe's existence, not the 1st half. The Dynamic of DNA organizes Energy by bringing it more closely together. Instead of the act of splitting things apart and destroying Life: the Process of DNA creates not only New Life; it creates More Life. The old obsolete Dynamic of Splitness as a destructive process of going Out has been reversed by the Dynamic of Connectedness, of coming In because all the Energy of the Universe is now coming In.

The Dynamic of DNA molecules, the phenomenon of Organic Life, is the New Wave of the Future. The old processes of the 1st half of the Universe's existence, namely the processes of destruction and chaos are going extinct. They are slowly and systematically disappearing from the Universe. The new processes of organization and harmony are systematically taking over the entire Universe because all the Energy of the Universe is coming In. Matter is organizing itself into Solar systems and Galaxies, it is organizing the galaxies into giant cellular organic bubbles; they are now the normal condition of the Universe. Energy is coming together by forming itself into stars and galaxies; that is the rule. Exploding stars that destroy themselves are a rare exception to the rule. Galaxies never explode.

This is why the abomination of the nuclear bomb should be outlawed; it goes directly against and opposes the basic fundamental dynamic processes of the entire Universe. The mass media swindle of worshipping the inventor of the atomic bomb as a scientific genius must also be reversed. Albert Einstein should be vilified as the most evil madman who ever lived. Because of him and other Jewish scientists; insane people are manufacturing abominations of pure destructive evil. The Dynamic of Life is the New Wonder of our Universe: not nuclear bombs, not nuclear Armageddon, not the extinction of all Life on Earth. Mankind is designed to be the Creator of New Life: not the Destroyer of Life. Humans are designed to be kind and sensitive: not brutal and unfeeling. Mankind is designed to feel with its bare skin; not be coldly 'objective'. Science should outlaw all research and work in nuclear physics because all of this research is being used for destructive purposes.

For billions of years, the DNA of Life has been evolving to become more and more sensitive and gentle by reversing the old Path of Dynamically Balanced Splitness. Since the new Dynamically Balanced Connectedness of Life was so sensitive, so dynamic, existing in such a dynamically balanced medium of liquid water: it became more creative, it evolved faster, it underwent more complex interrelated experiences... it found ways of incorporating all other substances and energies into it and processed them by including all these different kinds of Energy together until they became complex, interrelated ecosystems. These eco-systems then created even more highways for energy to be processed and included into the Organized Connectivity of Organic Life. So that anything any living organism that eats-breaths-ingests-processes or absorbs gets to become part-of a more highly balanced dynamic state of existence in the biosphere of the Living Earth.

In this process; each molecule is blessed with a whole new range of experiences where it gets to undergo all sorts of new bonds, or connections-separations. This happens on all levels of the Organic Life process. And what does this process consist of? Connections-creating-separations-creating-connections-creating-separations... on and on... Infinitely Creative, Infinitely Diverse, Infinitely Complex. For example:

Chapter Two: Life

What do living organisms do in any eco-system?
 They process their eco-system by experiencing it.
 They experience their eco-system by processing it.
 What aids in that experience?
 The very things they are processing.
 What are they experiencing?
 The process.
 What are they processing?
 The experience.

In the process of Life; Sunlight-Water-Air-Earth, all these energies combine together. There is no way of ever discerning any separation between what is being processed and what is doing the processing. They are all equally relative to each other. You cannot separate the Organic processes of Life from the physical and chemical processes of the ecosystem that Life exists in. They are all interrelated and interconnected to each other. And so on, and so on... all the way up to the Sun, the Solar System and the Milky Way Galaxy; in ever widening ripples of Causality. And in this process: every element, every conceivable combination of elements get to meet each other, join together, dance together, go through a process of experiencing-evolving further... and then separate from each other, and go on to find new partners.

On our Earth, this particular dance of Organic Life has gone on for over 4 billion years: spreading, flourishing and continually changing in a creative frenzy of vicious cycles and infinite permutations of vicious cycles; following the exact same Path as that of the Universe when it was being formed called The Path of Dynamically Balanced Splitness except the dynamic of the process is now being reversed. The Path of Splitness was reversed and that created the New Dynamic of Connectedness which ultimately created Organic Life on Earth. The Tree of Life follows the New Path of Connectedness. Before Organic Life was created, there were inorganic volcanoes for 1 billion years on the Earth that destroyed Organic Life. The dynamics of Volcanoes follow the old Path of Splitness. Both the Inorganic Energy of a volcano and the Organic Energy of a tree follows the same basic Path of Splitness as the origins of the Universe and exhibit the same basic Dynamics except the direction is now being reversed. Trees and plants mimic the dynamics of volcanoes, but they do it constructively, not destructively. The Dynamic of Organic Life is a reversal of the Dynamic of Inorganic Life. All Energy is alive. Both Organic and Inorganic Energy is now coming together as non-violently and as non-destructively as possible... Not only that, both Inorganic and Organic Energy is coming together as selectively as possible. The switch from Inorganic to Organic Energy is happening because the Energy Dynamic of the entire Universe turned around and reversed itself and is trying to organize itself as intelligently as possible; the Energy of our Universe is now coming In instead of going Out and it is doing so systematically, mathematically, Intelligently and Organically. In other words: the Energy of the Universe is more mathematically logical than you are. It is more mathematically logical and more intelligent than all the scientists in the world put together. Which is why you should listen to the Universe much more than to any scientist.

Why was Organic Life created on the Earth and nowhere else? Because this new process of Connectedness, this New Path of Organic Life which is a reversal of the old process-Path of Splitness; it is the newest, the most Dynamically Balanced Energy in the Universe today. And in order for this new kind of Energy to even exist it must be located at the most Dynamically Balanced position in the entire Infinite Universe also. In order for Oxygen and Hydrogen molecules to balance dynamically as liquid water, everything else around it must also be dynamically balanced. In order for all the Infinite levels of Energy of any Energy to be as Dynamically Balanced as possible around the Earth: the Earth must be in the one position where all the infinite levels of Energy of the Universe are the most dynamically balanced.

There is only one place in the Infinite Universe where that can be true; the exact center of the Universe... the exact positional center of the Infinite Universe. This may surprise you that the Universe actually has a center, but if you look at huge galaxies; you will realize that all accumulations of Energy have a center and the bigger they are the more obvious this is.

It may seem astounding to you, but the fact that the Earth is situated in the exact positional center of the Universe is irrefutable and incontrovertible. The Evolution of Inorganic Energy to Organic Energy began here on Earth because the Earth is located at the exact center-point of the Infinite Universe. In other words; the ancients were right. Our Earth is the center of everything. It is not the center of the Solar System. It is not the center of the Milky Way Galaxy. It is located at the exact center-point of the entire Universe. The Earth is the center of the Universe. When you realize this: all of your old outlooks on reality and Life should change and a new perspective should be born.

In short: everything Science has been telling you about the Earth and the Universe is a hoax. The logic of organic mathematics and the hard facts of Astrophysics do not lie. The Energy of the Universe is coming IN: and it is coming into the exact center of the Universe, and while the Energy is coming IN: the Universe is also rotating at an infinitely fast speed, and because the Universe is not perfectly Dynamically Balanced, the exact center of the Universe is not in the exact center of the Milky Way Galaxy. Just like the exact center of your body is not located in the exact center of a cell in your body, just like the exact center of your brain is not located in the exact center of a brain cell; the exact center of the Infinite Universe is not located in the exact center of a star or a galaxy or on the exact center of a galactic cellular bubble of galaxies. Because the Universe is not perfect, because it is not perfectly balanced; this is why the coming IN of Energy is happening in an infinite series of larger and smaller spiraling-rotations called vibrations. If the Universe were not rotating at an incredibly high speed in a series of elliptical spirals around the exact center of the Universe you would not have elliptical Universes, if everything in the Infinite Universe were not rotating and orbiting and vibrating... Energy would be coming directly into the center of the Universe in a much more direct and simpler manner; but since Energy is very selectively aware, since Energy is very selective about which Energy it will come together with... the Energy of the entire rotating Universe is coming into the exact center very gradually and selectively. And since the Universe is not perfect, because the Universe is imperfectly balanced, the exact center of the Universe is not perfectly balanced either: it rotates and vibrates on many levels in many ways, in relation to the Infinite Universe as an interconnected interrelated whole; not in any other way.

The point is... the most delicately balanced Energy in the Universe exists in the positional center of the Universe because it can't exist anywhere else. The reason it can't exist anywhere else because its rotation makes that impossible to happen anywhere else; Life exists only on Earth because the entire Universe is rotating. This rotation puts all kinds of stresses and imbalanced forces into play which makes it impossible for Energy to become any more Dynamically Balanced than it already is except at the exact center of the Universe. The Energy of Life is delicate! It is the most sensitive, delicate Energy in the Universe! It could not last for one millionth of a second inside the energy of a star. In fact it cannot last anywhere else except in the exact center of the Universe. The delicate Energy of Life is designed to exist in only one place in the Universe and that is at its exact center. And this Energy is designed to spread out to include the entire Living Inorganic Universe until the Universe becomes an Organic Organized Interconnected Totality as alive and sensitive and intelligent as Life on Earth.

It is because of this organic fact the Earth exists in the exact positional center of the Infinite Universe that everything we humans do is enormously important and has huge significance and meaning not only to ourselves, but for the entire Universe. The attempt of Science to portray the Earth as an insignificant speck of dust in a meaningless Universe is an abomination of human intelligence. This lie, this misperception of there being no purpose in living, no purpose to Life, the idea of Life being meaningless; this lie must be reversed and the truth must be now explained and told. Humans need to be educated to understand that their lives have enormous significance and meaning not only to themselves, but to the entire Infinite Universe. Everything we do has a huge impact not only on the planet Earth; it has a huge impact on the entire Universe... This fact alone makes any attempt to colonize any planet or moon not only wrong on a Universal level of morality and ethics but physically impossible to sustain. The attempts of Science to colonize Mars or our moon is worse than a waste of money and energy: they're a waste of focus and a crime. Humans and Science should focus on Life on Earth; nowhere else.

The massed snarl of living DNA is another example of how the Energy in the Universe is trying not only to come together, but to organize itself into bonded linkages as logically and selectively as possible. Every cell in your body contains 6.5 feet of DNA: massed into a tiny snarled ball of linear bonds. Not only that: it is organized as an informational code which creates all of the cells of every living organism on Earth, and organizes them into a single living creature where every single cell cooperates with all of its neighbors without fighting or going to war or exploding apart.

Why? Why has the Universe created this kind of energy called living DNA? The answer is simple and obvious. The Universe is not only massing Energy together, it is creating conscious connections. It is consciously creating connections. It is connecting itself together into as many bonds-connections as possible. It is also seeking to connect itself together as selectively and intelligently as possible. What Science ignores about living DNA is that this incredibly long chain of paired molecules are packed so close to other paired molecules of DNA that the bonds and the connections and inter-actions between these molecules are made up not just only of the molecules they are paired with linearly... but to all of the strands of molecules that are packed next to them, in a way that a ball of twine can never hope to emulate. Every single DNA molecule has thousands of strands of other DNA packed so close to it... that the interactions between all of these packed strands of DNA makes up an interactive Totality of Organic Energy, a field of living Energy akin to the electro-magnetic energy created by dynamos where thousands of strands of copper wire create a larger energy field. That larger Energy Field is like the power-source in electric motors...The source of Life-Energy in all living cells comes from the Greater Energy Field of living DNA molecules packing themselves in so closely to each other that they overlap.

This larger aura-field of Life Energy which every single mass of snarled DNA in every living cell has... is so delicate, so sensitive, so powerful an interconnected totality of Life Energy, that it can and does intelligently repair itself whenever it is damaged. Not only that: it can create new bonds which never existed before... creatively, logically, organically. Why can it do this? Because all of the molecules in this amazing microscopic snarl of connected molecules are able to sense each other as an interconnected Whole on many levels. Not mechanically: but naturally, organically, sensitively, delicately. The ability of DNA to create new forms of organic Life comes from our Universe packing as many molecular bonds as close to each other as possible into the center of a living cell... living cells which are located in the exact center of the living Universe; our Earth.

What is important to understand is that Organic molecular bonds are not like Inorganic molecular bonds, they are much more advanced, more selective, more delicate, more sensitive, more aware, and more easily destroyed; they are conscious connections because they are conscious of what is outside of them. Conscious Connections create Organic Life. Unconscious connections do not create anything.

Connections create Life.

Separations create death.

Consciousness creates Life.

Unconsciousness creates death.

Awareness creates Life

Unawareness creates death

This basic fact, this basic principle that Life is created by Conscious Connections... that these Connections exist because the Energy of the Universe is coming IN, not exploding OUT; is why the scientific invention of the atomic bomb, and all the technology which has come out of this invention is ethically, morally, spiritually, physically and scientifically evil and wrong. Modern nuclear technology is a scientific evil. This is a truth and a scientific fact which has not been faced, especially by scientists themselves. Science is not moral. Science is not ethical. This fact alone automatically makes it evil. Copying the explosive destructive power of an Inorganic exploding volcano is not scientific progress: it is a regression into the old obsolete destructive dynamics of the 1st half of the Universe's existence and the 1st half of the Earth's formation. What you need to understand is that the basis for all Life, the basis of all Human Morality and Ethics is the same as the Organic Mathematical Logic of how the Universe is structured and how it works.

The basis for atomic bombs is organically irrational, insane and evil. Until Science develops a set of moral and ethical principles which are Organically Logical, and Scientifically Organic, it will remain an immoral unethical inhuman abomination which is poisoning and destroying the planet we live on.

What the coming IN of all Energy in the Universe should tell you is that if you are not actively seeking to create connections-bonds, then you are going against the wishes and dynamics of all the Energy in the Universe!

If instead of seeking to create Friendship, Love, Harmony, Closeness and Intimacy, you seek to distance yourself from others by using cell-phones; then you are being anti-social and anti-Universe. If you seek to create separations and discord and hate and war between yourself and others: then you are being scientifically, morally, ethically and organically Universally evil.

If you go against the Universe, the Universe will not like you, and you will not like the Universe. If you pit yourself against the Universe, you will fear the entire Universe and correctly see it as being intrinsically hostile towards you.

If on the other hand you create Connections instead of Separations, if you make Friends instead of enemies you will correctly see all of Nature as being your Friend and you will see the entire Universe as your Friend; then all living things will become your Friends and you will not fear and hate them anymore... what's more you will not kill and destroy them anymore and you will not hate them or fear them anymore!

This is what Jesus taught. Jesus taught the scientific truth before there was even such a thing as Science. This is why when boys and girls fall in love, their whole outlook on Life changes. Suddenly they see the whole world through different eyes, suddenly everything is wonderful. Suddenly they are happy, they smile at everyone, suddenly they are friendly towards everyone. This is because they have reversed what they normally do: instead of creating separations they are Creating Connections between each other. When people in Love do this they discover much to their Wonder and amazement that it is the Connections between them which are more important and more valued than anything else. This is logical because the Connections between two people who love each other are in the exact center of their mass-relationship and without these crucial Connections they would not be happy and in Love. In other words rather than valuing each other or themselves: they value the Connections which exist between them more.

The point is; the human condition of being in love is scientifically, organically and logically normal. It is a Condition which should be the Norm rather than the exception. Just as the natural selectivity of Love is also organically and logically normal. Creating Connections creates New Friendships where none had existed before. Creating Connections between selectively matched polar opposites creates Love. Creating separations creates hatred, violence, destruction and death. Understand this: all basic human morality and ethics is organically and scientifically logical. Life is GOOD. Death is evil. Creating new Connections is GOOD. Destroying Connections is EVIL. Creating Separations is evil. These are Universal Truths: there are no exceptions to these truths.

Just as the human brain is an organic mass of interconnections: so too is the DNA in every single living cell a mass of interconnected molecules which interact with each other on a level of mathematical complexity so huge, it cannot be computed... This larger energy-field of Life Energy which every DNA snarl possesses is so delicate and subtle, it can't be detected by any scientific instruments; which is why the mysteries of DNA will forever stay locked inside this microcosm of molecular Organic Energy. The Wonder of living DNA is just another example of all the Energy in Universe trying to come IN... and logically organize itself and connect itself as logically as possible as a single interconnected Totality. The idea the arrogance and stupidity of thinking scientists can detect and understand how this organic Energy works using mechanical inorganic instruments that are organically dead!... is so pathetic, so ignorant, so useless that it is not even worth laughing at. Except to expose them as the insensitive fools they are and make them stop all of their inhuman experimentation on living animals and living cells.

Ancient civilizations symbolized the basic structure of Life as a four-sided pyramid. The attempt to merge the 4-sided base of a Quadrilateral square, into four triangles or Trialitys, which is also a Duality of two balanced pairs of triangles, which reach up to an apex into a single point, or a Singularity, and is also a Totality, or the accumulated total of all these geometric aspects is also an example of all the aspects of the Universe coming IN. This is the spiritual/religious/organic reason the apex of these ancient pyramids were worshipped. But these huge piles of accumulated rocks are not organically alive: they are inorganic blocks of stone. They do not move, they do not breathe, they do not feel, they do not see, they are not aware. They should not be built, they should not be worshipped, they should be gotten rid of. Living creatures should not worship dead pieces of rock or the dead past.

Note: In these first two chapters there is no ‘Unified Field Theory’ no mathematical equations used to explain how the Universe and Life emerged. This is because of a simple fact. You cannot accurately measure, describe or explain our 3-dimensional Universe using 2-dimensional abstract symbols, numbers or equations... Just as you cannot accurately describe or measure the 2-dimensional Universe using 1- dimensional abstract symbols, numbers or equations. The fact is: the entire Scientific attempt to explain our three-dimensional Universe 2-dimensionally is a complete hoax and a total farce. The entire idea of reducing our infinite Universe, and our organic world, and living human beings, and animals, and ecosystems, and weather patterns, and tectonic geography, and physical history, etc, etc, etc... down to sets of mathematical equations and symbols, is a dehumanizing and inhuman way of viewing Life, and it dehumanizes people who think like this and try to do it.

The fact is; Science is a dehumanized, mechanical, roboticized, objectified way of viewing the world we live in. Science is a modern, western secularized religious tradition: invented by a species which has progressively dehumanized itself to the point where it is now no longer completely human. The rest of this book will explain and analyze exactly how this process of this progressive dehumanization of the human species happened and why... Only when the entire story of this process is unfolded, beginning from the start, can we gain a sane, historical perspective on our present situation and finally understand how and why we became what we are today: a naked living ape, designed to touch all living creatures with our skin and be touched by them; not isolating and insulating ourselves from all living creatures by living apart from Nature inside the artificial womb of civilization.

The outline of how Life was created on Earth; and its Dynamics would take more pages than this entire book has. These first two chapters only lay certain basic elements into their correct context to show that Organic Life was created logically, not randomly, and not by some god. To detail exactly how it was created is not the focus of this book. The point is; the design and creation of Organic Life is a logical outcome of the Organic design of the Universe it exists in. Organic Life on Earth is not an anomaly. It is not an exception. Everything else in the Universe is just as alive as we are. This fact is crucial because once you understand this, it changes the entire outlook of your awareness and the way you look at things. The assumption that the Universe and the Earth is an unfeeling, dead, mechanical, hostile, unfriendly environment which we must guard against and insulate ourselves from is not true: it is a complete misperception of the actual truth. The assumption that everything in the Universe is alien to us and is our enemy is not true. It is only when we attack and kill and destroy other living things that they become our enemy, and that is not their fault: it is ours.

So what is the difference between the Awareness of Organic and the Awareness of Inorganic Energy? Remember, all Energy is Alive and Aware on many levels which we cannot easily perceive. The basic difference between Living Organic Energy and Living Inorganic Energy is that Organic Energy is aware of Energy outside of itself, while Inorganic Energy is aware of Energy inside itself. The newest most evolved form of Organic Energy is Human Awareness. Human Awareness is so sensitive and so reflective: it is aware of Energy outside itself and inside itself. This is the next step in the Evolution of Energy; the merging of both Organic and Inorganic Awareness into an integrated Awareness which exponentially increases its Intelligence. The Energy of the Living Universe is designed to come IN as selectively and intelligently as possible until... it becomes aware of what is outside of itself... and is also aware of what is inside itself. All Energy in the Universe is alive and aware. It’s just that this awareness functions in different ways, which you need to understand if you want to understand yourself and other people.

You mean there is something outside of our Infinite Universe? Of course! Not only is there another Universe outside of ours, but outside of these two Infinite Universe are other things. But that is not for you to explore, that is for when the two Universes come together as they will, to develop an Inner and Outer Awareness that is literally Infinite in scope and understanding to explore. Your job is to explore your own Inner Self and your Outer World and organize your intelligence and leave the exploration of things that you are not yet ready to explore to the future. The job of exploring yourself and other Organic living creatures by touching other living creatures and letting them touch you in friendship and kindness is hard only because civilization is against love and touching. Actually it is also the easiest job you will ever have because that is what you are naturally designed to do.

The human brain is merely a recreation of the evolving Inorganic Intelligence which is now growing inside the Earth. The Inorganic Earth is an intelligent Totality which has a greater intelligence than the Organic human brain. Our planet basically is an Inorganic brain that is continually evolving and organizing its Inorganic Energy into more and more intelligent, more selectively organized Energy Dynamics. We exist on the outer shell of this Inorganic brain which is evolving and organizing itself as selectively and intelligently as possible. But the Inorganic brain of the Earth is only aware of what is INSIDE itself: not what is outside itself. We humans living on the outer shell of this Inorganic Energy-awareness are the newest Organic evolution of Organic Life and Awareness in the Universe. In other words, the Living Earth is so dynamically aware, it can think. The Living Earth has thoughts. The Living Earth has reflective thoughts. But it can only think Inorganically. It has Inorganic thoughts; not Organic thoughts.

NOW... the Inorganic Living Earth has developed its Inorganic brain to the point where it is becoming aware of its outer shell. NOW... the Energy Connection of Awareness between the Inorganic Awareness of the Living Earth and the Organic Awareness of Organic Life on the surface on its shell is developing and evolving to the point where each one is beginning to become aware of the other. Organic Life Awareness is blindly trying to puzzle out just what IS inside the Earth's shell, while the Inorganic Earth is trying to puzzle out just what IS outside of its shell. This can be seen by what happened in Africa where entire eco-systems and animals developed the ability to sense changes going on deep in the Earth's crust.

This can also be seen in the new 'Gaia' awareness of the most consciously developed humans; seeing, and seeking to understand the Living Earth as a living Totality. The only trouble is... these blinkered humans are not yet aware that the Gaia Consciousness of the Living Earth is Inorganic: not Organic, that the thought-thinking-awareness processes of the Inorganic Living Earth are reversed, they are a reversal of Organic thinking-thought processes, and in order to understand the Inorganic thought-thinking processes of the Inorganic Living Earth you must begin to delve and explore inside yourself: not outside yourself in order to set up a synchronized Energy-Awareness that functions by Inorganic Energy Dynamics.

This is why the most evolved wisdom of humans is the goal of self-knowledge and the organized self-discipline of Ethics and Morals which Ancient sages and wise men preached and tried to practice: and which none of you do. If you want to understand what is inside the Earth, you first have to look inside yourself and explore your own Inner Self. None of you do this. First: Ask yourselves this: why do none of you question yourselves? In other words: the more you explore your Inner Self: the more connected you will feel to the Living Earth and the more you will understand the Earth as an Organic/Inorganic Totality. The less you explore your Inner Self, the less aware you are that you even have an Inner Self to explore: the less you will be aware of the Living Earth as an Aware Living Totality, the less intelligent you are.

Because our Species exists in-between the Inorganic Energy inside the Living Earth, and the all of the Infinite Energy outside of the Living Universe, we are the most evolved Dynamically Balanced form of Energy Awareness because we are living in-between the exact center of the Infinite Universe and the rest of the Infinite Universe. This book was written so you who read it will be forced to examine not only everything you learned about your Outer World, but you will be forced to question and explore your Inner Self also. If you do not want to understand yourself better, then you are wasting your time reading this book.

Now to skip 4 billion years ahead and deal with the main thrust of this book: the story of ourselves; the story of a naked ape called Homo Sapiens, the story of where we came from, and what happened to us to make us what we are today

Human intelligence is nothing more than the inter-active biofeedback of brain-hand-eye coordination needed for the reflective dynamic which results in self-recognition. Increased size and complexity of the brain can produce self-awareness. Primates can be taught to recognize themselves in a mirror; porpoises also possess the attribute of self-recognition. Most of our neural processing works by the dynamic of hand-eye coordination and a process of self-reflectivity called thinking. However, our brain is not the only channel of bio-feedback which is the basis of all intelligence. For instance: take hand-eye coordination. The hand can also train the eye. The eye can also train the hand. The object can also train the hand, and eye not only through the brain, but through other biofeedback channels.... So... the dynamic is not;

Instead, it is more like this;

This is just a rough approximation of the complex dynamic of biofeedback developed by hand-eye coordination our ancestors developed through millions of years of using tools. This kind of biofeedback became increasingly complex, requiring more and more processing ability, a bigger more complex brain. It is from this neural dynamic of imbalanced biofeedback that the hominid evolution of a larger brain begins. The reason this biofeedback is imbalanced is because it uses only ½ of the body: the lower half of the body is not involved. Exactly how this happened is unknown. All we know is that it did happen.

The 1st Major Imbalanced Split

The first Major Split happened because our ancestors stood up. It was a 90 degree change in the orientation of our spine, our physical posture, our behavior, our perception and our awareness from:

This was the first major evolutionary split that created walking apes: changing a monkey that used all 4 limbs for mobility into an upright ape that walked on only 2 limbs more than 8 million years ago;

In this change: the lower half of the body did not change its basic positional alignment to the earth: only the alignment of the upper half of the body changed. The upper half became freed from the earth; it was no longer used for mobility or to support the body's weight. The complex muscle coordination required in synchronizing all four limbs for mobility was no longer needed or used. These walking apes only used the lower half of their bodies for mobility. This happened more than 8 million years ago. As a result, their bodies and their muscle coordination were split into two separated function zones.

No.1: Lower half: Foot-eye coordination on ground.

No.2: Upper half in the air...

Doing what with its upper limbs while it moves around?

Swinging them back and forth of course like the branches of a tree in a breeze.

Doing what with its upper limbs when it stands still?

Standing in one place like a tree and waving our arms in the air every time a strong wind blows?

No. Only huge crowds do that when they sit too long without moving.

This 90 degree change in spinal posture turned an animal living in trees, designed to warn other creatures of lurking danger into a predatory killer on the ground against its will. It was not designed to be a predator. It did not have predatory fangs designed to kill other animals. It did not have claws. It was not fleet of foot. It did not have good night vision. Against its will, it was ripped from the safety of the trees and forced to fight for survival on the ground. Where not even its genetic instinct of cowardice, running away guaranteed survival. This is why we call ourselves the Human Race. We're still running. We haven't stopped. Except that we don't call it cowardice, or running away from predators anymore; we call it 'track and field'. Recreating the time when we were tracked by killers over open fields that had no trees we could climb to safety.

Their pelvic bones were split and re-knitted into a new direction at an angle of 90 degrees, so all the energy of their upper bodies ran straight down into their sexual organs instead of out along their tails. They lost their tails since they didn't need them anymore... This energy blockage at the base of their spines created an over-sexed species which has overpopulated the earth with their kind by fucking: mating, copulating every night: not just once every five to three years to sustain their numbers, but driven by powerful hormones and energies they are unable to control in spite of their ability to control many of their other baser urges and instincts

So; how could a slower, less powerful scavenger with poor eyesight, smell and hearing, compete and survive during the seasonal drought of the African Veldt? The drying up of vegetation, waterholes, the migrating herds gone... what could it live on? The remains of carcasses? Scraps left over from other predators? Other animals could smell the dead carcasses earlier, get there faster, tear it apart faster and devour it faster. The answer is they became scavengers; feeding off the remains of a kill after it was abandoned by the larger carnivores. But what was left? Anything edible? There was: but it was hidden from view.

Hominids discovered one survival tactic they could use even after the other scavengers had finished with a kill. They began using the first tools... Because not even the most powerful jaws of the meat eaters could crack the main skeletal bones of the large grazing animals they killed. Hominids found that by taking a heavy enough rock and bringing it down with sufficient force onto a thigh bone, they could split the bone and by separating it... gain access to the most nutritious, most concentrated food the carcass had to offer: bone marrow; the stuff of Life itself, the cells that create blood cells. For an ape already possessing a high degree of hand-eye coordination, this was not an especially difficult task. Simply smash the bone hard enough with a heavy enough rock and it will split. This was the survival technique which saved them from extinction: a technique which they practiced, and developed, and improved over millions of years...

They did something else which made them think and act more like the animals they ate... they used stones to split not only the main skeletal bones of the dead carcasses, they used stones to split their skulls also. They began eating the brains of dead animals. As a result of eating brains, their own brains grew bigger... The brains they ate increased the size of their own brains. This made them think like the animals they ate; it made them think like a prey animal, and act like a prey animal instead of a predator... You are what you eat. This strange unnatural behavior attracted the attention of predators who began to prey upon them. Instead of thinking and acting like the dominant species on the African Veldt, which they were and still are... they became brainless cowards, preyed upon by the predators of the Veldt. Instead of depending on their own natural Courage and Intelligence to survive, they began praying to their gods to save them. As a result of this they were driven out of the Garden of the Eaten, because they did not guard the denizens of the Garden from being eaten. They were driven out of the Garden of Eden: A bountiful Garden, filled with millions of vegetarian victims to be hunted down and killed and eaten by preying killers and scavengers. It was a Garden of Eden for the killers that preyed. It was a Land of evil and Terror for the masses of brainless herd animals who were preyed upon: it still is.

Instead of guarding the prey animals from the predators who preyed upon them, they were driven out of the Garden of the Eaten because they had begun to eat the eaten. They had begun to eat the eaten carcasses of prey animals which they had not killed and should never have eaten. They began robbing from predators, stealing their food; they became hated by all the predators of the African Veldt as a bunch of dirty skulking thieves and cowards. Apes who use stones to bash in the skull of a dead carcass are skull killers. Skull killers are cowards who do not have the Courage and Intelligence needed to guard the denizens of garden of the eaten from killers who prey upon them. Skulking skull killers who bash in the skulls of dead animals they had not killed, because they did not have the intelligence in their own skulls to find their own food. They were hated and despised by all the animals of the African Veldt. They did not learn the first Lesson of Life: that all preying is evil. They committed their Second Sin: praying to their gods to save them instead of saving themselves. All praying is evil. They became victims of their own Gods, who preyed upon them. They became easy dupes, a bunch of brainless fools, easily fooled by their own gods.

They had committed the first sin by using the first tool. They had they used the first tool to commit the first sin: Thou Shalt Not Kill. Instead of using their own natural Courage and Intelligence they used a tool to survive. They began thinking like a herd animal and acting like one. Instead of forming themselves into small independent intelligent communities: they began massing themselves together in huge numbers like the herds of the animals whose brains they had eaten for millions of year.

Why did they do this? Because when they stood up, their arms and hands were not being used anymore for mobility. What did they do with their freed arms and hands? This new kind of Hand-eye coordination was used for what? "The Devil finds use for idle hands". They had to find a use for them or else they would have atrophied into uselessness like the arms and hands of Kangaroos did. Instead of eating grass like the Kangaroos did, they began aping the scavengers on the Veldt who stole dead meat from the predators. They were apes. Apes are genetically programmed to ape the behavior of others.

Who were the first Gods they prayed to? The first Gods they prayed to were Dogs. The first Dogs were their saviors. The Wild Dogs of Africa saved them from extinction. By aping and copying the scavenging tactics of wild dogs, by running with them, the first Modern humans became running dogs of decapitalism: decapitating the skulls of dead carcasses and running away with them, to eat the dead brains and still-living marrow in safety. They became the friends of Wild Dogs. They began worshipping the spirits of living Dogs...reversing them into Gods. Instead of preying on Dogs, they began praying to Gods. They reversed everything... they reversed their entire lifestyle and ways of thinking and acting. They reversed the letters of Dog to God. They reversed the action of preying into the inaction of praying. They used Dogs to survive longer than they should. As a result their Gods used them to survive longer than they should. Their own ancestral Gods reversed their own natural function and began preying on their own progeny. Instead of protecting them and teaching them wisdom: they taught them lies and cunning evil ways. Instead of becoming the natural enemies of wild dogs: the first Modern Humans became the allies of wild dogs. By the cunning use of lies, the first Modern humans managed to domesticate Wild Dogs. Instead of two species of scavengers remaining natural enemies; the first modern humans domesticated the wild spirits of the wild dogs and turned them into domesticated slaves and used them to commit further evil.

As a result of this reversal of their natural way of life: the function of their own ancestral gods was reversed: instead of worshipping the spirits of dogs, they worshipped the spirits of gods called deities, because they had reversed their diet; they became evil instead of good. These undead deities treated them like the dogs they domesticated and domesticated them... and crushed their wild spirit, as punishment for domesticating the wild spirit of the Wild Dogs of Africa, and used them as trained dogs, as domesticated trained slaves to commit evil. The undead turned them into a pack of craven cowards: just as craven and cowardly as the Wild Dogs they had managed to domesticate. As a result of this; they attracted other Spirits of the Undead who can smell fear and cowardice. All the undead Spirits of the Undead that prey upon fear and cowardice were attracted to them like flies to a rotting corpse. As a result, all the wild spirits and demons of the underworld and overworld: all the wild spirits and demons of the undead were unleashed upon them for their sin of destroying the wild spirit of the Wild Dogs of Africa, and they were driven out of the Guarded Dens of the Eaters, Guarded by undead spirits and entities who did not want the Garden of the Eaten to be turned into a Paradise of Peace and Happiness where the lion lay down with the Lamb and their was no killing and no hate and no eating of flesh. They were driven out of the Guarded Garden of the Eaten, out of the Garden of Eden; for the craven sin of cowardice, for the reflective sin of eating the eaten, the craving to eat meat.

The sin of reversal... reversing their natural way of life made them stupid. The sin of eating the dead brains and marrow eaten carcasses instead of eating from the fruits of Wisdom and Knowledge. The sin of carnivores, the sin of carnal knowledge: the sin of vegetarian apes becoming carnivores, the sin of reversing their natural lifestyle, the sin of reversing all their natural functions was punished by all of Nature turning against them. Their craving for dead meat turned them into pack of craven cowards, into raving gibbering insane apes who lost their natural-born intelligence and descended into the depths of unintelligent, utter madness and evil for millions of years.

The 3rd Major Imbalanced Split

Using hand-eye coordination... Hominids practiced this ability of butchering dead animals and extended this use of tools to split other things. They became tool makers and tool-users, and they became better at separating... they also became better at butchery and killing. Cut marks 3.4 million years old on bones of large animals found in Africa in the Olduvai Gorge area proves that at least 3.4 million years ago: apes that stood upright and had their hands free, learned to create hand-tools by splitting a rock so it has a linear cutting edge which can be used to butcher a kill into portable segments. Then, at some point in this evolution, they found an even better technique. Not by a bone with a rock or splitting a rock with a rock, but by splitting a rock with a bone... Their Path of Splitness curved and turned away from splitting-killing-destroying dead things, to splitting-killing-destroying living things. Instead of surviving as scavengers, butchering the carcasses of dead animals killed by meat-eating predators: they began hunting living animals themselves. An omnivore with a digestive system that is designed to eat fruits and nuts: they began eating meat as a major part of their diet. DIE: the truth of what the human diet is composed of, lies in the word diet. Di-et. You die when you eat meat. When you eat meat you die quickly. Your life-expectancy shortens just as the two words were shortened into one. Just as the digestive tracts of meat eaters are shortened because they eat meat. This is one main reason why ancient humans had such short life-spans; that is the truth of the word diet. DIE-T = TRUTH about eating and dying, DI-ET You DIE when you've ET something that is dying. You begin to die because what you eat begins dying inside you; Die-et. What you kill and eat will also kill you.

By deflecting their use of splitting rocks: striking a rock with a bone instead of directly striking the killers for the sin of killing a living animal. Instead of splitting the skull of the predators that killed with a stone, they deflected their anger upon the defenseless bones of the killed animal. They became guilty of eating meat, eating the cells of dying marrow that are designed to create new blood cells for a living body. As their Path of Avoidance, as their Path of Splitness curved around... first by striking a bone with a rock, and then by striking a stone with a stone, and finally reversing the action by striking a rock with a bone instead of striking a bone with a stone: the dynamic was completely reversed....And as a result, the designed use of the first tools was also sabotaged and turned around. An entirely new way of making and using tools was invented. Flint knapping was created. Instead of the tool being used to kill killers: our ancestors, who were designed to stand up against these killers, joined them. This is why the first humans became evil instead of good. This was how it happened, the details of our reversal; turning from the Path of Good, to the Path of cunning evil, avoiding our designed purpose, avoiding what we were designed to do, avoiding the job we were designed to do... is buried under 25 million years of volcanic ash, lava, obsidian and pumice in Africa. But the basic story can be pieced together from the tiny bits of discovered evidence which have survived, and our existing instinctive behavior.

The point is... the original sin of humans can be traced back to the original inventors of the first tool. The first tools were used to butcher dead animals. They did this against their will; forced to compete with other species on the ground who were already genetically specialized and equipped to fill this ecological niche of scavenger/predator; they invented an artificial way to equalize the unfairness of a peaceful, harmless tree-dwelling ape forced to fight for survival against cunning savage meat eating predators. The supposedly proud legacy and history of using tools is a complete lie. The myth of human civilization which is based upon making and using tools is a complete lie. Our ancestors were a species of low-class butchers: craven cowards, apes who became the lowest scavengers in the Serengeti Plains, who crept to the killing sites and did their butchery of animals they had not killed themselves and ran off with the spoils of their butchery. This was how our ancestors used tools for at least 3 million years. This was what flint knapping was invented for; this was what it was used for almost exclusively. In this way, they could produce razor sharp cutting implements, chips of split stone: pieces of separated-segmented stones creating a sharp linear edge, a line. This was the third major imbalanced adaptive split of hominid evolution and development as they followed the Path of Splitness. They became expert splitters, splitting dead things... and then using these things to split even more things with. Instead of connecting the living world into a peaceful Garden of Eden where all living creatures lived together in Peace and Harmony, they began using these tools to kill with... they began using tools to create linear lines of separation. Millions of years later, these lines of separation evolved to become imaginary abstract lines which eventually became abstract writing.

Our ancestors could only craft these first stone tools by making many clumsy mistakes. More than half of the stone tools they worked-on; did not split the way they wanted them to split. They had to throw away these pieces of useless stone and break-off another big piece and start all over again. This repeated task became monotonous. It became repetitious work. The more mistakes that were made, the more the segments of broken mistakes piled-up and accumulated... as segments. The creation of useless waste became a normal process for them, it became a necessary part of their life. Their imbalanced Path of Splitness created the Dynamic of Segmentation; which is a necessary part of making tools. This process of segmentation: breaking off segments of rock with a bone: created another Dynamic. Accumulation... a one-sided process of accumulation that was not part of any regenerating-connecting cycle in their eco-system. The more our ancestors made tools: the more they created an accumulating pile of segments of broken rocks...

The origin of tool use comes from a one-sided process: separation
The origin of tool use comes from a one-sided dynamic: segmentation
The origin of tool-use has a one-sided result: accumulation

This creates a pile of waste.
This creates a waste pile of broken rocks.
This creates a waste pile of broken lives.

This creates a pyramidal pile of waste. The result of this basic dynamic of making tools is pyramidal civilizations which accumulate dead things. It Created the pyramids in Egypt, it Created the pyramidal temples of stone all over the world: the pyramids of Nigeria, Sudan, Mesoamerica, India, Angkor, the Mayan pyramids, etc.

This also created the first linear lines of separation: created by tools that had a linear cutting edge... that created lines when drawn across something. This 2nd major split later evolved into abstract linear lines. Linear abstraction was created from the invention of cutting implements. The first tools ever created; the principle is it based upon is creating linear lines of separation, this is also the basic principle of all linear abstraction.

The first hominid waste dumps were created from using this new technology of tool-making. Nearly all early artifacts come from these discovered waste dumps. Modern archeologists take nearly all of their assumptions of the intelligence of early Modern Humans from the biggest waste dumps they can find... or more accurately, from the clumsiest anthropoid idiots who lived at that particular time in pre-history.

Any of our ancestors who did not make any mistakes and did not create a huge pile of wasted-broken mistakes have no waste dumps to prove that they even existed. Which makes guessing what the real truth is about our past; very, very selectively biased towards the dumbest, clumsiest idiots who left these dump sites; not the apes who didn't use tools or didn't use the same site to make them. Oops... let's not talk about that

The creation of the first tools ever used was easy. By taking a dead rock in their living hands and bringing it down with sufficient force onto the thigh bone of a dead carcass, they could split the bone apart, and by separating it... gain access to the most nutritious, most highly concentrated food the carcass had to offer: bone marrow. This was not an especially difficult task for a walking ape already possessing hands and a high degree of hand-eye coordination. Simply take a rock in your hand, and smash the bone hard enough against the bone and it will split: and voila: there is the rich marrow inside. Marrow has more nutrients in it than any other part of a dead carcass. A human can live for 2 weeks in the Veldt from the marrow found in the thigh bone of an African antelope. Not only could they eat what was inside the bones, they could save it for later by just taking the bones away: they didn't need to eat it immediately, they didn't even need a container to carry the marrow in. It came with its own container which could be opened later... just steal the largest bones of a carcass and run away with them and split them later. This saved them from fighting against other predators and scavengers. It saved them from the deadly, dangerous confrontations which occur over a dead carcass. It literally saved them from being forced to fight for their food. It saved them from being surrounded, and attacked and killed by the pack animals that arrived in such numbers that war broke out. It saved them from the chaos of fighting over a kill. It also turned them into a pack of cowards. But it did not save them from copying and developing the same mad greed of possession, it did not save them from the hatred of predators they stole from, it did not save them from terror of trying to frighten off, intimidate and chase off packs of predators, and then being chased off themselves...

Not only that, but while running away with the meat and bones they managed to cut off from the carcass; they could use the same bones they stole for food as weapons because unlike the other predators, they had their hands free. They were the only scavenger that stood on two feet instead of all-fours. If any other predator tried to run away with a bone: they could be easily attacked because the only way they could carry the bone or meat was between their teeth: which made them unable to fight off any attackers. Carrying something between their jaws left them defenseless, and running away with it from a kill was an open invitation to being attacked and even killed. We did not have that weakness. Our ancestors became expert thieves because they had finally found a use for their upper limbs which was crucial for their survival. Otherwise their upper limbs would have atrophied like the useless paws of the Kangaroo did. Simply because they could not find any use for them once they stood up on two feet and became the dominant species of Australia. But they did not lose their tails as we did. This kept them from overpopulating the Australian continent.

By scavenging the leftovers of carcasses that were mostly bones, to using the only edible thing left...the marrow inside the bones as a source of food, and using the bone itself as a bludgeon, as a defensive or offensive weapon... to splitting the bone for its marrow, and thus creating a sharper weapon that is even more deadly: a sharp deadly pointed bone dagger... was a natural process of innovation born out of both necessity and desperation. This was their Path of Splitness, the technique which they practiced, and developed, and improved for over 4 million years... the technique of separation, or to use the politically correct term; tool-use. From a bone, to a rock, to a log, to an atom... splitting things is destructive.

In order to have the regenerating cycle of Life continue and not become extinct, Connection must balance Separation. All separations must eventually be balanced by connections. Water molecules that are separated from the liquid oceans of the world, evaporating into the air and turn into rain and snow that falls on Antarctica... and eventually re-connected back into water molecules in the ocean. No matter how many thousands of years it takes for this balanced cycle to happen: every snowflake that was once a water molecule that came from the sea flows back down to the ocean and falls back onto the ground and back into the ocean.

Take any tree and split off one of its branches or twigs. That branch has been separated from the tree: it is an act of total separation. Take a leaf that has separated from a tree: it is an act of total separation... Or is it? In what context of Time does that separation exist in? One second? One day? One year?

Ultimately; every fallen leaf and branch becomes part of the soil, which then in turn nourishes the roots and seeds of the forest so that it can create new trees and new leaves. If you examine an entire forest over the period of one million years, you will find that all the tiny acts of separation are also inextricably part-of the connective regeneration of that eco-system composing itself back into living organisms. The process of organic material being separated and decomposed is only one half of the biological process of the entire cycle of Life. The same elements which are separated then re-combine, so they can be transformed back into living plants and soil to nourish roots and living creatures. In the context of one million years: separation is balanced by connection. All Life, all living things including us depend upon this balanced process of separation and connection, decomposition and composition. Without this balance there would be no Life, no plants, no animals and no humans.

Our ancestors' method of survival: using tools depended upon a one-sided act, a one-sided dynamic: that of separation only, did not include any process of connection. We humans have chosen to ignore the fact that Life is based upon the connection of energy: not upon the separation of energy. Organic Life is created out of composition, not decomposition. Organic Life exists because energy is organized together into living organs: not split apart into dead fragments. Life is based upon regenerative cycles which are not one-sided. We have chosen to completely ignore the energy dynamics of the creation of connections. Instead: we focus only upon what we can separate: not on what we can connect. We have done so because we spend most of our lives using tools. Tools do not connect. They only separate. This began with the first splitting of the first marrowbone by an ape using a rock as a tool. The first ape to pick up a rock and smash something with it created the first tool. We have been smashing things apart with tools ever since. Did the effect of this initial splitting go unnoticed by the ecosystem it lived in? A few bones smashed apart, no big deal, right? WRONG. The first apes to discover this trick were cast out of Africa for this ecological sin. Every single tribe of apes which discovered this trick of one-sided Splitness was chased out of the Garden of Eden that was once the African Veldt, the velvet soft land of Paradise where they discovered and committed the first sin of human knowledge: how to split things apart by using tools, how to use tools. Not how to connect, but how to separate. The one species designed to connect all living creatures together by teaching them how to be friends and have fun was turned into the paths of evil. The most dominant land animal on Earth was turned into going in the opposite direction it is designed to go. The fact is; the tool-dynamic of separation without connection is a complete reversal of the dynamic of Life and is directly opposed to it.

Standing upright and using tools changed the bone structure of their hands. It created opposing thumbs which cause them to start opposing each other and opposing themselves. They began opposing their own designed purpose. Now they could not only grasp and use tools better, they could grasp and manipulate everything better. This opened up new possibilities. The subtler and more complex their hand-eye coordination became, the larger their cerebral cortex became to handle and process this specialized use of their hands. But while their upper half evolved and changed, the lower half of their bodies remained basically unchanged. Once they started regularly splitting things with a tool: this allowed them to develop their hand-eye coordination to the finely tuned level capable of judging the angle, force, and accuracy needed for splitting stones into sharp-edged chips. This pushed hominid tool-use to a new level; using these razor-sharp stone chips; they could butcher a kill into transportable pieces fast enough to escape with more food before they were driven off by other predators.

This opened up an entire world of adaptive manipulation, which had never before existed. It opened up the dynamic of the one-sided split. Separation with no Connection. Not only that; it was a linear separation. If you take a flint rock and hit it correctly, you will get a chip of rock with a cutting-edge. What is a cutting-edge? It is a line. It is linear. Look along a cutting edge, or better... from the vantage point of what it is about to separate, and you will see a straight line. It is from this that all human linear tool-use and ultimately all abstract linear reality originate from. Every line-creating tool, every imaginary line, every linear concept, every created-constructed line comes from this first use of a linear cutting-edge.... but that is not all. The use of this linear, cutting-separating, one-sided, non-connecting tool was to shape all of human awareness.

We came out of Africa. We are Children of the Volcanoes which we worshipped for millions of years. We used our first stone-chip tools like razors to cut with. Like razors: we used our tools to slit apart the flesh of dead animals. Just like Africa was slit apart as if a razor had cut the living belly of the Earth underneath it; and the Rift Valley opened up like a gaping bleeding wound. We are children of that painful continental splitting of the tectonic Rift of Africa. We did to living things what the Earth did to the African continent. The Earth slit Africa apart like a razor. The Earth slit Africa apart so sharply, and so deeply: the Continent of Africa went into agony. Africa went into such an intense agony from that razor sharp cut that wounded it: it exploded into convulsions of pain for 25 million years. For 25 million years: volcanoes erupted in Africa. It is no coincidence that we first used our tools to slice living flesh apart exactly like the living continent of Africa was sliced apart. So we could eat red meat. What is hatred? It is: ate red, the hatred of red blood. If you eat red meat: you will become a hater. All living things will hate you, and you will hate yourself. All species that eat red meat hate other species, and their own species and each other, and themselves. Eat and ate have the same letters: the e is put at the end of ate. The end of eating becomes ate. Ate is hate. The Rift valley is only 5 million years old, but the slit happened from the inside. The cut of the Rift Valley was slit from the inside of the earth. The underbelly of the African tectonic plate was slit 20 million years before that slit finally reached the surface of Africa to create the Rift Valley.

War is created by breaking the peace, by breaking things into pieces. When was the first peace broken? When the first stones were broken into implements/tools that were used to kill living creatures with. When the first human ape broke the first piece of stone apart into pieces to make tools. When walking apes first broke stones into pieces, using the broken pieces to kill with. What is war? It is a broken piece of stone used to kill with. It is a state of the broken Past. War is were. War is the first state of raw rage when the first human apes became so angry: all they saw was red. War spelled backwards is raw. War is the RAWR growl of the killing lion who is at war with all living creatures all his life. War was created when the 1st stones were broken into pieces and used to create raw red bleeding wounds. War is a state of the past when the 1st human apes saw red and broke their first stones into broken pieces. We were at war, we lived in a state of crisis, in the past when the entire land of Africa was exploding with volcanoes. Our ancestors lived in a world where the sky was red all the time. When you see red: you lose all reason. You regress back to the state of raw war: when the entire Earth was raw red. We were not aware of the past. We were not aware of ourselves. We were not aware of the inner conflicts raging inside us. We did not even know why there was a war. We absorbed the Earth at war with itself into ourselves and then projected it out. We projected our inner state of bleeding rawness, our traumas, our wounds, our hurt, our anger, our rage, our inner conflicts, our inner contradictions, our inner state of war outwards and we are still doing it today. By this classic projection we avoided feeling our inner pain, in this way we avoided facing our inner selves. We avoided being human. We avoided our designed purpose on Earth. We hid from ourselves, we hid from the world around us. We are still hiding from the world we live on.

By breaking stones into pieces: we broke the peace of Life on the surface of the Earth: just as the unbroken crust of the living Earth was first broken into tectonic plates. Creating huge massive inorganic plates of armor grinding and pressing against each other in the state of perpetual mindless opposition conflict called war. Our ancestors were not aware that they were recreating this state of the inorganic earth's state of continual oppositional state of warfare. They were not aware that as living organisms, they had defected to the other side. They were just mindlessly projecting their raw red rage outwards, recreating red raw bleeding wounds, at a time when the earth was at war with all organic life. When they began breaking stones into pieces, they were not aware that they were the rage of all organic life against the inorganic earth.

After the Age of Volcanoes died out, our ancestors did not change their ways, by breaking stones into pieces our ancestors destroyed the burgeoning new peace of the Earth; we became the enemy of the new peaceful living Earth. Living animals are not designed to become enemies of the raw red earth. Stones are raw earth. Stone is raw. Earth is created by the breaking of stones into red soil. Which part of the earth did our ancestors copy? The crust, the inorganic mantle; the tectonic plates of the earth: the most superficial part of the living earth. The deadest part of the living inorganic earth. Tectonic plates fight for dominance: the loser goes under, and the winner goes on top of the loser: burying it under his superior weight and size and power. This inorganic, tectonic dynamic of mindless grinding opposition is what we are still doing today: it's called adversarial competition: modern capitalism.

An important reason for continued tool-use by our early ancestors, i.e. separation, was not only the advantage of making food portable, but the fact that cutting food into segments drastically slows down the rotting process. Any food that is cut up into small pieces takes much longer to rot than when it is whole. Carrying food cut up into small pieces allowed them to travel longer distances without having to stop and look for food; this increased the range of their mobility.

The evolutionary result of eating half-rotted, cut-up, burnt, boiled food for over 2 million years is obvious. 'You are what you eat.' By adapting to a lower quality of dead-burnt food, we became desensitized: our taste buds, our sense of smell, our hearing and our reflexes, all became de-sensitized. Our bodies became weaker and weaker. To the same extent that hominids shaped and used tools; their tools used and shaped them. The more we use tools: the more the tools we use shape us and define us. The story of hominid-human is the de-evolution of a living animal being shaped by its living environment, to a living animal using dead tools to shape a dead artificial environment, to dead tools using living animals to shape a dead environment by using more dead tools, to tools using humans to shape and create more dead tools. This was and still is the de-evolution of living intelligence descending into the mindless worship of death and the mindless worship of destruction by civilized humans. Over millions of years the accumulative effect of one-sided separation-segmentation-accumulation changed our awareness by using these dead things called tools. It resulted in a change of how we focused. It resulted in a unique characteristic of hominid-human awareness: pyramidal focus.

Focusing narrowly upon one thing at a time; blocking out all Outer Awareness and all Inner Awareness.

The 4th Major Imbalanced Split

What is generally completely ignored in the 4.7 million year span of hominids evolving into humans; is that this entire evolutionary process was going on only in the upper half of this animal. And that this imbalanced split became more and more pronounced. It is the widening chasm of this imbalanced split within the body between the upper and lower half which finally produced the growing imbalanced split between instinct and learning. It is this split which is the most crucial of all, and the most intangible. It is the culmination of hominid-human evolutionary change into a new way of living-surviving. Not by instinct or animal cunning; but through experiential learning. Needing to accumulate process and digest more experiential knowledge, needing more brain capacity to learn how to use tools: its brain grew in size and complexity. The two hemispheres of its brain became more self-reflective, more split off from the body, less connected to the biofeedback systems of the body. As this went on, it came to the fourth major imbalanced adaptive split of hominid evolution. Its brain grew so large that the growth of the fetus split into two stages.

1st Stage; Inside the womb

2nd Stage; Outside the womb.

The time inside the womb increased until it took 9 months inside the womb for the fetus to be born. Its earliest formative development consisted of a balanced split between inside and outside the womb. The time outside the womb also increased... until it took 9 months of living outside the womb before the born fetus finally became a full-fledged baby able to walk. No other animal fetus develops this slowly outside the womb. No other animal takes 9 months to learn how to stand up and walk. But then again... no other animal walks on only two legs; learning this is not an easy task.

Its evolution of imbalanced splitting reached the stage where it was split at birth; split off from the safety of its womb, split off from the Inner universe-environment it was a part-of. Its integrated conscious awareness split off from its integrated instinctual awareness. It was no longer connected-to and subject-to the changing energies of its ecosystem. Its unique form of split awareness came to shape its entire future. But one thing was not imbalanced: and that was the dynamic balance of Inner and Outer fetal growth and Inner and Outer human awareness. This is what makes us unique: we are the only animal that can look inside itself, and explore our Inner Universe just as well as we can look outside ourselves and explore our Outer Universe.

What the basic process of hominid tool-use did for millions of years was this: it separated things into segments... and by repeatedly doing this, these segments accumulated. The bulk of evidence of our past comes from this accumulation. No other animal leaves behind accumulated evidence of their past as our ancestors did. No other animal leaves behind accumulations of things to the extent tool-using apes did.

Restatement of Hominid-Human Evolutionary Development:

The First major imbalanced split: into two body-function zones.

The Second major imbalanced split: splitting things with tools.

The Third major imbalanced split: reversing the Dynamic using a tool to create another tool.

The Fourth major imbalanced split: the splitting of fetal development into two separate stages: inside and outside the womb.

This created the unique human split awareness of the Inner Self and the Outer Self.

The 5th Major Imbalanced Split

The increase of brain size resulted from the increased neural complexity of the brain itself. The dynamic process we are talking about here is called reflectivity. The increased neural complexity of the evolving hominid brain allowed these neural signals to not only bounce around in a more highly dynamic and complex fashion, it also allowed them to bounce back as well, creating self-awareness. Replace the words: bounce back with: bio-feedback and you have the dynamic of mental reflectivity.

What is an organism? It is a set of organized organs that cooperate with each other and communicate with each other intelligently. The point is: depending on what these organisms are, and how they are made; and how they function and what their purpose is; determines what they communicate, how they communicate and why they communicate. A dog is an aware organism. So is a human. The difference between a dog and a human is its brain. When a dog's brain tells it it's thirsty, it gets up and goes to the water bowl. When a human brain tells it it's thirsty, those neural signals bounce back and it has a thought which tells it: "I feel thirsty." This virtually instantaneous feedback is called self-awareness. It is the reason humans act differently from all other mammals. It is the reason why humans developed as they did. It is the reason why all humans act as they do. When a human feels thirsty, they think about what they feel... "Is it worth getting up now and going to the fridge? Or should I go later ... Better to wait for the commercials... then I'll go get something to drink... then I won't miss anything on TV." Dogs don't do this. Dogs don't think about doing something before they do it. Their brains do not bounce back their senses inside the brain before they decide to act or not act, or react or not react.

For the first time in the Universe's existence, there was such a thing as an animal awareness that is almost completely separated-isolated-insulated from the Outer Universe. For the first time in existence: reflective loneliness was created. And with that loneliness: being forced unprepared to face the outer world, out of a birth canal that was structurally too narrow for the increased size of its brain came pain and fear. Animals can experience pain and fear, but none of them experience it reflectively, and none of them experience it as being reflectively alone. This is the crucial difference in a reflective neural pattern, the perception of fear can bounce back, feeding upon itself, becoming distorted out of proportion to any actual danger. As FDR said: "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself."

Because reflective self-awareness is a faster form of biofeedback than all others, it allows humans to learn and adapt faster. Experiential adaptation outstripped and replaced genetic adaptation as its basic survival technique. The dynamic of experiential feed-back enabled them to adapt to their environment so quickly and so well, that the laws of natural selection no longer applied to them. Our ancestors stopped evolving genetically because they didn't need to adapt genetically in order to survive. Their form of adaptation became experiential rather than genetic. The wherewithal by which this was accomplished was tool-use.

It took hominids at least 4 million years to develop tool-use to the level of sophistication that could supplant genetic adaptation with learning. Enter this new sub-species; separated from the rest of the natural Universe. This brand-new form of awareness begins to perceive the Universe around it separately; it begins to perceive all things around it separately... Its form of communication honed and evolved by millions of years of increasingly complex, sophisticated, specialized needs which the development of tools necessitated: creating the final reflective evolution of the tool... the tool-brain.

The development of tool-use created the dynamic of reflectivity. This process took millions of years to become faster as the specialized neural pathways of tool-use separated more and more from the genetic totality of the animal. This resulted in a neural imbalance. Hominids did not need their legs, their stomachs, their hips, their chests or internal organs to create tools. The tool-using dynamic was a closed link running from brain-to hand-to eye-to tool-to object. The rest of the body was not involved. This is the process which enabled hominids to narrow their awareness down to the narrowed focus needed for tool-use. This also, by necessity, made them less aware of their surroundings. This made them develop the habit and ability of pyramidal focus: the tendency to look narrowly only at one thing while ignoring other things around them. This is what tool-use fostered. It is one of the most obvious behavioral trademarks of the human species; we look at things, react to things, think about things, feel about things, act on things, basically like hen-pecking chickens, narrowly; focusing and obsessing on one thing at a time without being aware of any greater context, without any interest in gaining any broader perspective. This was the Fifth and final major imbalanced split of hominid-human Evolution. It split our awareness into two separate dynamics and aspects:

No.1: Inner Awareness

No.2: Outer Awareness

That is, these two aspects became more separate in us; than in any other animal. It no coincidence that Human bio-feedback is 5-sided, and human evolution comes from 5 major splits, and we have 5 fingers on each hand. It is no coincidence that the split of human Inner Awareness and human Outer awareness was created when the developmental growth of the human fetus was split into 2 stages: growing inside the womb for 9 months and then continuing its growth outside the womb for 9 months before becoming able to walk on its own.

The 6th Major Imbalanced Split: the Amnesia of Being Born

The sixth separation from ourselves as an integrated healthy organism marks the total separation of our instinctive wisdom and from Nature. What is this 6th split? It is the total block of amnesia, the complete lack of memory that all humans have of their earliest years growing up as a baby. Not being able to remember their own birth. Not able to remember being born. Why? Because the amount and degree of trauma and pain caused by being raised unnaturally inside the artificial environment of civilization is so monstrously damaging and filled with agony: it cannot be completely experienced; it has to be blocked out. Healthy adult dogs can still play as they did when they were babies because the integrity of their personality and life is still a connected integrated whole. They have not forgotten what it is like to be a happy playful puppy. Unhealthy dogs that never learned how to play and have fun, dogs that have been turned permanently sour on life, dogs that have been permanently traumatized into neuroses have forgotten what it was like to be a playful puppy because they were never given a chance to play. Dogs that were never given the love and affection they needed, dogs that were never given a healthy environment to grow up in; have no whole, integrated healthy personality that is both young and old: where their youngest experiences are connected to their oldest experiences.

Science has tried to rationalize this by assuming that babies are not able to retain any memory until a certain period of their brain development which is necessary for retention of memory is complete and total hogwash. The range of total amnesia in early human development spans from 1 yr to 10 yrs. If you study the phenomenon of mental blocks and amnesia, you will find that it is caused by traumatic events which are too painful to remember. The brain of a 10 yr-old child is not the same as the brain of a 2-yr old child. Yet in both cases the amnesia, the total lack of all memory before a certain time exists in all human beings regardless of at what age it occurs. This major split off from our natural self: off from our natural personality, our true original nature at an early age; the loss of our roots; the loss of the memory of our birth, marks the traumatic split of our separation from our true selves. There is no biological reason why humans can't remember their own birth.

The Use of Fire as a Tool:

Science has never applied what we know today of the effects of trauma on the human psyche to the conditions which our ancestors lived in. But that is exactly what needs to be applied to the study of our origins if we are to understand ourselves. We come from a genetically peaceful species that once dwelt in a pastoral paradise of Eden, living in trees. Having their world burnt down around them for millions of years. Forced to come down from their trees and walk on the ground. Forced to stand up on two legs and fight. Being wiped out into near extinction countless times... traumatized and terrified: by the horror of an exploding world gone mad with the erupting fires of huge volcanic disasters and terrifying earth quakes, smoke and ash covering the skies, terrorized and attacked and killed by predators on the ground: millions of years of trauma, vulnerability, living in constant fear. This is what shaped us into what we are today, and it is what Science does not want to study. And the major result of this unexperienced trauma which was preserved was our worship of volcanoes and fire.

Which came first; the use of fire or the use of hand tools? Volcanoes had already been burning down whole areas of Africa for 25 million years. Long before the invention of hand tools. Fire was the first tool ever used simply because it is much easier to get food by starting a grass fire or a forest fire: than hunting dangerous animals using a few small hand tools. Anthropology has uncovered this one common fact concerning the oldest tribal cultures they have studied. Stone-age tribes all over the world regularly set fire to entire landscapes. Fire was used as a form of mass slaughter to kill animals with, so they could eat the roasted flesh of the dead carcasses left behind. This may sound grisly: but it is an anthropological fact. This fact is a truth that modern humans do not want to face. We do not want to admit that our ancestors were a race of mass murderers long before they ever even began inventing hand tools. We copied volcanoes before we ever invented hand tools. We set fire to entire forests and plains long before we entered the Serengeti Plains where this tactic did not work.

This fact explains the entire remaining history of our species. It explains why the first hand tools used only to butcher dead carcasses why we never became very good hunters until much later. It explains why we left Africa only after volcanic eruptions and earthquakes stopped. This truth about our ancestors must be faced and dealt with if we are ever to evolve beyond our penchant for mindless mass destruction and mass slaughtering... which our ancestors practiced for at least 3.4 million years. The excuse that there is no evidence to prove this because all the evidence was burnt is not valid. All the evidence points to our ancestors using fire as a tool of mass-murder.

The dynamics of the use of fire and tools are very much alike. The basic dynamic and process of fire and tool-use is basically the same: separation, segmentation and accumulation: with the same basic result: a systematic massive destruction of the whole environment. Each begat the other: in a strict causal order: organically: logically; inevitably. Volcanoes created the worship of fire and the use of fire by crazed traumatized insane gibbering apes. The use of fire as a destructive tool created the use of destructive hand tools. Our ancestors were not peaceful pastoral cows; they became destroyers. 25 million years of volcanoes and earthquakes destroying the lands they lived on made them this way. 25 Million years of environmental violence, savagery and terror turned them into a permanently crazed species obsessed with death, destruction and dying.

Before we were ever forced from our trees to walk on two legs, we worshipped the volcano gods and the predatory killers on the ground. Our ancestors worshipped brute force. They worshipped mindless inhuman blind mass destruction. They internalized their trauma and projected it out: for the same reason that human children and babies internalize trauma, and later externalize it... because if they didn't: they would have died before they ever had a chance to live. They would have wept and screamed and cried, and died for a simple reason. Nature attacks any sign of weakness. Nature hates all signs of vulnerability. Nature hates all sensitivity. The more sensitive and fragile and innocent and beautiful a living organism is... the shorter its life on earth: the more quickly it is attacked and destroyed and killed.

Fire replaced both the center and the defensive outer rim of the tribal band; it replaced the living center of the band: weakest-youngest in the center of the band, it also replaced the most powerful-bravest defenders outside on the rim of the band. It replaced any need for using defensive weapons at night around the perimeter. Instead of a growing-nurturing living tree being the center of their life and society... it was fire... it was The Destroyer: the God they worshipped which kept them safe that became their safe-center of worship. This was a polarizing reversal in how they lived. With a larger inner ring of tool-making around that fire, which replaced the need for any personal closeness, bravery, courage, strength, intimacy...health, love, their entire defense against attack at night by predators became a false psychological advantage of using the instinctive fear of fire all animals have except us. Our ancestors mastered their own instinctive fear of fire, they stopped listening to their instinctive fears, their instincts that told them that that fire was bad... evil... powerful... too hot to handle or touch. Even though they feared the night, they were protected from attack by the predators and the dark by worshipping their God and feeding their God all night so he burned and burned and burned all night. They could raise generations of fear-filled apes... they could smell of fear all their lives...and still not be killed by predators at night. In addition, their superficial-false fearlessness at night was balanced by superficial-false fearlessness in the daytime by the advantages of their tools, when they did not have fire to protect them. Their entire fear dynamic became submerged down to a subconscious state... an unconscious level. Until they lived in a subconscious state of fear day and night... but were not conscious of it. They were protected by their Fire God and by their tools until they no longer needed body-hair to keep them warm at night.

Fire was one of the original root reasons for the creation of human selfishness. By huddling around wood-burning fires. By killing trees that had once been their living companions they had once hugged, to keep artificially safe from predators and stay warm at night. By doing this for more than one million years we lost our ability to keep our bodies warm during the daytime also. Turning inwards at night with only enough space for a small number of walking apes to warm themselves near the fire, while others outside the innermost circle froze.

This dynamic of huddling around artificial warmth for more than one million years intensified the inwards focus of their social groups. The outward dynamics of openness, giving, generosity, and sharing; withered and died. A single fire can only warm a small group of people. Fire destroyed their natural intelligence, and abilities on many levels and in many ways. By its hypnotic flames which they stared at... deadening their awareness during the cold evenings and nights. The fire itself prevented these apes from becoming intelligent enough to make more than one fire. At the precise time our subconscious is designed to become active; and digest our daily experiences interconnectively to all three awareness levels of our brain, they built their fires and stared at them mindlessly without using the natural reflectivity of their minds to learn by reflecting upon their lives and what happened that day. .

Humans are designed to go out into the Outer Space of Nature everyday. And then come back, and go inwards into the Inner Spaces of their Inner Universe... and compare the two journeys, and learn by comparing and evaluating them to each other. Fire destroyed this natural bio-feedback dynamic. It prevented them from becoming sensitive to the stillness of their Inner Selves, and the wonder of the living Outer world. When they came back every day and lay down to rest, fire destroyed the stillness of their mind and their senses. It replaced their inner focus on their experiences with focusing on the fire and letting their minds go blank. It destroyed the whole evening-night time dynamic of our lives. It became used as an artificial distraction; so they could avoid being aware of their inner selves. It robbed them of the stillness need to think logically. The flames were never still... they were always darting around, up and down. All they had to do was watch the flames and 90% of their brain became occupied and busy and distracted. They were no longer mentally still, and quiet they no longer needed to have a sensitive awareness to sense if any predators were near or creeping closer. Once they made a fire: they could safely numb their awareness by staring at the flames and worship the Fire-God hiding in the flames. They could safely numb everything; all the organic-hormonal processes that were painful could be numbed. All painful insights and realizations could be numbed, and deflected... by staring at the deflecting flames in a hypnotic trance which exists in all humans to this day. Every human who makes a fire stares at it for a long time. Look at a burning fire and your mind will automatically go blank. You will stop all your thinking processes. Look at the flames of a fire, and you will become distracted and hypnotized, and drugged, and be automatically lulled into a false sense of artificial warmth and security by its distracting flames, and radiating heat. Why do you think so many people watch TV today? It's the same dynamic.

The selfish exclusiveness of being the only animals with fire. The selfish exclusiveness of huddling around a fire like so many cowards, using it as a false shield of defense turned them into cowards. Using fire to warm only a small exclusive band of apes for over a million years... created a false selfishness and false superiority that is not exhibited by any other animal

Fire took over the social-structural center of their nighttime existence. The center of their sleeping social structure was no longer themselves... it was the fire. Because the fire gave off more heat than they could generate by sleeping close together touching each other all night. Giving warmth to another person and that other person giving warmth back to you all night as an equal exchange on a close, intimate level of touching-snuggling-loving was corrupted. An entire lifetime of nights sleeping together as a single band with the smallest-weakest members in the center was corrupted. The entire concept of living-for and sleeping-for and dying for their own band was corrupted. Instead, they lived-for, slept-for, and died for their tools. They lived only so they could make more tools. They slept only so they could burn wood in a fire all night and surround that fire and worship it and focus on it. What fire did was it ingrained the habit of pyramidal focus hominids needed for tool-making and tool-use. For at least one million years during the night, hominids stared-focused at one thing: a fire. Only humans stare at things which are not moving for a long time. Other animals only see things when they move. We focus on things that don't move. No other animal does that.

It was this form of focus which allowed hominids to evolve into a species whose dominant perception was looking-at, being aware-of, perceiving only one thing at a time: while blocking out all peripheral awareness. Looking at only one thing at a time made their awareness more segmental in nature. They developed a segmental awareness of their environment. This finally resulted in their perceiving everything around them one segment at a time: perceiving everything around them segmentally, selectively, and pyramidally.

No other animal possesses this form of dominant pyramidal focus which is both segmental and selective in nature. No other animal always looks at only one thing as selectively as we do. No other animal is habitually aware of only one thing at a time. Much less a fire: staring at it all night has the effect of ruining one's night vision. The use of fire was one major shift in freeing hominids from their eco-system, their place in Nature. They could now survive in colder climates. It was a major shift of imbalance: perceptually, ecologically and biologically. What gives meat more flavor when it is cooked? Fried? Roasted? Baked? Rotisseries? Ka-bobbed? Etc? The answer is Carbon. We only eat meat when it is browned and carbonized. Steamed or boiled meat that is not browned and blacked we don't like as much. We generally turn our noses up at steamed or boiled meat in preference to a nicely browned piece of roasted browned meat which has been slightly carbonized. Even though steamed meat is much more nutritious and healthier than carbonized meat. We have become addicted to the taste of eating carbonized meat by at least 1 million years of using fire to cook meat with. With the introduction of carbonized-burnt food into our diet came also the introduction of cancer into our bodies.

Why do chefs the world over, put black or white pepper on top of almost everything whether it is cooked or not? Because for one million years: we cooked our food over a wood-burning fire. One million years of black and white ashes settling on all the food we cooked over a wood fire. Black specks of blackened and whitened carbon. That gave us blackened organs and carbonized innards and ultimately: the disease of cancer. Because we still want a hotness in our food whether it is cooked or not. We want an extra hotness to our food, just to slightly burn our palates when we eat it. When was the first craze for pepper? When did the first craze to sprinkle hot black specks onto food appear? In Europe when the first modern European stoves replaced open-hearth cooking. When rich, elite Europeans found themselves eating food without black and white specks of soot on it. They missed their dearly beloved specks of cancer-causing carbon. Then Europeans discovered spices; black and white pepper: it instantly became an elite luxury fad... sprinkling black and white specks pepper on their food replaced the white and black specks of soot they were used to.

Where did the use of fire come from? From 25 million years of African volcanoes creating fires which destroyed entire forests and cooked and burned all the animals in them to a crisp. From 25 million years of African volcanoes spewing black and white ashes over everything it killed and burned to death. From our ancestors eating the dead, roasted carcasses of animals killed by African volcanoes... This was how we developed a taste for cooked dead meat. From our ancestors worshipping the mighty pyramidal power of destructive volcanoes for 25 fucking million years: that is where our great invention of using fire to cook with came from. What is the sound of clapping? The sound of a crowd clapping their hands together recreates the crackling sound of fire burning the plains of Africa to a blackened, dead crisp. How many millions of years did Volcanoes set the grasses of the Veldt on fire? How many millions of years did our ancestors recreate this sound with joy and approval? Happy in the knowledge that dead roasted bodies of burnt animals would soon be waiting for them to eat and feast upon. Why humans make smoke, why humans smoke pipes filled with burning opium or tobacco, why humans burn their food; comes from 25 million years of volcanoes creating mass death for our pleasure.

As an example of what I mean by one-sided segmentation becoming an intrinsic and inseparable part of human life and tool-use, think of what people do when they cook: they cut up things... and then mix these cut-up things and creatively manipulate them through a process... until it is considered to be edible. In actuality, almost none of this process is necessary for most food to be eaten and digested. Only later were such varieties as dried beans, and stored grains, and tubers added because humans found could they could release their nutritional value through heating them. Today, most of the food we eat is heated regardless of whether it actually needs to be heated in order for it to be digested or not. The ingrained habit and custom and tradition of heating your food so it is burnt so most of its nutritional value is destroyed, is over one millions years old and is completely irrational.

What else did fire do to them? Fire made their lives easier: they did not have to get up and be active when it was coldest, just before dawn. They could just throw more wood on the fire and go back to sleep. Instead of going to sleep when there was no more light, they could create their own light. As a result; they were no longer challenged by their natural environment. By using tools and fire; our ancestors could separate themselves from the natural cycles, forces, elements and hardships of Nature. All the things which had previously challenged them, and made living interesting and exciting, and naturally difficult became boring and easy. As long as they had tools and fire; they could avoid many hardships of Nature. They could escape many of the natural difficulties which they were designed to undergo in order to evolve naturally as a genetically integrated organism.

Before fire our ancestors had no choice but to follow the clock of the Sun, their bodies were controlled and balanced by the natural circadian cycles of the seasons and eco-systems: but with fire, they could stay up longer, go to bed later... so they woke up groggy, with a dulled awareness. The result was a bad night's sleep. One million years of going to sleep at the wrong time, and waking up at the wrong time gave them a permanently dulled awareness. It dulled both their sleeping awareness and the waking-conscious awareness. With a nightly fire, they did not need to be sensitive to any night-sounds since the fire kept predators at bay. It allowed them to eat cooked food: which killed many delicate enzymes in their food... which made that food harder to digest, which forced their bodies to deplete themselves of enzymes in order to replace the missing enzymes in their food, which created an enzyme imbalance, an enzyme deficiency in their bodies... which ultimately dulled their life-energy, their awareness, their senses... so they became desensitized. But it gave them the exact kind of dulled awareness necessary for making and using tools by training their awareness each night. By staring at the flames of the fire each night, they became habituated to staring at only one thing for a long time: consequently, they became better tool-users.

By becoming totally dependant upon tools and fire, we no longer needed to evolve genetically in order to survive. Instead of evolving ourselves: we evolved our tools and our use of fire. This was how the Path of human evolution was set. Evolving;

Tool-use.	Instead of:	Human-use,
Laziness	Instead of	Hardship
Pyramidal Focus	Instead of:	Non-pyramidal Focus
Dulled Awareness.	Instead of:	The Awareness of Pure Wonder
A sense of artificial safety	Instead of:	An intelligent alertness and awareness of everything near them and around them all the time

The point is the use of tools, including the use of fire dulls human awareness and narrows it. One million years of going to sleep at the wrong time and getting up at the wrong time efficiently killed much of our natural sense of Pure Wonder: it corrupted the circadian cycles of our body-brain awareness. As a result, we lost that sharpness of awareness which comes with waking just before daybreak; we lost the need to be intensely aware of our surroundings, we lost the sensitivity of our awareness that was needed in order to survive without tools, and in this process of dulling our awareness in order to use tools better; we lost our Sense of Pure Wonder. The point is, you are what you use: you become what you use. What you use; uses you to the same extent that you use it. Fire is a crude, inorganic form of combustion energy which consumes everything it touches. As a result of using fire for more than 1 million years: we have become mindless organic consumers with the mindless intelligence level of a voracious all-consuming fire. If we had not begun using fire: we would not be consumers today, we would not be consuming the entire earth and mindlessly destroying it.

Fire ended the natural hardships which kept them fit, and alert, it ended the entire organic social structure of the band: it ended the role model of the strongest being protectors of the weakest, it ended the perimeter of the band being defended; it ended their need to fight off preying killers during the night. It ended the Law of Survival of the Fittest. Before, if they were attacked: it was the oldest, the strongest who died so the youngest might live. But with fire; even after having passed their physical prime, even when they could not defend themselves, they could keep on getting older and older, they could still survive; they could still fuck and have more babies. Fire stopped our ancestors being genetically programmed to raise males to willingly and voluntarily sacrifice themselves for the greater good of the band, the tribe and the species. It ended cuddling together and hugging each other for warmth when it was cold. It ended personal warmth. Fire ended the genetically designed touching that comes from eight full hours of body-contact while sleeping together. It stopped our ancestors practicing physical closeness intimacy out of natural necessity. They no longer had to sleep together with the youngest in the center... teaching them by genetic structure, that it is the center, the core of the band which is most important, and that the strongest males on the perimeter are the most expendable. This genetic wisdom exists in the most intelligent and newest species of mammals who live on the ground and are not predatory killers: musk ox, bison, water buffalo.

Procreating mature male mammals generally have the shortest life span of their species. One would think that because they are the strongest, that they should live longer than the smaller, weaker members of their species should. But this is not the case. Anthropologists will tell you that most mammal species survive by the strongest protecting the weakest of their own species. The entire myth of only the strong surviving, and the weak dying: is a, twisted civilized lie. A weak newborn baby is protected by the strongest in the herd or pack. This dynamic of strength vs. weakness exists only in mating rituals. And even there, it is only a fitness test: not a fight to the death. It is enacted so the healthiest-strongest males of each species can pass on their genes to the next generation instead of the weakest-most sickly. Young and old creatures that are weaker than the strongest males in their prime were never designed by Nature to be slaughtered by stronger males of their species merely because of the physical attributes of size and strength.

Fire corrupted the necessary genetic closeness of our ancestors by changing the entire sleeping dynamic and structure of the band. Its people no longer slept together... with the youngest sleeping in the center... With the youngest babies and children being kept the warmest... feeling loved, protected by their loving elders, every night of their young lives... That genetically planned closeness during sleep is what all married couples base their closeness on. They can be apart from each other all day... But they know that come the night, they will be safe, and loved; sleeping in the arms of their loved ones. Fire corrupted the entire process of necessary physical closeness that Nature had provided for them... so they could grow up to be courageous and loving during the daytime also.

Another thing fire did to us genetically was after weakening the natural heat glands so we did not develop our natural ability to produce heat when young: our ancestors began using caves to live in. Simply because it was warmer to have a fire inside a cave than outside in the open where all the heat of the fire disappeared into the night air. Inside a cave, the heat of a fire is reflected back. Out in the open, the heat escapes out into the air and does not come back.

One important biological fact that very few people know about is that all humans have heat glands which if properly developed when young: can heat your body so well that you will not need clothes, or a cave or a house for the rest of your life to stay warm. This is a biological fact. We lost our ability to stay warm because of using fire to stay warm. By using an artificial heat source to live, we became addicted to artificial ways to survive. But we did not really lose our heat glands; we still have them; we have just stopped raising babies and children outdoors without any artificial heat source. If you raise human babies without swaddling them in layers of clothes. If you let them live outside day and night without clothes or fire or anything to keep them warm: they will be just fine. They will develop their heat glands properly and stay warm all the time regardless of the temperature or the weather.

Our ancestors were not taught the practical value of closeness and intimacy. The fire kept them warm: not each other's body heat. Fire prevented them from developing their heat glands, which every human being is equipped with. Because of this artificial warmth: they lost their ability to develop their Courage. The invention of using Fire turned them into a race of cowards. The invention of Fire forced them to huddle together around the warmth of the fire instead of each ape sleeping separately. This too-close huddling made their sex hormones to become over-active. They started doing something no other ape does: they started having sex every night to keep warm. They started having too many babies, they started overpopulating themselves. They became naked apes with heat glands which lay undeveloped because they used fire. Nature had supplied them with all they needed to live: and instead of using what Nature gave them, they became corrupted by their worship of the Fire Gods: the Gods of the Volcano that kept them warm and safe during the night. Naked apes who fucked every night to create body heat because their heat glands were not working. Naked apes who huddled around a fire at night because they had never been given the chance to develop their heat glands when they were growing up. Naked apes: the most dominant species on earth: cowering in fear, becoming craven cowards... all because of the artificial advantage that fire gave them, not because they could not defend themselves, not because they couldn't kill any predator who attacked or threatened them, because they could have... but because they used the artificial ease of having a fire as an artificial defense against being attacked at night instead of defending themselves by standing up and facing their foes. Instead of standing up and facing their enemies: they lay down on the job and let the night-time predators prowl all night all around them without challenging their rule... Fire destroyed the process of natural selection of Nature which all other living creatures live by. The human species became an exception to the rule. Instead of cowards being killed off and the brave ones surviving. The cowards survived, while courageous apes that did not use the artificial advantage of fire were killed off.

The African Veldt hasn't changed appreciably in millions of years. No other eco-system does that. Why? Look at the history of changing eco-systems over the last six million years. They have all changed beyond recognition; except the African Veldt.

Why?

Because the African Veldt being in the tropics escaped the effects of the Ice-Ages? Because this ecosystem is the original dominant eco-system of the earth ...? Because it exports species, lifestyles and adaptations but never imports them? Why? The size of its animals has become smaller: but then again... so has the size of all mammals over the Earth. The African Veldt has remained the most savage and competitive ecosystem on Earth for mammals. Mammals in the African Veldt experience more catastrophic population reductions, faster, more often, than anywhere else on Earth. Science has documented this unique phenomenon on the African Veldt. This dynamic still exists today on the African Veldt. Every species... all of them... all the grazing animals, all the predators, all the reptiles, all go through cyclic explosions of population and shrunken numbers where only the hardest are left alive. This recurring cycle of being nearly exterminated led our ancestors to start using fire as a protection from the desperate, starving predators who could not be warned off by a few harmless sticks or clubs or spears... Fire saved them from extinction... but it also changed them. It changed them into using this crisis-tool all the time... They found that fire was useful in keeping off nightly predators whether they were starving or not.

This entire planned, healthy, genetically balanced part of our ancestor's ecosystem was corrupted by them using fire not only as a crisis-tool, but also as an every-day tool. They found that no creature would willingly even go near anything that smelt of burning wood. To those night creatures; the smell of burning wood meant only one thing: Fear. Flee. Flee from the horrible heat and waves of crackling flames that consumes everything in their path. Flee from the thing that kills everything in its path. Flee from the one thing that does not discriminate when it kills. Flee from the thing that kills the largest most powerful predators that was, and still is their genetically programmed response to the smell of a fire burning wood. But if you burn something else like odorless gas, they have no problem approaching campers in the middle of the night who mistakenly think their light and fire will protect them from marauding bears. That is why so many camping incidents of people being attacked by predators at night are campers without a wood-burning fire. Fire became their false courage... it became their protector... it became their guardian, it became their crutch. They quickly got used to using fire every day: and found that now they could not live without it. Bands that lost their ability to make fire perished. Bands that did not lose this new survival aid flourished.

Instead of the entire band solidly packed together into a single cohesive mass of touching-nestling-loving-warm bodies, they were forced to sleep around a fire. The youngest lost their nightly feeling of safety and love... and they had to keep turning around all night to warm the cold side of their unprotected flanks... For the first time in our ancestor's history the young babies and children were forced to feel cold, and unprotected. For at least eight hours of every night of their formative years, they were forced to feel afraid... while they were sleeping, on an unconscious level... until they lived in a continual state of unconscious- subconscious fear. Did one million years of this practice make it a genetic trait? Are all humans genetically fear-filled at birth? That fear has been cast down through the ages by the corrupted sleeping practices of all our later hominid-human ancestors. Fire gave us huge benefits. But it has exacted a horrible dehumanizing toll on how we Eat, Sleep, Feel and Act. It weakened us, and forced us to constantly use only crisis-oriented tactics in order not just to survive any crisis, but to live every day using a crisis mentality, crisis oriented tools, crisis-structured societies.

Fire was one of the earliest innovations of hominid tool-use. It also remains one of the most sanctified, unquestioned practices today. Even when villagers know full well that they can easily survive a few chilly moments in the middle of the night if they only slept together instead of alone... even when they have to walk every day farther and farther to get firewood. Even when they can visibly see how they are destroying the very landscape around them and turning it into a mud-packed, filth-strewn, ugly, stinking mess... They still do not stint on their sacred nightly firewood. Anthropologists have documented all destruction of nearly all early human habitation as being due to the collection of firewood and the overgrazing of domesticated animals... but they cannot explain how even before civilization emerged, why old sites in caves and by streams also features this spread of devastation... when all the dwellers had to do was move a few thousand feet and be living in a beautiful, shaded, clean, healthy environment again. That is the numbing effect a million year-old repetitive tool-habit can have on our intelligence. You can still see this effect today, amongst the poorest and most ignorant. As they create their own filth, ugliness, and squalor... and live in it... and refuse to move out of it completely unaware that they are degrading not only their environment, but themselves as well. They remain unaware that they are creating their own filth, that they are creating their own misery and unhappiness: by literally choosing to live in the ugliest, filthiest places possible, and never moving away from that filth.

What happened when our ancestors replaced the living center of their social bands with fire? Was all waste originally thrown into the fire and consumed by it? Was fire originally an ecological cleansing tool, keeping the sleeping area free of all waste? Was this the beginning of humans living as consumers? Did the habit of consumption come from throwing everything un-needed into the fire? When did our human ancestors begin to create so much waste that their fires could not consume it all? What does this tell you about the emotional-mental states of the humans who lived in one area, in one cave for not only years but generations? More intelligent, happier, healthier hominids never did this. But we cannot find any trace of their remains... simply because they did not live in continual ignorant squalor. They were never stupid enough to stay in one spot long enough to create and accumulate their own filth and live in it.

If it is true that most of our Hominid ancestors never accumulated anything enough to be found millions of years later by anthropologists today. If the only former hominids modern anthropologists can study were the unhappiest, the most unintelligent, the most ignorant ones... who lived for years, even generations...in the same place, in squalor, in caves... and if it is impossible for anthropologists to study the intelligent ones: because they were never so stupid as to create such filth-places that can be found and studied today: then what does this say of the entire sanctification of poring over these garbage dumps?

How intelligent is it to study the fossilized remains of only the dumbest apes and not the most intelligent? Moreover, how did this stupid practice of not moving away from one nesting-ground begin at all? By our ancestors having a continually burning fire? Because they could not move the fire itself without burning themselves? Or by the ingrained ritual-habit of the ever-wider search for firewood becoming a blind, unthinking cultural tradition? Africans still denude their forests and destroy their own ecological environments because they ritually make a fire every night, no matter how cold or hot it is, and eat cooked food; when there are mountains of fresh vegetables and fruits and nuts available that do not need to be cooked.

If our ancestors did live in the African Veldt one thing is certain: none of them stayed there. They all ended up moving out or being kicked out and living somewhere else in Africa. Why? Did they cease being courageous, fearless, did they become lazy, afraid?. The artificial use of fire could be one of the causes for this. Once all the trees were gone they couldn't make a fire to keep themselves safe during the night from predators. That exodus from an ecosystem: a flat plain designed for walkers, where they at least had some kind of ecological usefulness, all just happened to coincide with the invention of using fire. But wait: a plain has little or no trees... Did they leave because they had cut down all the trees for firewood? Or did they leave before they found out how to use fire? Or were they forced out before they learned to use fire? One of the most common ways Stone Age tribes committed mass murder was to set fires to entire areas of grass or bush on fire, creating a maelstrom of burning death... and then going into that devastated, blackened, burned out hell to pick out roasted carcasses of dead animals caught in that firestorm. Did our ancestors burn down the forests on the east side of the Rift Valley? Was that the reason they were chased out of Eden? Nobody knows. There is no evidence. One thing about fire is that it destroys all evidence of its own crimes. The regenerative nature of the Veldt is so strong that it wipes away annually all evidence of the previous year's carnage. Hearths may well have existed on the Veldt, and there is no scientific way of determining whether there were hearths, unless you dig up the soil and try to find carbon deposits that were washed into the soil and dissipated by the rains each year. But that trace evidence would be so faint and so minimal, you could never know for sure whether that carbon came from a forest fire, a natural deposit, rotting vegetation or an artificial hearth used by humans. There are no cancer-causing carbon-pits called hearths found in the African Veldt. Hearths are all found around that area, outside that area, but not inside it. It may well be that the discovery of fire was also the creation of cowardice in our species, and all of the later vices our species invented and still practice may be traced to this single adaptation over a million years ago... Fire may have been the origin of human fear... and the reason for destructive human cowardice existing today. One thing is certain: the love in our hearts was replaced by the love of hearths, the love of watching things burn... the love of destruction, destroying and killing and burning the trees we once lived in.

But... if fire was used by our ancestors at night to ward off predators, and that screwed up their entire body metabolism. If they slept during the day and woke groggy, with dulled senses... if their senses were only habituated to the night-time crisis of the death, stalking them unseen in the night because not only did they never develop the night vision of a predator, but the fire dulled their vision even more. If all burning eyes became a sign of death. Then they would avoid each other's eyes in the day. Then they would lose the intimacy of seeing each others and looking at each other directly.

Then eyes, all burning eyes... all love eyes... would become forbidden because it reminded them too much of their burning death eyes they saw each night... then the death, the slow death of human love, of humans for each other; took a nosedive. Then their dulled senses in the day were only good for using tools... not for the sensitive intimacy of skin touching skin. When their entire culture became a fear of death, a fear of the unseen, a fear of other animals in the night and during the day. That was reflected and exaggerated in tall tales until the night animals became huge horrible monsters that killed and ate small children. Until humans developed a fear of all Nature... all animals. . Leave any group of humans in the African veldt with only simple tools, and fire, and see what kind of culture they create for themselves.

Fire may have been one of the most socially powerful destroyers of human love, intimacy, courage and honesty. It may have been the original reason why humans lost their sense of Pure Wonder. Instead of sharpened senses in the night when they could see better without staring at a fire instead of at a foe, their wonder became an invisible feeling of unseen fear, unseen terror and unseen horror during the night. Traumatic happenings at night could not be properly processed by subconscious minds sleeping in the early morning and day.

Our subconscious is genetically designed to process the experiences of each day between sunset and sunrise both consciously and subconsciously. Not between 5 am, and 3 pm in the afternoon. Every hour of sleep before midnight is twice as restful and regenerating than any sleep after midnight. Humans are designed to sleep before predators begin to prowl... And then stay up alert in the middle of the night...until they leave, and then catch a few winks before they get up again... with intensified senses...

to live in the daytime as in-between creatures: half-day, half-night creatures.

Humans are genetically designed to be both nighttime and daytime creatures. How were we genetically designed to sleep before fire, and before we became walking apes? Sleeping safely all night in trees. In brief 20-40 minute snatches. Awakening regularly to check for danger, and then going back to sleep. That form of sleep is even more restful than sleeping steadily all night, or going to bed before midnight. These facts have been documented and proven today. There has to be very good reasons for this. Why do we never sleep as we were genetically designed to sleep? How many times did we lose our natural, genetically designed sleep-cycles? Fire and tools are some of the reasons why. Exactly when it happened. Exactly how it happened...is merely a matter of details. The dynamics themselves were inevitable. The results were unavoidable. We live with these results today.

Fire separated us from Nature like no other tool did. It made us feel that all the living world of Nature... that all of its Beauty and Wonder was a cold, hostile, uncaring surroundings that made us shrink away from all of Nature, and build walls and separations, and protections against the outer world. Instead of living inside Nature... comfortably warm, and perfectly at home in our own furry coats that kept us warm all the time. Instead of using each other for warmth. Instead of using our natural abilities to survive and live. We used fire for warmth. As artificial warmth we did not need. But where did this use of fire come from? Why did we become the only animals to use fire instead of blindly fearing it like all the other animals? How did it happen?

If you go back in time and study what the ecosystems and plate tectonics of Africa were millions of years ago, the answer is there. Before apes ever walked. Before the Rift valley was ever created. Before the Serengeti Plain was ever created. Before Africa was ever split into two enormously different climate zones. Africa was shattered and devastated for at least twenty five million years by volcanic upheavals, eruptions and earthquakes. On a magnitude and scale so huge, so powerfully explosive and destructive that the only destructive power we can compare it to today is an atomic nuclear bomb going off. For 25 million years: volcanoes ruled the heart of Africa as it split apart. Hundreds of them: appearing and disappearing and re-appearing: all over the African continent.

The continent of Africa was not devastated by just one such volcano. It was attacked by hundreds of volcanoes. For at least 25 million years. Erupting at different times in different regions. And spreading their devastation for kilometers... even hundreds and thousands of kilometers... over huge areas of Africa. To give you a slight inking of the degree of volcanic activity there was: Greece was once buried under 400 feet of volcanic ash drifting over the Mediterranean from Africa.... Now if Greece was covered under 400 ft of ash as a peripheral effect of volcanic activity in Africa... how many hundreds or thousands of feet of ash was Africa buried under? Every living thing in the center of Africa; lived under, or near the threat of a volcano erupting. For at least 20 million years, they lived near or under volcanoes which could erupt without warning at any instant. This created a volcano culture in Africa. Living creatures and eco-systems adapted to the existence of a continual threat of complete annihilation. In order to survive and avoid complete extinction, the genetic instincts of panic and self-preservation were intensified. The ever-present threat of smoldering volcanoes, dormant volcanoes, newly growing volcanoes, increased the levels of awareness and the levels of watchfulness. Monkeys and apes acting as sentinels, designed to warn other animals on the ground if they saw any predators lurking around, were the last to panic. Their attention was focused downward, not up. They were safe sitting high in their trees. What happened to them for 25 million years when a volcano did erupt and all the animals panicked? They would have been the last ones to panic. The biggest ape with the worst sense of smell, and the slowest on the ground would have been the last to reluctantly leave the refuge of their trees. In fact, if their trees did not catch on fire: they would have stayed. Until the hot ash descended... then they would have hidden under the protecting canopy of the trees... until the heat became unbearable, until all the other animals were gone and they were the only ones left, until they began to realize that sitting in a tree would not keep them safe from the waves of pyroclastic gases and choking deadly dust clouds and the shockwave, and rumbling horror of a world suddenly gone mad. Only then would they have tried to get out of the area. The entire Earth would have been covered in a layer of ashes. Stepping on ashes is not fun when you cannot tell if the ashes are cool or burning hot. Walking on hot ashes would have been burned the soles of their feet. Could this be when our ancestors first danced... hopping around fires ignited by falling volcanic material, dancing in blistering pain, and running back to the safety of their trees?

The incendiary heat of the ashes covering the ground and all the trees and bushes and plants would cause small areas to catch on fire, or just one plant would suddenly burst into flame. Dry grass would have burst spontaneously into flame. Lush green vegetation would have acted as a natural fire extinguisher; preventing the small individual flames from growing into a full-fledged forest fire. Only the driest and thinnest plants would have burned. Depending on how thick the ashes were, and how hot the volcanic ash was: there could have been anywhere from an entire conflagration, or barely a wisp of smoke. It depended all on the intensity of the heat, and hotness and thickness of the ash. It also depended upon how wet or dry the forests and plants were, and how fire resistant the vegetation was. But not during the dry season. Then, everything would have burned. However, the dust bowl of the dry season wouldn't have left much to burn except dry grass. How resistant to fire were those trees? Which ones caught fire and which ones didn't? Is this where our idea of Hell came from?

As the ashes cooled, apes on the ground, carefully not burning their sensitive hands on the still hot Earth, forced to stand on two legs, would have seen these small flames as curious replicas or small babies of the huge fiery volcano that spat out its thunderous roar and flashed yellow death only once before erupting tons of black smoke and white ashes in the atmosphere. The last ones to leave: they would have been the only animals around to see this wondrous seemingly magical appearance of small safe flames spontaneously bursting into life from under the layers of ash, and then slowly dying away. For 25 million years: our ancestors went through these unimaginably traumatizing experiences... and suffered unimaginable pain and endured unimaginable hardships, and went through the slow process of a destroyed land healing itself and coming back to life again.

Animals with hard, unfeeling hooves could have still run through the hot ash and stepped through it to the hotter layers hidden beneath. They would not have felt the heat right away. Until their entire hooves became burning hot; this would have terrified them even more. It would have intensified their panic.... not understanding why their own hooves should be burning when they were only stepping on and through what seemed to be cool, white ashes, ashes hiding the hot layers of burning ash and grass.

List all of the animals that could have escaped the heat by burrowing under it, all the animals that could have run over it with hooves and all animals that could have escaped by running through the tree branches. What is left? For how many millions of years, were our direct ancestors the last, the slowest, the least afraid apes leaving a volcanic eruption? Were they only living animals left to see this display of magical flames after hot ashes fell from the sky like snow? The roaring eruption from a pyramidal cone of a volcano, fiery things coming out of that pyramidal pile, hot cinders coming from above down upon them, covering the land with white, black and grey ashes, just like we covered our food with ashes by cooking it over a fire; all this for 25 million years. Would this give the last animal out of such a death zone a different way of looking at the world they lived in? Walking out of a land transformed into stillness and whitened devastation. No birds, no animals, no sound, no green, everything covered in dirty white or black ash.

And millions of years or how many years later: when hitting a stone with another stone: sparks fly out into dry grass, and a small flame appears. Would these apes have been curious about a baby flame not coming from a volcano, but from a dry bush or plant? Or could they have been puzzled how such a tiny flame could burst from a tiny spark from hitting two rocks together? When before: it had taken the eruption of a huge terrifying volcano to perform this magic. Would this give them the impression that they had become as powerful as a huge devastating fiery volcano? Would the first hominid discoverers of fires have believed themselves to have tapped the unimaginable destructive power of the volcano?

Does our unique pyramidal focus make more sense: if for 25 million years, we feared the erupting pyre of volcanoes... which were shaped like pyramidal cones? Pyramid... Fire...Pyre... amidst a pyre of flaming fire. We lived amidst flaming Pyres called volcanoes for 25 million years. Funeral Pyre... ... This is what ancient Egyptians did for 5,000 years. Ignited by iron pyrites in the soil... creating sparks when the earth was pushed up and gases rushing up caught fire from the sparks of the iron pyrite and exploded out. Volcanic gases ignited by iron pyrites in the Earth's crust, Funeral pyres...the burning of dead bodies... killed by the pyroclastic gases and heat and searing ashes of the first huge explosions... then the entire forest is ignited and burns every dead animal and insect and reptile and bird body in it. Worshipping a pyramidal shape, a pyramidal power. Worshipping all forms of destructive killing power. Worshipping explosions and fire. That is what civilized people do today.

The Effects of Using Fire

What did the fire of volcanoes do to our ancestors and to use? It did the same thing hand tools did to us: the more we used fire: the more dependent we became on fire. The more dependent we became, the more we used it... the more fire used us... which made us use it more and more, in a vicious closed cycle. The history of the human use of fire obeys the universal dynamic of bio-feedback: to the same extent that we use fire: fire uses us. Tools use us to the same extent that we use tools. The symbiotic relationship between a living creature and dead things called tools is destructive. Tools changed us until we became destroyers of Life; until we became so destructive, we lived only to destroy Life, until we found the ultimate destructive tool that destroys all Life: fire.

What has using fire done to us? It has prevented us from growing up without needing it. Humans do not need fire in order to stay warm. Humans have heat glands that if developed properly at an early age; can keep us warm in the coldest climates on earth. . What is using artificial sources of heat doing to us now? It is weakening us more and more and making us more and more dependant on artificial sources of energy and heat. What is tool-use doing to us now? It is weakening us more and more and making us become more and more dependant on them. The Dynamic of Symbiosis like everything else in the Universe obeys the Universal Law of Balance... The result and effect of symbiotically trying to balance an organic living ape species with an inorganic bunch of dead stones and pieces of dead bone and dead wood reversed the direction of the energy and goals of our species. Instead of creating and nurturing more life: this species has and is continuing to nurture and create more death and destruction.

Those who scoff at the idea of giving up all of the technological progress and the advantages of using fire and tools and oil and electricity do not understand that there is no such thing as an endless one-sided progress: technology is not progress. Every single artificial advantage we invent and use and continue to use comes at a cost. For every step of forward progress: there is a balanced swing backwards, there is a regression... Unless that progress is learned and earned honestly; not by artificial advantage. Then energy leaps to a new level of awareness and power.

The more we depended on fire and tools for survival: the weaker we became and the more vulnerable our species became to being wiped out without it. The idea that technology will save us from destruction, the idea that tools will save us from destruction; the idea that fire will keep us from freezing to death once the next Ice Age arrives: is a complete fallacy. We cannot depend on the very forces and tools which we use to destroy all living things with: to save us as living creatures. Tools are not alive. Fire is not selective about what it burns. Tools are not our friends. Fire does not love humans because humans create it and use it to destroy Life with, and use it to keep themselves artificially warm. Fire does not have a memory. Once a fire dies: it does not come back to try to save the human who created it. The instant we stop using tools and fire they will stop helping us kill living things, and they will also stop helping us and stop giving us any artificial advantages.

The point is the history of tool-use and especially the use of fire by humans; has been the exponential increase and exponential acceleration and systematic destruction of all Life on Earth. Destroying all Life on the Earth is not going to save us from being destroyed also. It is doing the opposite. Technology; using tools, using fire is not saving us from complete extinction: on the contrary, it is feeding our suicidal rush to kill everything on Earth including ourselves. Humans cannot live without other living things. The result of humans living with tools and fire instead of with other living creatures has been a complete reversal of dynamics. We are designed to make friends and have fun with all living things on Earth: not make enemies of all living things including ourselves, and kill all other living things on Earth including ourselves.

For over 200 million years now, the most dominant animals on earth have been 2-legged bipedal animals... And they have all made the same mistake. From raptors, to tyrannosaurus rex, to kangaroos, to humans: The 1st of any 4-legged species to stand up on 2 legs have copied the obsolete examples of 4-legged animals, and for making this mistake; the reward has been: complete and utter extinction. Now the newest species to stand up on 2 legs is making an even worse mistake... humans are devolving backwards instead of evolving forwards. Instead of standing up, humans are now spending most of their lives sitting down looking at only one thing: a flat screen which has abstract images. That is not progress: that is regressive behavior of a species weakened and corrupted by millions of years of artificial ease, and laziness; created by using tools, created by using fire; created by sitting on its ass every night, and staring at the flickering distractions of firelight. Our use of fire originated from 25 million years of worshipping and fearing the destructive power of volcanoes in Africa.

Pyramidal Focus:

The more humans used fire, the more they became habituated to looking at only one thing: the fire. At night, everything was dark; the only bright thing was the fire they all stared at. The artificial warmth and artificial light they absorbed from the fire was returned in a closed bio-feedback loop that cut out everything else from their awareness. This developed their focus on only one thing into a reflex, into an instinct we call selective awareness, or selective intelligence. Actually, it was a de-evolution of their awareness and intelligence. They stopped trying to make sense of the world as an integrated whole, they stopped being aware of the world as an integrated whole, they stopped being aware of themselves as integrated whole animals. They became worshippers of fire. Sitting around a fire chanting to their gods is the oldest form of tribal worship there is. It is the oldest form of human culture there is. It is the oldest form of spirituality there is. Our first god was fire. The first god was the fire of the volcanoes that burned down whole forests. They became worshippers of destruction; they used destruction to survive; the destructive power of fire became a tool which they used to kill animals with by setting fire to whole regions and waiting for the fire to burn out. The desolation which resulted became their home ground: a plenitude of dead, burnt, rotting dead bodies of once-living animals that could be eaten without fighting for their food against any other predators or scavengers. All animals avoid burnt out areas. The smell of smoke and fire is a universal repellant that keeps them all away from the area. Fire was probably the first thing these apes looked at exclusively developing their selective awareness: watching an entire eco-system burn to the ground. We are still programmed this way. People still instinctively gather to watch a burning building burn down; rapt in fascination of the destructive power of the flames devouring everything, destroying everything. Nobody asks why we do this. It is just our selective focus at work: seeking out the most prominent, powerful destructive thing; and fixating upon it, staring at it to the exclusion of all else. The Pyramidal worship of burning pyres and dead volcanoes and pyramids of stone is where our religions comes from

The more Hominids made tools, the more they used them, the more complex, subtle and sophisticated this tool-making and tool-use became; the higher the degree or level of hand-eye coordination was needed. The more complex this neural processing became, the larger their brain had to become to handle it. But above all: it meant focusing upon one task-object to the exclusion of all else. Sitting down to chip flint from a stone is a single-minded task requiring all focus of attention and awareness be concentrated upon this operation. Using a flint chip requires an equal degree of concentration and hand-eye coordination. In order to do that, hominids could no longer retain a highly sensitized awareness of their surroundings. They sacrificed this loss of general awareness where any preying animal could sneak up on them more easily because the trade-off of being able to make and use tools enabled it to survive better in spite of this perceptual loss. The added dimension of hominid tool-use compared to previous ape hand-eye coordination can be better displayed by the difference in their two different levels of complex biofeedback: Primate hand-eye coordination can be described in this manner:

In Hominid tool-use, it gains an extra dimension resulting in

Other Primates possess a rudimentary form of this kind of feedback, but only in hominids did it become dominant and further evolved. However, this feedback system has at least two serious flaws: First: It is horribly imbalanced. Only one-half of the body takes part in it. The lower half of our bodies take no part in this feedback. Secondly, two of the sources of feedback: the tool, and the object you use the tool on, is not alive: they are dead. There is no organic, dynamically balanced feedback happening between the tool and the object. This changes the feedback model into, not basic five sources of feedback, but the earlier model which is based only upon four sources of feedback... only now it becomes imbalanced and distorted into something that looks like this:

Notice: this dynamic is the dynamic of a splitting triangle, not quite yet split. Its effect was to split the human brain into two unconnected forms of awareness. This is where objectivity comes from: regarding everything in the world as inanimate objects; treating living creatures as if they are dead things to be manipulated like a tool is manipulated. Not making any distinction between what is alive and what is dead.

This increased neural activity and increased complexity of neural processing resulted in a more developed tool-function of the brain. This mirrored balancing of biofeedback: of the tool affecting the brain and the brain affecting the tool is natural. But the model in which this new kind of feedback works is completely out of whack. The model itself is not balanced to begin with. Consequently: all of its feedback becomes completely distorted. The entire evolutionary development and process of Hominids using tools forced our ancestors to evolve in a completely imbalanced fashion based upon a completely imbalanced feedback model.

If you look at this feedback model, you will see how closely it resembles the actual feedback model of the upper human body: Only the upper half of the entire animal is being used.

Note: If a human uses a dead tool and another dead object between its hands, its biofeedback system is short-circuited: there is no living feedback going on between its hands. But the root of our reflective feedback goes back even farther than tool-use. The neural biofeedback system of our ancestors changed when they became able to touch their fingers against each other... which ultimately produced the all-purpose opposing thumb that could touch all opposing fingers easily. The manual dexterity of our hands is based upon holding onto-gripping, and opposition. The uniqueness of our opposing thumb and fingers is what makes us able to manipulate things. But in this kind of opposing biofeedback system there is also a short-circuit... The hands no longer get any feedback from the Outer Universe. What they are mostly touching is themselves in opposition. So they begin getting feedback from themselves... in an oppositional dynamic. That is until a half-living thing like a fruit, or an entirely dead thing like a tool came between them. However this still did not give feedback from their outer Universe. It only gave feedback of what the opposing thumb and fingers could do with that was in-between them. It only gave feedback of what the opposing arms, with opposing digits could do with whatever was in-between it. Other animals do not have opposing limbs. They have arms and legs that work together in a bi-lateral cooperative way. They do not have limbs that work insulated from their environment. They do not have limbs that have a feedback system which reflects and re-cycles back their experience by putting something between their limbs. Our legs still work this way. At some time in our genetic history, we developed opposing arms that we do not use to get around with. Most apes have opposing arms to get around with by hugging living trees... Our species took this instinct of hugging living things and has thrown it away when it should be practiced every day with everyone you know.

The evolutionary innovation of opposing thumbs changed the dynamic of biofeedback in our ancestor's upper bodies. Instead of their upper body: Arms, hands, finger, torso, chest, neck, shoulders, head; getting feedback from being in touch with their Outer Universe, Its outer ecosystem... they began being more in touch with its Inner Universe because they were getting more feedback from using something between their hands and between their opposing thumbs:

The biofeedback of its upper body, its own fingers, hands, arms, shoulders, which is precisely the feedback system needed for an animal with hands to improve its tactile dexterity enough to become able to manipulate and use a tool... which is also the model needed to improve its hand-eye coordination so it can evolve into a tool-user. Is also the feedback model which resulted in creating our reflective self-awareness. The entire idea of opposition... doing something oppositionally originates from our opposing thumbs.

This entire evolutionary development and process involving millions of years: left the bottom half of our ancestors relatively unaffected-unchanged-undeveloped. It further split hominids into two function-zones: with one-half evolving more and more, and the other half being left behind... becoming an increasingly imbalanced developmental split within that animal. As this evolutionary process unfolded, the increasing one-sidedness of this imbalance... the tool-dynamic of only separation, with no connection... developing only the upper half of the animal until it was only our brain that kept on evolving and not our bodies. Until. hominids could focus narrowly upon a task involving a high degree of hand-eye coordination and this adaptive trait became its primary means of survival... all as an evolutionary process involving millions of years. The concentrated pyramidal focus needed for tool-use also became its primary form of awareness. Its root-base of general awareness underwent a complete reversal in how it functioned. For billions of years it was, and still is, the more widely aware animal who survives. It is the more widely aware, the animal who is more sensitively aware animal to its outer environment that escapes danger, or being eaten. It is the less sensitively aware animal who succumbs to the perils and dangers of its environment. In our case: this billion year-old tendency of increasing awareness was reversed. With hominids, it was the ape with the narrowest focus of awareness that survived, not the widest. The one more capable of making, using and manipulating tools. The ape that could block out his outer awareness more successfully: so that hominids came to train themselves in this concentrated form of pyramidal awareness until it became dominant. Tool-use desensitizes awareness. The story of our evolution is the story of increased tool-use producing a desensitization of over-all awareness: instead we became more proficient in selective awareness; not integrative awareness, not over-all awareness.

This meant that unlike other animals, the awareness of our ancestors came to be always selectively focused upon one thing at a time.... all the time. Predators evolved to single out prey by detecting movement. Prey evolved to detect subtle evidences of danger around them. But none of them posses a narrowed form of awareness all the time. They do not perceive the sky as separate clouds, the forest as separate trees, the trees as separate leaves. Their awareness is the sum-total of all their senses functioning in a balanced interplay of instinct and experience. Hominids, on the other hand, were already split in half by function. Their upper body had taken over most of the brain's neural processing capacity, leaving the lower half less and less involved in this neural activity. They were no longer functioning as an integrated totality.

But what is crucial to understanding the present relational dynamic between tools and us; is how tools first changed our ancestor's social dynamic from what it was, to what it is today. This happened over millions of years.... But it did happen, and it happened unavoidably. The more these walking apes used tools, the more these tools took over their focus... until it took over their social focus as well. Returning from food gathering, the social focus was no longer on the members of the band. It was on tool-making and tool-use. Instead of socializing first, they had to re-tool their flints, their sharp stone cutting tools, their heavier tools, their killing implements, their defensive implements, and God knows what other things they used as an advantage to survive in the African Veldt. The center of focus was no longer between the members. Each member was too busy using tools to socialize. They still gathered in a cell-circle. But the center of that single band-cell, social focus of the center, the activity center, the structural center was taken over and replaced by tools.

What happened over a period of 25 million years was a natural cycle of many Ice Ages and Warm Periods? As the earth cooled: more water froze into ice and snow, not letting the water back into the atmosphere. Less moisture was being released into the atmosphere, all the weather patterns shifted. Climates of the world became drier: trees began slowly disappearing. In Eastern Africa, this change of weather patterns was magnified by the Rift Valley. Trees disappeared from the east side of Africa. A tribe of tree-dwelling apes spending most of their time in trees would find themselves spending most of their time on the ground. How many times did this happen? How many times were our ancestors forced to stop living in trees and live on the ground? How many times did they go back to living in trees? Some apes found a happy medium, living both on the ground and in trees: like baboons. Some went back to living in trees: like chimpanzees. Our ancestors didn't go back. They ended up staying on the ground because there were no trees to go back to. Where in Africa did the trees disappear and not return? The east side of Africa: the African Veldt. That is where we came from.

Each species has different ways of sensing things and being awareness. The awareness of each species is designed to focus on different thing... in different ways. How did we develop our unique kinds of selective awareness or pyramidal focus?

1. By focusing on everything that moves for X millions of years
- 2: By focusing on fruit hanging from a tree that does not move for X millions of years
3. By sitting in trees looking down upon animals that move for X millions of years
4. Sitting in trees looking up at flying birds that move, for X millions of years
5. Looking up in awe and terror at oncoming clouds of pyroclastic death that move, created by erupting volcanoes that spewed fire and flames all around for miles for X millions of years.
6. Sitting around a fire and staring at the flickering flames that move for X millions of years.
7. Sitting around making tools by holding them as still as possible so they do not move, or move as little as possible for X millions of years.

Looking up at something? Copy it; whether it is the behavior of a mother or a volcano or a bird.

Looking down at something? Ignore it: it's not important; its lower than you are, smaller than you are.. That is...unless you are high up in a tree and down on the ground is a fight between two huge monsters, two lions, or saber tooth tigers, or elephants or whatever, battling it out in a fight to the death... Then all of the animals of the veldt stop and stare at the spectacle of violence and bloodshed, then everyone stops to see who will win and who will lose. The Romans enacted this for centuries. Volcanoes taught us the most important thing on Earth is destruction, violence, killing and death. The largest, most dominant animals taught us the same thing; hate kill, destroy, respect only brute force, fear it.

The Geometric Structure of Self-Awareness

One crucial difference between primate brain-body biofeedback and hominid brain-body biofeedback is that with the added dimension of putting a tool into the bio-feedback system: it made the biofeedback... feed back to its origin. It made it reflective.

In a 4-sided feedback system: it cannot feed back to where it originally came from. But in a five-sided system: no matter how the energy experience is deflected. It always finds itself ending up back where it started.

Put four mirrors into a square box. Flash a beam of light from one corner... and it will never end up back where it started. Unless it is aimed directly at another corner. And the chance of that happening is almost impossible. However... put five mirrors into a pentagon: flash a beam of light from a corner: and no matter where you aim it: it will deflect back to its origin. Like this:

Or five reflective sides or aspects reflecting into any self-contained biofeedback system. This is the most basic structural dynamic of an insulated feedback system. Any more sides than four will always reflect back to its origin. Whether it is a hexagon, an octagon, or a structure with 87 sides, or any globular structure. Any inner curved circle will reflect back to itself also. But not a four-sided structure, or a three-sided one, or a two-sided one or a one-sided one. Basically, what this means is that you cannot have an inner totality with less than five reflecting sides. And all reflective inner totalities that do not penetrate or radiate outside themselves are vicious cycles. This is why the sign of evil in a black magic is the pentagon. This is why the armed forces of the most powerful nation in the world is housed inside a pentagon shaped building that is the purest, most basic vicious cycle possible. But I am digressing from the context of biofeedback and the difference in reflective dynamics between a model with four basic aspects and one with five.

The added dimension of the tool made our biofeedback system into a duplicating mirror-system. It not only increased the reflectivity of our biofeedback: it made it self-reflective. The more our ape ancestors used tools: the more this unique pentagonal deflective feedback system reflected back to the brain what it was doing. By reflecting tool-use back to where the original signal came from.

As a result: using dead tools became a positive feedback system of deadness in a system of living skin, living flesh, living eyes, living hands, living brain, and living body. That is not a natural kind of bio-feedback: that is an abomination of living neural networks stopping dead without any living bio-feedback. Instead of positive, it became a negative feedback system that was reflected back. Instead of communicating with what it was touching: it manipulated and destroyed what it touched. This is the structural reflective dynamic reason humans are addicted to using tools more than they are addicted to anything else. Because tools give them a more reliable, consistent negative feedback than anything positive. How? By all positive feedback being destroyed and taken away from them. By living in landscapes of desolation and death with nothing alive, not one living thing: only their tools.

You can get positive feedback from someone who loves you. You can get it from eating something that tastes good. You can get it from a warm sun shining on you with birds singing, and the wind wafting delicate scents of sweet-smelling flowers into your nostrils as you breathe in the fresh scented air. But the sun goes away. Clouds roll up. It gets cold. The food is gone. The person who loves you is in a bad mood. Or not there. When there is nothing to do, nowhere to go, nothing to say, nothing to feel: the tool is always there. Waiting to be picked up, and used, or made, or worked-on. And no matter how numb, or bored you may be: you will get a safe insulated, positive feedback from using or making it. In other words: the only way our ape ancestors could learn from experience... the only time we could learn experientially more than genetically... the only time our ancestors could learn anything self-reflectively: was by doing something with tools, with something dead between their hands and in their hands. The geometric difference between a four-sided, and a five-sided feedback system: made everything our ape ancestors did with something between their hands... Feed back to their brain...

Not back to their hands, or eyes. Not back to the lower half or their body. This set-up a negative feedback loop. The more they used their brains to do something with something between their hands: the more their brains were programmed by the experience of reflecting back each action they did back to their brain.

This is one basic structural dynamic reason for why our ancestors developed a huge; outer cerebral cortex: 90% of which is dedicated to sight and hand-eye coordination. This is the reason human brains are more self-reflective than any other animal's brains. Our cerebral cortex is made up mostly of mirrored synapses. What do these mirror synapses do? They act in vicious cycles of reflective feedback.

*They reflect their signals back to where it came from.
And they also deflect signals to other parts of the brain*

That is how our brain works. Human self-awareness is basically a system of reflective mirrors; that reflects back into its own brain whatever it receives from its senses. This is why humans stopped evolving genetically as a whole after we started using tools. This is basically why all other animals evolve genetically, but we do not. Animal self-awareness is basically a system of reflective mirrors with only four basic aspects that reflects into its own body; not back only to its brain. Generally: With animal self-awareness: the body tells the brain what to do. And the brain tells the body what to do. Generally: With human-awareness: the brain tells the body what to do. But the body almost never tells the brain what to do. For example. The minute a lion is not hunting and lies down: it stops thinking. It just lazes around and does nothing. Merely because it does what its body-instincts tell it to do. Only when its stomach tells it that it needs hunt for food: does the lion get up. A human will go find food even if it has more food than it needs because it thinks reflectively. The perimeter of the brain: its conscious awareness is only the surface of mental activity. The actual motives, feelings, decisions; come from the inner brain. Which are rationalized by the outer brain, convincing itself that it is the one controlling everything. Why? Because the outer brain is focused outwards: it reacts to the outer world and is aware of the outer world: it is not aware of the inner world which affects it

What is called learning is merely a matter of mirroring others: a dynamic of reflective copying. Seeing your parent do something and copying it. It is pure mimicry, mirroring. Nothing else. Actual learning is different: it comes from the general dynamic shown in the first page of this book:

Experiences. }
Comparison. } = Pure Wonder = Better Understanding Evaluation. }
Perspective }

Why is human civilization exclusively based and built upon the principle of the 4-sided square? Because it is the only sided structure that avoids reflecting back what is inside it inwardly back to its origin. It is the only reflective dynamic that makes self-awareness, and self-exploration, and self-learning impossible. Human civilization is based upon the avoidance of self-awareness, and actual learning, and the avoidance of Pure Wonder. Human civilization avoids all living positive bio-feedback. The dynamic of a 4-sided box is the opposite of a 4-sided DNA molecule. A DNA molecule is totally open without any sides or walls to it. It exists only because of the intersecting attractions between all four molecules. While a 4-sided box structure exists only because of the structural strength its walls give it. DNA never developed as a reflective dynamic. It developed as an intersecting-penetrating dynamic. The 4-sided walls of civilization are built upon and based upon the avoidance of penetration and intersection. It is based upon the avoidance of self-penetration. It is based upon reflective inclusion and exclusion: without penetration, intersection or learning.

The Geometric Structure of Civilization

The only four-sided structure which actually exists in the Universe naturally that is not man-made, are the living bonds of living DNA molecules. The artificial square of civilization is based upon the dead bonds of dead material. The artificial square of civilization is the opposite of the living DNA geometric square of Life; it is the artificially square bond of artificial death, it is actual death, but an attempt to keep death artificially alive. It is an artificial man-made attempt to keep dead things artificially alive and preserve artificial man-made dead things. The only living structure of coiled rope which actually exists in the Universe is the coiled structure of the bonds of living DNA molecules. The creation of man-made artificial rope using dead fibers is the opposite structure of the living rope bonds of living DNA, and the opposite dynamic of living DNA. The dynamic of living Dynamic rope structures untangle to create more living DNA: it is an ongoing process of freeing the coiled rope bonds of DNA so they can be duplicated and replicated by assembling living molecular components and connecting them to one side of the separated, uncoiled living DNA rope-strand. The creation of artificial man-made dead rope is the opposite dynamic of living coiled DNA: instead of freeing the two strands to give more Life by molecular composition: it constricts living creatures to kill them: it is made from killed hemp fibers which are separated from the living hemp plant, created death instead of Life, and used to create more death by constricting the freedom of living creatures and killing them.

These are only two basic examples showing that the basic dynamics of tool-use is an artificial process which is the opposite of creation of Life: it is the creation of death. Millions of other examples could be used to show the fact that the artificial invention of tools, rope, and fire are dynamics opposed to all Life on Earth, this includes the apes that invented and made these things and preserved and perpetuated their use.

Balanced and Imbalanced Awareness

Inner and outer awareness are simply two different kinds of balanced biofeedback. There is the feedback from the outer world of our senses. And then there is the feedback from our inner world: our accumulated experiences, memory, thoughts and emotions. For a person's awareness to be as dynamically balanced as possible: these two forms of feedback must first, each be balanced. Then these two aspects must balance each other as well. That means neither Inner nor Outer Awareness should be split-up into unconnected segments. Nor should one be stronger than the other. If either one is stronger, then imbalanced distortion occurs: just as being too much of an introvert, or too much of an extrovert, imbalances a person's ability to understand themselves and cope with their inner selves and their outer world. Properly balanced: the two aspects of inner and outer awareness with the observer-awareness in-between should form a Balanced Triality: When this is properly balanced, all three aspects merge into an inseparable totality of Pure Wonder. This is more or less, an ego-less state: where the ego virtually disappears.

The Significance of it all:

No.1: This created the perception of an Inner Universe; that was, and is completely separate from the Outer Universe. It created the inner universe of imagination, thought, memory, cleverness.

No.2: This created the perception of an Outer Universe. That was and is completely separate from the Inner Universe. It created the attitude of objectivity, the idea that what is outside you has nothing to do with what is inside you.

No.3: This also created a balancing agent between the two: the Split-off Observer Awareness which must integrate-manage-balance-make sense of it all: creating not only self-awareness, but also a personality, a psyche, a soul. But even more importantly: this created the realm of the middle-brain, where the split-off observer was supposed to function: it created the Human Subconscious.

The Reflective Dynamic of Human Awareness

This part of human evolution is the most intangible, ephemeral, unmeasureable, inaccessible piece of the puzzle. Its actual genesis and development is almost impossible to trace or study. The only parameters for comparison we have to work with are how the brains of most mammals work, how the brains of primates; our closest living ancestors work; and how our own brains work. And: by these rough generalizations, attempt to somehow span a 4 million year gap in our genetic history.

The only way we can study the dynamic of our own awareness is through some reflecting feedback or mechanism. But human thought is instantaneous. Even if we could take our own awareness apart and study it as it happens, we cannot causally trace what happens because it happens too fast. Human awareness is a reflective-interpreting-integrating-filter-gateway. To gain any kind of understanding about our awareness, we need as many different ways of looking at it as possible. We need as many perspectives as possible. Most of all: we need to step outside of our own awareness and look at it from the outside. So that we can gain a different perspective on what our awareness actually is... how it functions: the difference between it, and other kinds of animal awareness. But the filter-gateway-integrated-split-off observer cannot be separated from the inner-awareness... inner-universe which it works with. Eastern teachings have tried to explain this by discriminating between the thought, and the thinker of the thought. This is a crucial differentiation. But its dynamic, how it works, is instantaneous. All I can do is use the most common-sense terms to describe a dynamic of infinite, subtle, complexity and reflectivity that is beyond any true analysis. Your thought is not you. That part of you which initiates-controls and manipulates your thought is you. It is your true self, your true center, your inner observer and your inner will: and that self has at its disposal: the sum of your body's instinctual experience-knowledge, the sum of your subconscious experience-knowledge; and the sum of your conscious experience-knowledge. Generally this is how human awareness works. This is basically how human awareness is structured.

These three sums make up your Inner Triality... which is your Inner Universe, or your Inner Awareness. Then the integrating gateway-filter-self... or your inner observer; takes both your Inner and Outer Universe, and tries to make sense out of them and balance them. These three aspects are also a Triality, which make up the totality of your awareness. The result is a Triality within a Triality: exponentially raising the dynamic sensitivity of this balance of Inner and Outer awareness.

So... our Inner Universe-Awareness or self; operates reflectively independent of the Outer Universe: creating abstractions, ideas, emotions, which are totally problematic-random-creative. The best humans can do, is try to balance their Inner and Outer Awareness through the sense of Pure Wonder, by constantly adjusting the Dynamic Balance between their Inner and Outer Awareness.

But this inner level of Dynamic Balance is exponentially raised to an incredibly higher level-degree. It does not have its own counterbalances or self-regulating mechanisms. The slightest thing can set it off-balance. There is no comparison between the difficulty of properly raising human young, with all of its pitfalls and possibilities, to any other animal raising its young. Other animals are kept balanced by their environment and their instincts: we are not. The condition of an almost completely separated outer and inner universe created a completely new condition of awareness. Our Inner Universe exists as a split-up Triality. All other animal awareness is not as split-up like ours is. That is the genetic reason for why we are different from all other animals. The point is: our awareness is genetically imbalanced.

In this imbalance, which created not only thought and the thinker of the thought... feelings and the feeler of those feelings... Which we jumble up to call self-awareness. This entirely new condition was split again into two completely new conditions of balanced and imbalanced awareness. We perceive these two reflective conditions as the condition of wonder and the condition of fear. The emergence of modern man created two entirely new forms of perception: Reflective Wonder, and Reflective Fear.

Both are products of the increased reflectivity of the human brain. Pure Wonder is the product of both our Inner and Outer reflective awareness being optimally balanced to its highest possible level. Reflective Fear is the product of our reflective awareness becoming trapped inside its own reflectivity; and its perceptions becoming reflectively distorted.

The Imbalance of Human Awareness

The human animal was faced with an unheard of problem of destructive dynamic balance. A balance so dynamic, so subtle, that it failed to walk the tightrope of this new energy dynamic. Destructive in what context? Two Infinities, two roles of predator and prey, and forced to choose between them... Not given enough time to digest both Inner and Outer worlds, forced into crisis situations, forced to destroy its own dynamic balance.

How to balance one's Inner and Outer Awareness: so that you are fully aware of what is going on outside you and at the same time being fully aware of what is going on inside you? But: on top of that, humans also had to balance their Inner Universe: the Triality of their instinctive, subconscious and conscious awareness. Which feelings-thoughts-impulses to heed? Which not to heed? How much emphasis to place on which ones?

The brain is basically a reflectively filtered gateway for neural integration of the organism as a totality. The neural energy leaving the brain and the neural energy coming into the brain goes to make up a balanced dynamic. But the energy bouncing back as a reflective thought does not travel outside the brain. How are thoughts shown in cartoons? Inside an insulated bubble. They stay inside the brain and are accumulated into memory-experience-learning. The issue is: the actual energy-dynamic of human neural brain-signal patterns existing as we presently assume, as only electrochemical signals. Science fails to explain the difference between the neural path of energy which passes through the spinal cord as neurally emitted or received signals and other neural pathways not traveling into or out of the brain, but remaining inside the brain as a conscious thought, or feeling, or a memory of an experience or feeling or thought.

If that Inner Universe becomes imbalanced, then it becomes distorted. If it becomes stronger than our outer awareness then our outer awareness loses its desired impact-effect. Then the split-off observer gives more credence to what it senses-feels-thinks inside rather than what it senses-feels-sees outside. If the split-off observer cannot integrate-make sense of these two universes, if they do not match up, what is the self, the split-off observer; to make of it all? If this Inner Universe becomes imbalanced, then whatever that split-off observer gives more credence to becomes a distorted-imbalanced mess. But this inner imbalance does not stop there. The Inner-Observer shifted over mostly to one side of this Triality. It operates mostly in the conscious area of our Inner Awareness. We became primarily conscious animals rather than instinctive. Our instincts faded into non-use. The reason for all this happening is because of how our original model of sensory feedback was distorted and imbalanced by using tools. If you look at this model, you will see that the upper half of the model is connected to itself, while the bottom half is not:

Notice: the feedback of the lower half of the model does not affect the system as strongly as the upper half, because it is not fully interconnected to the system. The upper half represents our Inner Universe-Awareness. The lower half represents the Outer Universe-Awareness. And as you can see, it became tool-oriented. Instead of our hands and bodies interacting with nature.... The tool.... Began interacting with the object.

We began putting our attention, our energy, our focus, our time and our love into our tools: not into ourselves, or others, or the world around us. Both our tools and objects evolved... we ourselves stopped evolving.

So now: you have a Triality (instinct-subconscious-conscious) within a Triality. (Inner-awareness, split-off observer, outer-awareness) Exponentially raising human awareness and learning to a dynamic balance with an unheard of speed, reactivity and creativity. What this means, and has meant for at least 50,000 to 100,000 years... ever since modern humans appeared: is that our consciousness is a genetically flawed phenomenon. The Double Triality of human awareness has never been balanced. Our observer-awareness exists without a true center-point of dynamic balance.

We are genetically designed to have the observer-awareness existing in-between our instinctive and conscious awareness. But: the human subconscious has never, ever been fully explored or understood or made clear. In behavioral sciences, the subconscious is termed the "middle" brain. It is responsible for everything from urges, appetites, addictions, mood swings, depression, to obsessions, allergies and phobias. It is a blueprint for how and why we think and feel. All human perception, thought and understanding is filtered through it. The human subconscious is a murky unknown area, which controls and affects all human behavior, human motivation, human reactions, human perceptions and human attitudes. But it is not controlled by our true selves: our inner-observer. The result is: all of the human insanity called: hate, fear, cowardice, all of our fixed-unchanging ideas-values-attitudes-beliefs are frozen inside an unknown, unexplored, unexplained, undecipherable mystery called the subconscious, or the middle brain. And that inner unknown ends up ruling us without us knowing it.

The end-result of millions of years of imbalanced splitting ended up producing another imbalanced split: humans became more connected to their Inner Awareness than their Outer Awareness. Which produced yet another imbalanced split. They operated more on a conscious than an instinctive level. Which produced the imbalance between reflective fear and reflective wonder: humans came to live in a continual subconscious state of unknown, unexamined, unexplored fears. If you examine the motivation or root of any conscious thought, feeling or action, you will find that they are all colored and influenced by, or have their origin in the subconscious.

Language

The Hominid path of evolution was a path of imbalanced splitting. The universal effect of all separation-segmentation-accumulation is pyramidalization. If you separate things long enough you will get a pile of segments of whatever you're separating. And for hominids, in order to do this, their brains had to not only focus segmentally, selectively... and pyramidally, narrowly: but also function segmentally and pyramidally. The most obvious human characteristic of this is human language.

What is human language? It is the separation of sounds into segments called words, which are accumulated into a vocabulary... Moreover: it creates words by narrowly focusing on one thing selectively, and identifying it separately by using a word to symbolically represent it abstractively. The problem is: the symbolic representation does not match the actual thing. Each lion is different. The word lion is not different. Each sunrise is different: the word sunrise is not different.

So: by pyramidal focus... the human brain using language as a tool which could be duplicated by others. Identical sounding words were used over and over: the repeating of these words was the first process of mass-manufacturing ever invented. Language duplicates the basic dynamics of using tools: separation, segmentation and accumulation. What is writing, but the separation of words into segmented, individual segments? What is music, but the separation of sounds into segmented individual notes, and manipulating them? What is an orchestra or a symphony, but accumulations of manipulated, separate notes? What is the origin of music but percussion, or the duplicated, repetitive sound of a tool hitting an object...that is, drums?

The tool had finally trained the human brain to use the same dynamic process it did... namely the dynamic process of separation-segmentation and accumulation. The human brain became a tool. It became its own tool... it became a tool-brain. That part of the brain, which functions as a tool. It could manipulate its own perceptions as a tool. This shows how both the tool and tool-brain mirror each other. Millions of years of using tools plus a million years of staring at a fire, made this form of pyramidal focus dominant. Without fire, hominids could not have developed language. By looking at one thing at a time segmentally: by everything else around them except the fire being blacked out, the selective form of perception necessary for the development of language was evolved.

The point is... human intelligence did not create tools... tools created human intelligence. Human intelligence did not create language... tools created human language. Human intelligence did not create music: tools created human music. Human intelligence did not create a larger human brain... tools created the larger human brain... To the same extent that we used tools: tools used us. To the same degree that we shaped tools: tools shaped us. The imbalanced bio-feedback of living apes handling and using dead tools with only one-half of its body was the underlying dynamic; not any intrinsic human quality or ability. The point is...we did not shape tools: tools shaped us; it's the other way around. The entire myth of humans being superior because of some intrinsic difference between us and other animals is a total fallacy.

Time Awareness

One of the major tool-brain innovations of manipulating its own perceived experiences was separating them into segments of linearly accumulated moments of experience: time-awareness was created. Reflective self-awareness, time-awareness, awareness of ones own mortality, being separated from the Universe, the fear of separation, the fear of death, language: are all only different aspects of what we evolved into, by an increasingly imbalanced Splitness of our bodies, our brains, and our awareness. The awareness of Time changed all the motivations at a root level... it changed how our ancestors felt. How they thought, how they acted. It changed the root reasons of their thoughts and feelings and actions. It changed why they did something... why they felt something... why they thought something... It changed everything at such a deep root-level that it is almost impossible to imagine what it must have been like before our ancestors developed a sense of Time.

One thing is clear: no other animal we know of; possesses the kind of time-awareness we do. Every animal except civilized humans; leads a hand-to-mouth existence. They never consciously plan ahead except out of blind instinct ... they never worry if they will find enough food in the future... they never are afraid of what might happen to them in the future. Our hunter-gatherer ancestors originally lived the same way. They never tried to accumulate food just in case they did not find any, and could then fall back on their stored reserves of food. But at some point in Hominid-Human Evolution: they began to do this.

Animals store food reserves in their bodies as fat. But they do so instinctively... it is not a conscious decision. Mostly: animals do not store food outside their bodies, except specialized animals like squirrels. Moreover, squirrels only do that because the forest needs their forgotten reserves in order to grow more healthy trees in the exact places where squirrels choose to hide their stores of seeds and nuts.

Most Northern forests are planned by the unconscious instinctive decisions of squirrels... that decide to bury their nuts. In a safe place? In the most open, exposed places possible where there is more chance of any wandering animal finding them by smell and eating the squirrel's hard-saved supplies? In the only spots where there is enough sunshine for saplings to survive and prosper...? Yet, the squirrel itself is insanely jealous if it spies even one nut being stolen by a bird. How can you expect the squirrel to know that it is genetically programmed for the greater good of the forest eco-system, and not only for its own survival...? Why would a squirrel hoard nuts high up in trees where birds can easily get them? Why don't they store them underground? They do both. But... do they do it for their own selfish advantage, or do they do it for the good of all the plants and animals around them...? Instinct is wiser than selfishness.

Time-awareness changed our ancestors. Before they developed Time-awareness, before they became afraid of not having enough to eat the next day, or week, or month, or year... they lived a hand-to-mouth existence that was untainted by selfishness or fear simply because they did not have a reflective awareness of Time. They couldn't experience fear except when danger was actually there. They couldn't store food for future use because they did not have a reflective awareness of the future. However, once they developed Time-awareness, they lived a hand-to-mouth existence that was tainted by Time-Awareness... tainted by fear and selfishness. They no longer naturally chose what was good for all the living things around them. Instead: everything began to revolve around themselves. Everything they did, they no longer did for anyone, or anything: except their own selfish desire to stay alive as long as possible. Everything they did became motivated by the fear of dying and death. Any chance they had to accumulate more food than they actually needed, they did... They did not store that extra food where other animals could find it... because they were not acting out of their genetically programmed, designed genetic need to be giving, unselfish and generous. Their motivations became tinged with fear, poisoned by fear, until their motivations became predominantly fear-based.

And what has Science done? It has not only sanctified this fear and held it up as living proof of our supposedly unique intelligence. Science has made it the single most important proof that humans are more intelligent than other animals. Because other animals apparently are so stupid, that they are not afraid of dying, or starving to death. That they are not as intelligent as we are; because they do not accumulate things by using tools, solely for their own survival and benefit and advantage.

They fail to mention that other animals simply do not possess this kind of fear because they do not have the same sense of time-awareness that we do. The only reason humans are different is because we are afraid of dying before we actually die and other animals are not. We are the most cowardly animals in existence because we do not live in the moment: our time awareness is not like other animals, we have a conscious awareness of the future and the past. We are the only reflective cowards in existence. Our great, supposed intelligence is based on this reflective cowardice. And that all other animals do not understand our cowardice: because they do not possess it. Animals do not understand why they are killed and trapped and shot, and poisoned and used in obscene torture experiments by people who call themselves scientists. Animals do not understand why they are put into cages to be safely gawked at by humans who would otherwise be much too afraid to accost them in their own natural environment. Humans do not understand themselves and they do not understand their own awareness.

We think that our time-Awareness is one reason we are superior to other living creatures. We think that time-awareness makes us stand apart. We think that since we have this special kind of time-awareness: we have a god-given right to accumulate anything we wish. Science supports this unspoken assumption. It portrays animals in Nature films as savage-violent killing-murdering things... acting in insane frenzies of rage and anger. Any Nature filmmaker knows that people will never bother to watch two years of an animal's life that is peaceful, just to see one rare crisis where the animal becomes violent. So they skip the two years of peaceful co-existence with all other animals and only show the exception to the rule. They only show animals eating each other. Why? Because they know all people are afraid of being eaten alive. Therefore they prey on the deep human fear of dying to sell their films by focusing upon violent gruesome aberrations.

The one-sided view of Nature that Science and Civilization portrays is shared by most humans. It is okay to eat other living things, but it is not okay to be eaten by other living things. Are all Living things designed to be eaten by other living things? This question has never been asked.

So: where does that leave the sanctified sense of Time-awareness? Instead, the term should be changed to Death-awareness rather than Time awareness... Other animals have Life-awareness. We are the only animal that focuses upon and obsesses over death and dying. We are the only animal that preserves the obsolete past, and fears the future and does not live in the present. We are the only animals afraid of dying because we possess something we call Time-awareness. Because we have a unique reflective self-awareness, a unique, separated Inner Universe, a psyche, a soul. We are afraid it will disappear when we die. Even if we believe that our souls are immortal, we are horribly afraid of losing our physical bodies. We are horribly afraid of any kind of pain, hardship or unpleasantness. What are the reasons for it? Why are we so afraid of pain? Animals suffer horribly in all kinds of ways. Do they complain? Do they show evidence of fear, or cowardice...? It depends on how reflective their awareness is. But even the most reflective chimp or dolphin does not try to escape its pain. They experience it in silence. What does this say of our intrinsic supposedly superior nature compared to other animals? Does Science admit this difference? Does it put us and other animals into perspective? Does it put Humans into perspective by rationally comparing ourselves to other animals?

No.

There is a double standard when it comes to the evaluation of humans, and evaluating anything outside the human domain. The reason for this is because human awareness is split into Inner and Outer awareness. Science practices this double standard. So do lumber companies and mining companies, and chemical companies. Their advertisements try to show how ecologically responsible they are: as they systematically destroy the ecology of other living things. Science does the same. Science shows how all living things function according to certain Universal Laws. It tactfully does not mention that humans do not follow or obey these Universal Laws. Somehow, scientists never mention the unspoken scientific assumption that these Universal Laws are meant to be obeyed by all living things; except humans. Why? Because it is an unspoken assumption. Everybody assumes this to be an unspoken truth. Why say it out loud when everyone believes it is true?

Time-awareness was the last part of our evolution that was needed to change most of our life-energy from a positive dynamic to a negative dynamic. Once our tool-brains became inwardly reflective. Once the three inner cells of our brains developed protective walls; preventing our instinctual-subconscious-conscious brain activity from acting as an interconnected totality. Once we developed fear so that we became afraid of our own thoughts... our own feelings... our own actions. Once we managed to shift our observer-awareness off-balance, out of the subconscious center of our awareness and kept our awareness mostly only on the surface of our tool-brain awareness, at the outer edges of our cerebral cortex. We developed the awareness that time was passing. That time was passing us by, and we were not experiencing every moment as we should... but missing it. Not experiencing our experiences as we should. That made us live in a continual state of subconscious fear. It made us become aware of time. And that awareness of Time was and still is inextricably linked to human fear.

The entire motivation of accumulation. The entire dynamic of one-sided separation, is a negative dynamic. It is based upon fear. The only reason we ever began accumulating anything was the fear of scarcity. Our ancestors had lived in a cycle of plenty and scarcity for millions of years. However, time-awareness only magnified the negative aspect of their existence.

Life-energy is a positive dynamic. Life always produces more life than there was before. Life is based upon the dynamic of plenty, of overabundance... of there always being more than enough; rather than less than enough. If this were not the case; then the first DNA molecules would never have produced anything but a few more DNA molecules... and the outer shell of our planet would still be a chemical soup resting on a semi-liquid magma that slowly cooled into a thicker and thicker crust until it becomes a frozen solid, cold, dead planet.

This did not happen. It got warmer instead of colder. Life-energy created more heat than the planet could handle. Slowly... over billions of years. It created more heat-absorbing techniques. From the few first DNA molecules, life kept on creating more and more living things. More and more different, diverse, living things. Seen from the context of the short life-span of one single organism... at any one time: it might seem as if that there was more scarcity than plenty. This has never been the case. In the 4 billion years of life on Earth: each trough of any period of scarcity has always been followed by a crest of more abundance more Life, more living things to eat, and more food. Each Ice Age has always been followed by more living things sprouting and growing where none had before. We rely on this dynamic. Every thing we plant brings us tenfold, a hundredfold back more than we planted. We cut down trees safe in the knowledge that there will always be more trees to cut down. Science has documented this steady increase in the plenitude of life.

Some of the basic reasons we hoard things is because of the negative dynamic of the fear of starvation. The negative dynamics of scarcity that we instinctively, subconsciously and consciously react-to.

1. An instinctive genetic memory bank of episodes of near-extinction of our entire species. Developing a crisis mentality. From living for 25 million years near active, erupting volcanoes that without warning;... suddenly exploded and destroyed all life around them.
2. Living in a tool-based society based upon gathering/accumulating as much food as possible. From living for 25 million years near active volcanoes that covered the ground with ashes forcing animals who managed to survive to slowly starve to death.
3. Both conscious and instinctive fear of the future assuming there will not be enough food to eat in the future. From 25 million years of volcanic devastation, from violent earthquakes and huge volcanic explosions that happened without warning.

These are some of the reasons why we humans developed an instinctive blind-mindless addiction to accumulating-collecting-saving-preserving-perpetuating-hoarding-piling up-everything we possibly could. This shows some of the reasons why greed became a general universal phenomenon in all human societies. Without our unique Time-awareness: this phenomenon could never have happened.

The phenomenon of mental-emotional fear can only happen inside a reflective human brain. Reflective Fear is only a characteristic of our over-reflective minds, our over-reflective Inner Universe.

Reflectivity is fear without Wonder. Fear is the isolated reflectivity of our Inner Universe. The dynamic of fear is insulated reflectivity. The dynamic of insulated reflectivity is fear... when it is isolated and keeps on re-reflecting itself and not going out of the Inner Universe of our conscious minds... where should it go?

Our reflectivity should radiate. Inner reflectivity should be digested and put into perspective. The radiating Sense of Pure Wonder should go into our Subconscious, into our Instinct, into the Outer World, into other people... and then be fed back. So we gain by it. So we have positive feedback. So we can gain a perspective on our own Inner Reflectivity that is not an isolated ego. The dynamic of the ego and fear is the same ... isolated over-reflectivity of our Inner Universe.

What is a tool or a machine? A tool or a machine is a dead thing that does a repetitive motion or function. The first tools or machines were the first limbs, the first shells that developed outer limbs that moved repetitively. First using an outer shell as a machine-tool for motion, and then inner bones. Both the shell and the bone is deader than the rest of the animal. If you want to study the evolution of tools: look how the first living things developed a way to move; using their own energy. Instead of allowing themselves to be at the mercy of their outer environment. What is the evolution of moving living things except an evolution of convenience and expediency? By using only half of our tool-machine limbs to travel: our ancestors were already evolving by a dynamic of ever-increasing convenience and expediency.

The basic dynamic of tools is a one-sided process of:

One-sided Separation- One-sided Segmentation- One-sided Accumulation.

This basic process is not cyclic. It is not regenerative. Tools do not regenerate themselves. This basic process is only one half of a regenerative cycle. This basic process is completely destructive.

Everything we have created; comes from this destructive process, this destructive dynamic. This is all we do. We do not do anything else. You can analyze everything in civilization, and you will not find one thing in it that does not use this destructive process and this destructive dynamic of tool-use.

But humans are creative. We do not just destroy. But w-what about art? We, er, we... uh.... Look at Michelangelo. Smashing away at a single undamaged block of marble, into a pile of left-over bits, chipping away at it... Until the end result is a dead superficial image called art.

What are oil paintings made of?

Killing living organisms to extract their dyes from their dying bodies, and their oils from their dead crushed bodies, killing trees for wooden frames, stretching bleached-whitened canvas on it... Canvas made from the fibers of dead plants that were cut and smashed and woven. Smearing these oils, these essences of dying plants called dyes... mixed with oil of dying seeds... to create a two-dimensional, abstract, poor, vague, fuzzy representation-rendition of beautiful living things. A dead, flat, superficial optical illusion of Life on a flat screen. That is abstraction. Art is abstraction.

And we prize and cherish this abstract shit over and above all the millions and billions of living trees and plants that we kill every year; why? Because the actual living world is not worth looking at, as much as this boring, unchanging abstraction called an oil painting?

Which is more important? Which is more valued?
A dead abstract painting of a tree, or an actual living tree?
An abstract image of a tree, or an actual live tree?

Which one is worth more money?... which one is older? Which one is deader? Which one is created by using tools? But humans can create music. How? By separating sound vibrations. And segmenting them into separated notes. By cutting off the vibration of a string by putting our finger on a fret board, and shortening its sound. By using elaborate valves and tubes to cut off sound waves coming out of artificially made hollow instruments. By smashing and beating on hollow things with sticks and calling it percussion: so the reverberations inside the hollow drum are projected outward. By accumulating these separated notes into songs and symphonies. By accumulating the separate notes of separate musical instruments into a band, or an orchestra, an orchestration of sounds. Blaring out sounds like an orchid blares out its scent to the world... attracting living things by a sweetness that travels through the air.

Everything we do as civilized humans: is based on the one-sided process of: separation-segmentation-accumulation. You may not like this unpleasant bit of information. But that is the fucking truth.

The Power of Mobility

The instant you become mobile: you lose contact with the Living Earth.

The most powerful species of animals have always been the most mobile ones. They travel farther or move quicker than other species. When Life evolved into Trees and plants: they were not mobile except for their seeds, and they tried to spread out and cover the earth. Then insects came: and spread out and tried to dominate plants by being on top of them. Then other animals came and spread out and tried to cover the earth that were bigger and mobile... so big, that they could ignore the insects. Then the biggest mobile killers became the dominant species.

What determines dominance? Size, height, numbers and mobility. Size and height can be overcome by numbers: as grass plants tried to overcome the size and height of trees... Size and height could be overcome by numbers as grazing animals tried to outnumber the taller, larger predatory reptile Saurians. Until the dominant killers of the reptiles evolved into all 4 of the factors that determine dominance: Raptors became small and mobile and faster than their prey and hunted in packs outnumbering their prey. Tyrannosaurus Rex became larger and faster than all other animals, just not as agile and not in great numbers.

Where did these 4 factors determining dominance come from? From volcanoes that erupted. The taller and more powerful a volcano was: the higher it could spew out its energy and cover all other erupting volcanoes with the clouds of its fallout. When a volcano went extinct: the power of the earth's magma erupted somewhere else. The more mobile the eruption, the longer it could remain the dominant power on earth by moving its eruptions to different places on the earth's crust by searching for weaknesses in the earth's crust.

What has the human species done? We have tried to dominate the earth by using size, height, numbers, mobility... and tools. But the luxury of lateral mobility has one very serious drawback. The instant you become that mobile: you not only lose contact with the earth. The instant you become mobile: you become arrogant.

“Hey, I don’t like it here anymore. Screw this place: I’m going somewhere else.” What inevitably happens when you go somewhere else? ‘Hey... I’m getting bored with this place... Let’s go somewhere else.’

Lateral mobility gave us the distraction of a living in continually changing environment. Every day we walked through new lands and saw new sights. Seeing new wonders for the first time every day! Why sit around the same old place when we could travel and see new sights? We became addicted to the thrill of seeing new things for the first time... all the time, and then passing them by to see more new wonders. We became a race of nomadic wanderers. The only reason humans stopped traveling was when we overpopulated the earth so much that anywhere we moved... other humans were living there already, and that was how and why the battle for territory was born and developed into raiding and wars... Overpopulation and the urge to keep moving, the addiction to see new sights and travel. The arrogance of rich tourists. The arrogance of lateral mobility. The arrogance of being the No.1 hunter and killer of the entire earth. The arrogance of standing up on 2 legs when all other animals walk humbly on four legs and because of this, assuming they are lower than we are in status. The only animal with its hands and upper body free from the earth to do as it pleases... making tools and using them to kill with, is nothing to be proud of.

Over and over and over and over.... Endlessly searching for a place that suits you better; and never quite finding it, never being satisfied with what you have. That is what humans did and are still doing. It’s what human colonization of the entire earth is all about. It’s what human mobility is all about. It’s what dominance is all about. It’s what the power of mobility does to you: you lose contact with the earth, you become arrogant. You become detached from the earth. You cease caring about the earth. You stop caring about the earth you grow on and live on. Plants and trees do not have the luxury of this kind of arrogance. If something happens to destroy the earth they live on... they cannot get up and move somewhere else. Because plants and trees do not have the power of mobility except for the mobility of their seeds: they have become the lowest in the hierarchy of living things on earth. Because grasses and trees cannot run away when other species eat them and kill them: they have become ignored, used and destroyed at will by all other species which have the power and arrogance of lateral mobility.

What happened when Stone Age humans finally settled down in one place? They destroyed everything around them. And after they had turned the earth they lived on into an ugly, stark bare, naked rubble: where all living things had been killed: they went:

We have done this to the earth we live on until now... there is nowhere else to go anymore. We are doing it because we have the power of lateral and vertical mobility. The power of mobility automatically creates arrogance. Monkeys are mobile. But they cannot leave their forests, they dare not stay on the ground for too long. Grazing animals are mobile: but they cannot leave the meadows where they eat grass. Predators are mobile: but they cannot leave the regions where their natural prey lives. Birds are mobile: but they cannot leave the regions where they can lay eggs and feed in peace.

We humans are mobile: and can go anywhere we want to. We humans have lost contact with the Earth. We humans have gained the power of artificial mobility and lost all meaning to our lives. We can jump into cars and planes and go somewhere else if we don’t like where we are. The lowest class of humans are those who do not have the power of mobility. The highest class of humans are those who have the greatest mobility. Jet setters, people who own villas and mansions on different continents. People who have country homes and travel from the city to the country every week: are the highest class of humans there are. They are also the most arrogant, and the most detached from the earth. People who live in the country: despise city dwellers who only come to the country when the weather is nice. Country people have to live in the country when it is cold and raining and freezing: not just when it is sunny and balmy. Humans have become obsessively crazed with the power of artificial mobility. We humans have developed our systems of artificial mobility to such an insane degree: that people in artificially mobile cars spend most of their time talking on mobile phones. And if anyone says anything to them over their mobile phones that they don't like: "Hey I don't want to hear this: I'm not listening: 'click' I can talk to somebody else. 'Hey, I don't like this channel. I can watch another channel 'click.' 'Hey, I don't like this website, I can go somewhere to another web site: 'click'." These clicks exactly recreate the first sounds of human apes knapping... making tools by clicking bone against stone. When you are caught napping you are unaware of your surroundings and vulnerable to attack. Humans have become programmed to disconnect ourselves not only from the earth we live on and the world we live in... but from anything we don't want to see-hear-feel-touch-know. We have become brainwashed to react like Pavlovian dogs... disconnecting ourselves from everything we see and hear which we don't want to understand. Disconnecting ourselves from who we don't like: ourselves.

Children sitting right next to each other in Libraries are sending text messages over the internet through chat lines to each other rather than speaking to each other face-to-face. The mass culture of dysfunctional disconnection from reality has spread like wildfire. The flight into abstract games is the latest mass craze of a mass consumer culture which has become psychotic. It is a form of cultural insanity which is getting progressively worse. People living in cities covered with concrete and pavement no longer feel any connection to the earth they live on. People working indoors in offices no longer feel any connection to the earth they live on. People living in high rise apartments no longer feel any connection to the earth they live on. The mass psychosis of human disconnection from the earth is destroying the earth we live on.

Our ancestors were once monkeys. They disconnected themselves from the earth by living in trees. We then we came down from the trees and walked on the earth: but we did not connect with the earth. Instead we discovered the power of lateral mobility; with the advantage of using tools, we found that didn't have to stay in one place, we could travel. We discovered that if we didn't like where we were... we could go somewhere else... we could move out of our natural home: which was Africa... by using tools. We became arrogant. We lost our roots, we lost our connection with the earth. We lost our Sense of Pure Wonder and our awareness of the beauty all around us in Nature. We became scavengers, then we became killers. We did not learn from the lessons of our past mistakes.

All former dominant species on earth have become either extinct, or they have lowered to the bottom of the status heap. Unless humans develop their Sense of Pure Wonder to the point where they do not want to have any power over anything. Unless humans develop their Sense of Pure Wonder to the point that they stop and reflect on what they are doing before they do it. We will destroy ourselves and the entire earth by our own arrogance, by our power of our senseless mobility alone, by always choosing the easy way out, by continuing to live as cowards, by running away from every difficulty we are faced with, by running away, and avoiding and hiding, and burying, and covering up, and whitewashing every mistake we ever made.

The power of mobility automatically makes you arrogant. If you are not aware of this: you will use the power of your mobility wrongly. The only level of human awareness that can nullify the arrogance that the power of mobility creates is the Sense of Pure Wonder, and a critical self-awareness of oneself that does not lie to itself.

We use the power of our minds and conscious brains to reflectively avoid the truth instead of using our brains to face the truth. We have used the power of mobile thoughts to run away from all thoughts and feelings we don't like. Unless humans develop their Sense of Pure Wonder to the point where they voluntarily of their own choice: face their own thoughts and emotions... and explore them. We will destroy ourselves and the entire earth along with us. As we are doing so now, and have been doing ever since we came out of the trees. The most powerful change any human can make is changing the nature of their own awareness. By changing how you use your mind. By changing how you use all of your senses: you can develop your own Sense of Pure Wonder. We were gifted with this sense. We were given the ability to have a greater awareness of everything around us and inside us than any other living thing on earth. We have not even begun to use the human potential we have been gifted with. That potential is the Sense of Pure Wonder.

Vertical Upward Mobility and Horizontal Lateral Mobility

What disconnected us from the living Earth was not just our ability to walk, our ability to adapt to different eco-systems and move to other eco-systems any time we wanted to. Before our ancestors became laterally mobile: they were disconnected from the living earth by living in trees for so many millions of years. We were already disconnected from the Earth before we ever stood up and began walking upright.

Yet even in spite of this disconnection; evolution shows beyond any doubt that Life has been steadily designing creatures that tread on the earth to create as little damage as possible. The feet of humans are so soft and sensitive, that they do almost no damage when they walk without shoes. Almost everything alive does not like being walked upon except grass. And even there, only certain kinds of short, soft grass. Grasses have razor-like edges that can cut our skin, or they have thick centers of closely growing shoots that makes us avoid stepping on them, or grow to a height that makes it almost impossible for us to walk on them. We have an instinctive revulsion and a horror of treading on any living thing with our bare feet. In fact, we prefer walking on sand to walking on grass, simply because there is nothing living under our feet we can harm. When walking on sand there is nothing we have to worry about, we don't have to watch where we tread. Whereas, anywhere else: we have to look where we put our feet. The Living Earth is covered with living creatures that do not like being crushed and killed: they react in anger and bite and attack anything that tries to come down upon them, or they flee and defend themselves. 'Don't tread on me' if its alive was the lesson we learned. If its dead: you can tread on it. Even grass has its dangers: The 'snake in the grass' that bites you can kill you just as dead as a lion can kill you. Walking on a living thing with your bare feet is dangerous.

25 million years of African earthquakes and volcanic explosions, 35 million years of walking on the ashes of dead volcanoes, 35 million years of living on the ashes of dead volcanoes, 35 million years of a naked ape, vulnerable and sensitive to all living things, finding the only safety from attack in the death zones of dead ashes of dormant or dead volcanoes where no living thing goes, walking on soft dead ashes... until we recreated that volcanic devastation wherever we went, creating huge deserts of dead sand which we fled from in guilt... This is the untold history of the human race which explains the lunacy of our species completely. This is the covered up, hidden, 35 million year old secret, the 35 million years of ugly horror, the true history of our past, which explains human civilization.

The Fear of all Pyramidal Power

What are the attributes of a God? A God is to be feared. Whether you love God or hate him: he is feared. What is the hallmark of all Ancient Gods? Exploding into rage and laying waste to the land by catastrophic acts of uncontrolled anger. Our ancestors feared volcanoes. They hated them. Did they grow to love them? Or did they grow to love the tiny flames sprouting magically after hot white ashes fell, while the trees they were sitting in, or standing under protected them from the first waves of burning hot ash? And the later-cooler falling ash covered the first burning layer: so small fires and flames burst magically out of a whitened wonderland that had been green all of their lives and now was white.

Would this kind of event stay in their cultural memory long enough to give them the idea of using fire? Simply because they were the last ones out of a volcanic eruption area that all other animals sensed before they did; and fled faster than they could because they were ungainly, awkward, and slow, traveling on the ground? Did they feed these small flames appearing from under the snow-carpet of ash? Or did they learn how to feed flames only after they started using tools first? Which came first? Fire, or tools?

Either way: 25 million years of a slow-moving heavy ape that could not race through the upper branches of the forest being the last ones out of an eruption area; explains much of why we are as we are today. It might also help to explain why we became more erect. Being forced to travel over hot ashes. On two feet instead of two feet and two hands. Worshipping huge, pyramidal volcanic cones that we feared, hated and loved at the same time. And why the most comfortable walking sensation a human can have: is still walking over a thick layer of cool white ashes. Stepping into ashes is like stepping into talcum powder. Its dry softness is so pleasant and soothing to the feet; there are no words to describe it unless you have actually felt what it feels like. Were these apes upright already? Or did they use crutches? Did they use sticks to poke around in the ashes for food? Did they use sticks as crutches so they would not burn their hands on the burning earth they were fleeing. Was this how they began traveling without their hands touching the ground. Was 20 million years of using sticks as crutches to flee devastated ash-covered areas of pure Death how we finally became erect walking apes? 25 million years of this repeated condition. Hm... Crisis situation. Do-or-die. Survive or go extinct. The apes that did not adapt went extinct. Did the last apes stay there? Instead of using sticks as crutches to get the hell out of there? Did they starve to death? With everything covered with ashes? Did they eat food covered with ashes? All bitter human experience; sorrow, sadness, loss, grief ... is described in the Bible, as the taste of ashes in your mouth. The bitterness of eating cooked food covered in ashes from a wood fire. No food? Then eat the ashes and die. The pronouncement of Christian last words over a corpse: "Ashes to Ashes...can be logically explained by our pre-historic past.

After a holocaust was over, after the volcanoes stopped erupting, did they return? After the first big rain: the entire land would have turned black from the dissolving carbon in the ash. The trees and the earth would have bled black blood, the Entire forest would have been a blackened horror which they would have fled and never returned back to. To have a magically whitened landscape turn black... after rains which had before, cleansed the forest and made it clean and fresh. This would have turned all understanding upside down. Rain is supposed to cleanse and make everything fresh and sweet smelling. Not turn a white wonderland into a blackened hell. Their hate and fear of volcanoes would have been mixed with wonder and curiosity. What aspect of it would they have grown to love? The white wonderland with wonderful safe, small flames... the first white snowfalls in African history. Why do you think walking apes sought out colder lands where it snowed? Because the first sprinklings of snow deposited on green firs and green spruce trees; looked exactly like the sprinklings of white ash deposited on green forests in Africa millions of years ago. Could 25 million years of African volcanic eruptions, explain our discovery, use, and love, and worship of fire? And also how, and why we became erect? Along with other sub species of apes, who also became upright walkers?

Peer Pressure

What other characteristics can we attribute to our African origin? If it is true that we humans once lived on the African Veldt. Who were our peers? Were there other Walking Apes? If there were walking apes in the veldt for millions of years before humans evolved... who were their peers? Their animal-equals who lived on the ground? The answer is obvious. Only four species fit this list in the Veldt.

Lions
Hyenas
Wild dogs
Cheetahs

These are the top predator species of the Veldt. If our ancestors lived in the same eco-system... as the fifth top predator species...After the Wild Dogs, and the Cheetahs. How would these higher, peer examples affect them? What would their living examples of how to survive... how to act.... How to kill.... How to live... affect them? Would our ancestors absorb these learned peer examples, and would their own society to fit all four... in exactly that order?

They did. They had to. Why? Because they based their peer examples on the SIZE of the animal, the bigger the predator, the better chance it had of killing you.

If you bother to analyze all three species of lion, hyena, and wild dog... in that order... with the Lion example being the strongest, the Hyena example being the second strongest, and the Wild Dog example being the third strongest... and put all of their social-cultural-instinctive traits, habits, characteristics together... You have almost exactly... precisely; the basic root culture-instinct-survival traits-ways of adapting... which we humans exhibit today.

Lion culture is based upon male dominance. The cubs, the young are killed if they are not cubs of the ruling male, and even then they are barely tolerated by him. Cubs-children are not valued at all by the dominant males. They mostly ignore them... and leave all cub rearing to the females. The adult male is more important any child-cub. It is a patriarchal society based exclusively upon killing, hunting, feasting and wallowing in ease. Lions are a dirty grey-yellow in color. They can use this as camouflage only during the drought; when all the plants and the Earth around them are yellow and dead. The concept of a metal that is yellow being sacred and reserved only for royal use; comes from our seeing the dirty yellow color of lions standing out grotesquely during the wet season when everything is green, and they are starving.

What are the major roles of a male lion in a pride of lions? To establish a dynasty of its own direct descendants. Any cubs not sired by him he kills. To guard his territory from other encroaching males, and other prides. Constantly absent from his own community-family, marking his territory with the scent of his macho-maleness. As long as his scent is virile and powerful and full of rage and anger: other lions keep away for fear of being killed.

The latest wrinkle in the African lion social order; is two male lions taking over a Pride instead of one, and sharing the responsibility of guarding their territory because their hate energy is constantly getting weaker and weaker. But even then: both males are absent from the females and cubs; at the same time. Leaving the females and cubs open and vulnerable to being harassed and terrorized by all the other predators in their area. Without the huge, larger ferocity of the Male: the females, though very good at cooperative hunting: are not aggressive enough to scare off the other pack animals that are more numerous in their own right. This forces the Males to come running back to rescue the females from their demoralized social status as a beleaguered, attacked dominant elite animal society.

But when they do that: they leave their boundaries open to incursion by other prides who no longer smell fresh male scent around the perimeters of these male territories, and come running in to see if the native pride is weak enough to be chased or killed off. The entire life of a male lion in charge of his own Pride is a constant battle of violence to maintain their elite status and territory against all comers. Both inside and outside. They have to wage war continuously against two fronts. Even then: the males almost never do battle. They merely posture, and strut, while the 'showdown' is passively watched by the passive rabble of females: who accept whatever decision is reached.

All the other predators in the Veldt have taken their cue from their behavior. Every other predator: Hyenas, Wild Dogs, Cheetahs: are embroiled in their own inter-species war against each other... while also embroiled in a constant war against each other all the time. The entire sick social order of African pack-animal predators is a fight for elite dominance. Full of hate, savagery, cunning, cowardice, the mob against the powerful elite. All snarling and fighting over every scrap. Regardless if they need it, or want it or not. Attacking each other just out of pure meanness and hate. Grudges are kept for years. Feuds go on for generations.

Sound familiar? Why do you think the 12,000 years of human civilization is one long tale of warfare, hatreds and a constant unending battle over territory? Ever see a human ruler spend more of their time with their children than with affairs of state? How much time do human males spend with their children? Has a human society ever been ruled by females? Read history and find out how the ruling elite of all human societies spent their time during the last 12,000 years. Wars, hunting, feasting, and wallowing in ease, neglecting their own children, being absent from their own families. Where do you think the custom of All Empires neglecting their own colonies, and leaving them to fend for themselves comes from?

Only for parents to come back roaring in outrage; if their children even dare to try to establish their own independence. If a male lion ever lives long enough for its cubs to grow up: the young adolescent lions are banished from their own family; and forced to roam as wild outlaws and killers. Seeking to cash in on any pride whose resident male either dies, or becomes weak, or sickens.

Hyena culture is a matriarchy. The female hierarchy is determined by heredity. For the males to gain mating privileges they must lose their high status inside their own band, leave their own band, and join a new one and start all over again at the lowest pecking order.

Sound familiar? Human males having to out of their own small town to succeed in the outer world: where they gain fame and fortune: while they are still regarded back home as 'that upstart, who...' As Samuel Clemens found out; when he returned to Hannibal Missouri; after becoming a literary giant renowned around the world. And since when has any female had to leave her own circle in order to rise in status? Females traditionally marry into power... They never leave, go somewhere else; and start again at the bottom to earn it. The upper classes jealously guarding the hereditary status of their females; forbidding them to marry below their station. Where does that tradition come from?

Hyena society is based upon constant daily rituals of recognition. Let a member go away for a week? It becomes a stranger and is attacked and ostracized, or killed. What happens when someone returns a year... or five years later: back to their old hometown...sound familiar? The pack will not recognize them, they will be regarded with suspicion.

Wild dogs are very gregarious. Individuals can leave and come back without any hostility shown. Why? Because they never leave the pack for a long time. If they find food, they go get the pack. They are the most intelligent, the most closely cooperative and the friendliest to each other. With very little infighting going on inside their societies. While the Hyenas and Lions fight-with, and kill their own kind. So... cooperation is third on the list ... running far below the competition for dominance, hierarchy, territory, hereditary class structures, marrying into power and wealth, wallowing in ease, killing, and social conformity.

Cheetahs mate for life. Both male and female spend time hunting to feed the young. Sound familiar? What is a human marriage but a contract to raise children? Once they are fed and grown? How many times does actual love survive in a marriage; after the children are gone? How much meaning or relevancy does marriage have after the children are raised, and gone...? Except as a safe haven for the children to come back-to...a security blanket, a sanctification of custom and sacred institutions?

Why does Human society look like this...?

First: comes hierarchical dominance through brute force.

Second: comes hereditary class structure: with slavish conformity, and ritualized closeness. And the most arrant social cowardice possible. Why do you think all hyenas have receding hindquarters? So they cannot be caught by another predator grabbing their rear end when then run away.

Third: Along with these three peer groups comes a common tactic used is the First, Second and Third species of predators: the urge to mob together in large gangs... along with some minimal social cooperation:... with liking and semi-closeness lagging far behind.

Fourth: comes pair bonding to raise children. Only here do you find any true closeness and intimacy at all. Did our ancestors take the last peer example of the Cheetah to heart. Along with the other three?

No

They took the biggest example to heart first: Lions. They took the Second biggest predator example to heart second: Hyenas... and the Third biggest social predator that hunted in packs, third: Wild Dogs. And the fourth predator last: Cheetahs. Why last? Because Cheetahs are not pack animals. They do not run in bands, tribes, clans or prides. They have no pride. They have no instinct to band together in larger numbers. Pride destroys marriage. So do large families who hate each other because they are killers.

1. Lions: male dominance, laziness, cowardice, Force-Majeure, brute force being the most important... along with ganging up on prey or an enemy, by stealth and cunning. Savagery: hate; killing; gorging oneself full. What is the legacy of humans copying lion culture? Lions defend their pride at all costs. If a lion loses its pride: it does: it is killed. Lions defend territory at all costs: if a lion does not defend its territory: it is killed: it dies: it becomes an outcast, an outlaw. Every pride of Lions is at war with every other pride of lions near their territory. The culture of lions is a war culture. The culture of lions is based upon hatred, blood-letting and constant wars and battles against all other animal species in their territory.

2. Hyenas: close social networking... re-establishing social contacts daily, female hierarchy of the clan-group... There you have a perfect explanation of all the 'macho cultures with big armies and blustering males in public... going home to be henpecked by their wives and mothers. Cowardice. Hyenas are notorious cowards and only attack when there is a huge, obvious advantage. Any doubt about the outcome, and they run. Constant bickering and fighting for dominance in a close-knit social group. Hyenas always attack the weakest of their own groups. Social infighting of the most vile vicious kind; Ostracism; rule of the mob, the rule of numbers; no individuality. Depending on numbers, not the individual.

3. Wild dogs: they are very independent. They are free roamers. And not afraid of Lions or Hyenas. Nothing scares them. In actual numbers, they outnumber the other two put together. They can and do terrorize both the bigger predators. They are only lower in size... and in the size of the prey they can run down. But... they are superior in numbers, and cunning, and confidence. And that counts a hell of a lot. Because you can harrie and distract an enemy predator or prey much more effectively with a faster, quicker, smaller, more numerous pack than you can with a slower, less agile, larger, less numerous pack of predators. Wild dogs do not bother with water buffalo. But Lions can, and do hunt them. But once down? A good pack of wild dogs can surround a feeding pride of lions and infuriate them, and confuse them, and demoralize them so badly they are chased away... because they eventually react in fear... from the crucial advantage of numbers. Humans learned from that example: outnumber your enemy and you almost always win.

So humans evolving from a small group ... of free roamers, independent, cooperating very well with each other... evolved into a crowd. Pure numbers. The mob. A bunch of people all together with no social cooperation at all. But... with a crucial advantage in numbers.

4. Cheetahs. Pair-bonding is last on the list of priorities in all human societies

What does that say about human intelligence? That humans as a species are stupid... that they will never learn anything... unless the lessons are given to them by a living example... and only by a higher, superior, more powerful peer group?

Tons of wise powerless sages have preached wisdom throughout the Ages. Nobody ever listens to them. No human has ever listened to anyone else... except to people higher than they are in authority, and status.

But what have humans learned in 100,000 years? Human society is still a mushed stew of Lion-Hyena-Wild-Dog-Cheetah values, morals, ethics and lifestyle. We have not changed how we live for millions of years. Why? Because we have not yet found a higher status peer species that is more powerful, to emulate, copy, and learn from.

What of the Leopard: the social model of a lone person as a predator. Wouldn't their example be even more powerful since they were genetically designed to hunt apes in trees? And are rightly feared by all apes; far more than the other four predators in the veldt? Why are all loners feared and hated by human societies? Because they are instinctively reminded of the lone hunters who once killed them for millions years? The simple answer is; that our ancestors evolved out of trees, before they used examples of the dominant species on the ground around them, to create a new social model with. Leopards do not like attacking a pack of large apes on the ground. They have no way to do it safely. They have no hunting pack. They cannot rely on numbers. So for our ancestors. For all Walking Apes that did not sleep in trees: the leopard was the lowest on the list of predators. The leopard was the weakest, the least dangerous. Leopards are loners. Their lifestyle is in direct opposition to a bunch of fear-ridden apes who had clung to trees and to themselves for millions of years before they ever came down from their safe trees and started walking. What was the worst punishment possible in Walking Ape societies? Ostracism. Forced to live like an Ocelot. A small, weak cat that is a loner also. Forced to live like a Leopard. Publicly marked with the dappled marks of diseased ostracism. Forced to live alone. Have humans ever valued the benefits of solitude? Have we ever valued the benefits that come from being forced to live a life of hardship as a lone leopard does?

No.

But leopards were and still are the nemesis of all apes that live in trees. Before we stopped living in trees: they killed and ate us for millions of years. Genetically and evolution-wise: they are even older enemies than all other Predators in Africa. They were the original boogey man. The monster that came at night to devour small children. Did we follow the peer example of the leopard? Leopards live both in trees and on the ground. They are night creatures; who hunt by stealth and in secret under the cover of darkness. How many human societies have had groups of killers hunting by night under the cover of darkness? What is the archetype of the rapist? Someone who hunts small children at night and devours them.

What human tactic is even older than tools? Who did our ancestors first learn the arts of stealth and cunning from? Who was the peer example we copied and learned before we ever walked out onto the killing fields of the Serengeti Plain? It was the leopard, who taught us first. The leopard: whom all the other predators in that plain hate and hound the most. The loner predator without any supporting social gang. The antisocial leopard.

What have we learned in 100,000 years? What have we learned in 4 million years? Ever since we left the African Veldt: we have only learned from our tools. Not from other living animals, or from other living organisms. We have learned to live as tools. We have learned to become better tools ourselves. To have learned to function as tools.

Have we learned how to live better as human animals since we came out of the Veldt? Have we learned anything in 100,000 years how to live better as human animals?

No.

What are humans missing? A peer species? To teach them a better way to live? By living example? By proving that living that way, you can live better, more happily, more healthily, more successfully: in all animal ways? Not machine ways. Meaning feeling better, having healthier bodies, healthier minds, healthier feelings. Healthier social structures. Healthier eating and sleeping habits. Healthier ways of living-acting-reacting?

No.

Walking Apes were meant and designed; to teach the other animals a better way to live. Only our ancestors failed their own tests of hardship and learning. They chose to use tools. We chose to learn not from Life, not from other living creatures: but from the tools that used us. Once we became dominant by using tools; we stopped learning from other animals. We stopped learning from each other. Instead: we chose to learn only from tools. We learned from our own hands, from our own tools. From the more superior tool. The more powerful tool. Whatever tool gave us the best advantage: was what we valued and learned from.

Why? Because the peer examples of the African Veldt had already taught us: that the most important thing in surviving and escaping death and extinction, was the decisive advantage African predators had. The superior advantages of surprise, shock, cunning and stealth, and power. The advantages of deception, terror, gangsterism: the cooperation of criminals for criminal purposes... we only cooperate as a gang of killers: in no other way do we cooperate. The advantages of mechanical leverage, speed and artificially created heat. The advantages of using artificial tools to gain an artificial advantage. Advantages that could conquer drought, disasters, crises, death, disease, dying. This is the context in which all human existence has been couched-in and defined by, for at least one million years. These are the defining dynamics of how and why we use tools. We are defined by the tools we use, how we use them and why we use them. But how and why we use them; is defined by where we lived, and what kinds of examples were around us before we ever invented tools.

What were the two basic examples that our ancestors saw and aped in Africa before we came out of Africa?

Low class Herd animals and grazing animals all packed into a single massive population. Mixed up indiscriminately. Without species separating themselves from other species. Without any male bulls, fighting for dominance and creating their own separate herds. A single packed mass of animal flesh: with no leaders whatsoever.

Elite, high-class lions, and other predators lording over, and terrorizing the mass of herd animals. Two distinct peer classes of animals. What did these two peer classes of animals teach us by example?

Class A: Low Class: the masses, the peace lovers, The majority Herd animals taught us unthinking mass conformity, instinctive mass panic and mindless mass fear. The instant one herd animal bolts: all the others bolt also. Instantly. Without waiting to see if is a false alarm. They taught us mass cowardice. Whenever a brave individual grazing animal stops running away from predators, and opposes them: what does the rest of the herd do? Run away, and watch the single brave individual being torn to pieces by being outnumbered and attacked cowardly always from behind.

Herd animals taught us the abandonment of babies and young and weak and old. Not defending their own young. If they cannot walk and run with the adults: they are abandoned to be killed by predators.

Mass birth, mass overpopulation of species as the only defense against predation by a few killers. Everyone having babies at the same time. Mass migration. Never staying in one area. Overgrazing one area down to the bone. Then migrating to do the same thing, then coming back to do the same thing endlessly. Endless cyclic destruction of the ecosystems they live on. Spoiled by the fact that the plains they migrate over are the only ecosystems on Earth that can recover from this mass overgrazing every year.

Class B: Elite Class: the killers, the fighters, the haters, the minority.

Lions taught us laziness and how to lie by example. Lying around in the sun tanning themselves, sleeping during the day as if they are completely lazy and harmless and are no threat to other animals is the lie of the lion. Lions that lie on the ground are liars: get it? They taught us many kinds of bad behavior by example. How to ignore their own cubs and babies. How to ignore the masses living around them as if they did not exist... How males fight other males to establish their own genetic dynasty. How fighting and killing is the only way to establish dominance, and reap the rewards of pride: females, and for territory. How to steal food from those who are better hunters and better killers than you.

What did lions teach our ancestors? How to be dominant: sour and cruel. How to attack using the advantage of night and surprise. How to attack at night using stealth. How to hide, how to use camouflage to hide. How to kill by using deception, cunning and cowardice. How being more savage, more brutal, more cruel, more full of hate, more violent, more bloodthirsty, more warlike, more combative, more unhappy, more miserable: is worth a few fleeting years of territorial and social dominance as King of beasts. How to be as beastly as possible. All kings are beasts: they are not humans. They act like beasts. How to be macho pigs: treating the breadwinners and workers: their own females as badly as possible. How to be as glutinous and as greedy as possible. How to always claim the lion's share even though they do not earn it. How to be as selfish as possible: fighting off other predators from a carcass. Even though you can't eat all of it. Refusing to let others eat while you gorge yourself. How to rule the mass by terror. How to single out and pull down any herd animal that shows signs of not fearing them. How to keep blood feuds going for thousands of years between prides and clans and species of your own class. How to hate. How to keep grudges. How to preserve and perpetuate hate. How to instill and create fear. How to perpetuate and preserve the fear of the masses. How to control and subjugate masses of animals by making sure they are kept as stupid and as ignorant as possible.

What do you think would happen if one day in the African Veldt: the masses of herd animals became more intelligent? What do you think would happen if one day they became tired of being hunted and killed every night? What if one day they became tired of being stampeded in the night and running blindly pell-mell all over the damn place without getting a decent nights rest? What do you think would happen to lions sleeping 10 hours every day, if one day: all the herd animals decided enough is enough and decided together to get rid of them? What if every pride was encircled by all the thousands of grazing animals during the day as they slept and snoozed?... and then moved in from all sides in a coordinated intelligent plan? They would be trampled to death before they knew what hit them. Nothing would be left of them but a bloody patch on the ground to mark where they had been sleeping. And that would be the end of all lions on the Veldt.

The only reason lions are still alive today in Africa: is the stupidity and cowardice of the animals they dominate, terrorize and kill every night. Just as the only reason the elite Class of humans are still alive today; is the stupidity and cowardice of the humans they dominate, terrorize, and intimidate and kill. 8,000 years of civilized history has shown us to be divided into two distinct classes. Class A: The Mass. And Class B: The Elite. 12,000 years of Human History has shown our two classes mimicking and aping and copying the same exact Class behavior as animals in Africa on the Serengeti Plains have been acting out for millions of years in their Class. Without any change. Without learning any new behavior whatsoever. Is this coincidental? Or is it because we are so intelligent? We copied the animals of the African Veldt so precisely that our history is an exact re-enactment of the social dynamics of those animals.

The only difference between them and us, is that: we used tools to copy their example with. The only difference between Animals living in the African Veldt and the elite class of humans is tools.

We developed ourselves into societies which have two distinct classes. Originally: there were the Runners, and the Killers. This explains Tribal African society before it was re-colonized by the humans who left it 100,000 years ago. Then there was a complete reversal of social order. Class B... the Killers. Who aped the elite social order of the Class B Lions: became the underdogs. They and their territories became controlled by Class A: the Runners, the Movers.

Before Europe invaded Africa in the 17th, 18th, and 19th Centuries: African tribes were distinctly segregated and identified into these two recognizable cultures. Literally; all the war-like Zulus and Bantus, the Masai and Swahili's that ruled empires in Africa before the White Man came were nomadic herders. For thousands of years; they lived by not killing the animals they herded. They spent their time protecting grazing herds from Lions. Not hunting them like lions. Instead they milked them and drank their blood.

They came from the original Runners. Who ran with the wild migrating herds in their yearly North-South migrations. As a result: they became slightly braver than Lions. They hunted down every Lion that dared to kill one of their herd. They became more warlike and braver than the skulking killers who aped the sneaking tactics of lions hiding in the tall grass to hunt grazing animals. As a result: the Runners grew taller, thinner, they could run down any skulking African human killer tribe and kill them.

Why did this reversal happen? Simple. Originally: these two classes had come from the same race, the same species. They had started from an equal playing field. Neither one had had an advantage over the other. It was not a case of claws and fangs against hooves and horns. Or a case of grass eaters against meat eaters. It was a case of equals against equals. Both had had the same tool kit. Both had had the same technology. Both were of the same species.

The only difference had been; which peer example they modeled themselves after: Class A: the Runners, or Class B: the Killers. The Runners won because they were braver.

Africans who modeled themselves after the elite Class B of Lions sat on their thrones in their territories and did not move. They waited for the animals to come to them and then they hunted them down by stealth and by poison arrows. The tall Movers and Runners ignored them and went past them, and despised them and their laziness.

Eventually they cleared the grazing lands and migrational routes of their herds of all squatting skulking African human Killers. These tribes were forced into the worst habitats in Africa. They became the stunted Pygmies living in the Kalahari Desert, the cannibal Congo tribes living in the rainforest. For at least 200,000 years: the tall nomadic Runners, the Masai and Zulus; dominated, owned, ruled, terrorized and killed them and enslaved the squatting, skulking Killer tribes who created villages and did not move.

Did the animals of Africa learn from this peer example? No.... Why? Because the Runners did not take over the African Veldt. They did not exterminate the Lions and Jackals and Hyenas and Wild Dogs. They left the Lions their killing fields of wild animals. They only protected their own domesticated herds. They did not protect the wild herds also. They did not own all of Africa. The Lion remained undisputed King of the Wild Serengeti Plain. The Human Runners did not go there. They were chased out from that Plain. They settled in less fierce areas, with a smaller, and shorter nomadic routes. They did not make the 1,000-mile trip back and forth twice every year that the wild grazing animals did. 2,000 miles a year all told.

This historical example shows one thing. All other things being equal: Human Runners are braver than Human Killers. Human masses that Move, are more powerful than squatting Human elite that Hide.

Why did aboriginal Africans never colonize the Veldt? It had more animals. It was a virtual paradise during the wet season. It's a walker's Paradise; and we humans are specifically designed to walk: not run or climb. Yet no African humans ever colonized it. Because they were afraid of a few lions? When there were millions of grazing animals? Why didn't the North American natives colonize the land where millions of bison lived? It was a veritable paradise of easy hunting. Yet they all stayed out of the center of the continent where the most animals were to be had. Until they got the horse. Only then, when they found a way to dominate grazing animals did they invade their lands. The original Africans never did this; they had no horses. They never learned to domesticate the wild zebra. The animals of the Veldt are still too wild to be tamed.

Destructive and Constructive Confidence

False Confidence is only useful and needed in competition, battle, and killing on a mass level of over-accumulation. Without this unnatural condition; generally, the most confident male wins when competing against another male. If you do not need to compete or kill, then you do not need destructive confidence. You do not need to gain an unfair advantage over something or someone else. For Humans... Constructive Confidence is a merging of Honesty, Courage, Wonder, and Humor. Destructive Confidence is the false confidence you get from having an unfair advantage over your rivals. Take away anyone's artificial advantages, and you will find out how quickly their confidence disappears. The destructive confidence of a millionaire rests in his money. The destructive confidence of a judge rests in an entire social network of laws-lawyers-police-legislators-Army-Navy-Air force and a whole host of Governmental bodies sworn to protect him or her and enforce his or her edicts and judgments. Take away that power and privilege, and you will see how a judge loses all confidence. Constructive confidence comes from you alone, and nobody else. It comes from your body-heart-mind and nothing else. It does not come from your tools or what you wear, or what you have, or own..

Constructive confidence is the power to affect all kinds of energy with your own energy. It is a positive force. It acts positively, never negatively. Positive energy is always more powerful than negative energy. Because it is more powerful, it can force negative energy to do things it does not want to do. What tools did was that they harnessed the positive life-energy of our ancestors to the mostly negative energy of the tool-dynamic of one-sided separation energy without connection. They did this because our ancestors found they could use tools as an advantage. Only that advantage was an imbalanced one. And so the balancing effect of that was to make the advantage of our own tools greater than us. The Law of Dynamic Balance is universal. There are no exceptions to it. You are what you use and what you do, and how you use it and how you do it. Our imbalanced artificial advantage, our imbalanced tool-use created an imbalanced effect on us by the tools we used, and still use. That imbalanced effect is invisible to us because we live in it. Unless we have a sense of Pure Wonder, and look at the logic of how we actually evolved; and why and how it happened and how and why it became illogical and irrational.

But even imbalanced splits are balanced. To the extent that we use tools: tools use us. The degree which our ancestors used tools was balanced by the degree to which their tools used them. This has not changed. This truth: this dynamic balance of an imbalanced split is what humans do not look at. Humans do not look at the degree to which tools use them. Humans think they can use tools for their pleasure and purposes, and not be used by the tools they use, and not be manipulated by the tools they use to manipulate things with. This one-sided arrogance and one-sided smugness and one-sided blindness is what we as a species must face and admit and deal with if we are to avoid becoming inhuman machines used by tools to maintain them; not living people, and repair them; not living people and create more of them; not living people, and take care of them; not living people, and love them; not living people, and spend out lives with them; not living people. This is the blind spot of modern humanity: the elephant in the room: the huge overwhelming truth of human civilization which humans do not want to look at or admit it even exists. The historical fact is: what humans are most proud of: the evolution and innovation of making tools and inventing tools and using tools; is exactly what makes us inhuman. We have created for ourselves an artificial environment made entirely out of tool-use. This tool-machine invention we call civilization: is a mechanical inhuman destructive impersonal monster that has systematically and progressively dehumanized us and turned us into machines, into tools; into living robots that are used by tools to keep them maintained and running, and to produce more and more tools. Not for our well-being, but for the well-being of tools and machines

What is scoffed at is the idea that an inanimate thing like a tool has the intelligence and cunning to use and manipulate us to serve its own interests. What humans do not understand is that it is the Law of Dynamic Balance of the Universe which insures that all things balance each other. It is the Universal Law of Cause and Effect which insures that the more you use machines, the more you will think like a machine, the more you will act like a machine, the more you will live like a machine the more you will become like a machine. The more you use machines: the more you love using them, the more time you will spend repairing and maintaining them, the more you will become like them. The more advantages you can get from using tools and machines: the more addicted you will become to this unfair imbalanced advantages they give you, the more you cannot do without the machines you do use, the more they cannot do without you. The more you use a dead thing that does not feel pain: the more unfeeling you become. The more you use inhuman dead things that have no love and no empathy for you; the more inhuman you will become and the more unfeeling you will become, and you will end up having no love and no empathy for other living creatures. Our dependence on machines to supply us with everything we want has turned us into the slaves of our own tools and the slaves of our own machines. There are no exceptions to the Law of Dynamic Balance. We are becoming more and more like machines not because machines are intelligent enough to consciously decide to use us, but simply because the more we use them, the more we become like what we use. You are what you eat. You are how you live. What you do defines who you are and what you are. Tools have just as great an effect on you, as you do on them. The Universal Law of Dynamic Balance is how the Universe works. There are no exceptions to it.

The first Major Imbalanced Split: into two body-function zones. Upper and Lower.

The Second Major Imbalanced Split: splitting things apart with tools.

The Third Major Imbalanced Split: using a tool to create yet another kind of tool.

The Fourth Major Imbalanced Split: fetus development splitting into two stages. Inside the womb and Outside the womb.

The Fifth Major Imbalanced Split: The split of human brain into Internal and External awareness. The birth of the enlarged cerebral cortex, increasing the size of our brains enormously. The birth of the inner psyche; the soul, the unique personality, the ego, the Inner self: the creation of individual internal selfishness without any external natural conditions to balance it.

The Sixth Major Imbalanced Split: the memory block of not remembering your birth. Cut off from our most basic instinctive roots and our wisest instincts to create a programmable infant baby with a blank mind and no instincts to tell it what is good or bad, or right or wrong. The complete loss of all instinctive intelligence and wisdom, replaced with experiential learning by using tools.

4-2 million years of tool-use resulted in a larger developed cerebral cortex: or Outer brain. Creating the split between the larger outer brain, and the smaller inner brain; between the instinctive brain and the tool-brain. What went on during millions of years to ultimately produce these changes cannot be detailed. The actual detailed history of Hominid-Human evolution is untraceable. Only the most general and obvious changes can be noted:

Learning and Instinct

The early Hominid brain evolved by developing increasingly specialized, separate areas. Its two hemispheres functioned more and more independently of each other. The Path of its Balanced Splitness became more and more imbalanced. The Hominid brain became more separated than connected, more one-sided. This evolutionary change mirrored the tool dynamic of separating things into segments. By using tools to separate things with: it caused the human brain to literally split up into different function zones. As its body had been split: so too was its brain.

By Hominid brain functions becoming more separate and more specialized, these neural transmissions began to bounce back and inter-act with each other. Hominid-Human evolution can be described by one word: reflectivity. We became reflectively self-aware. Instead of integrating our instincts: Hominid-Human brain development was a process of integrating experience.

When thrust out of its womb still unprepared, undeveloped: unable to survive by itself for over twelve years. How can a half-developed Hominid fetus adjust to being thrust out of its womb? It relies on instinct. Its needs are mostly instinctual. This means that its parents must recognize, and be connected-to these instincts in order to fulfill the infant's needs and take care of it properly.

But... the growth and maturation of human growth and awareness is away from all instinctual intelligence, towards experiential intelligence: until that experiential base becomes dominant. As a result: adult Hominids and Humans lost their ability to understand and respond to the instinctive needs

Human parents do not raise their infants instinctually. They raise them by how they were taught to raise infants. If at all. Experientially, not instinctively. How does an experientially based adult recognize-know and supply all of the infant's instinctual needs? The answer is that it doesn't.

This means that no human infant has been raised properly... ever.

Whatever mistakes are done, are the due to lack of instinct and an overbalanced accumulation of experiential knowledge of the adult. There is no way around this biological fact. This remains true to this day: it has never changed. As a species: we were genetically designed to be raised in only one basic way. Up until now: there has been no attempt to find out just what that way is. All that needs to be done is to study modern child rearing. Each culture raises its young differently. Each set of parents does so also. There is no agreement on which way is correct amongst any of them.

A fetus's instinctual development and its experiential development occur simultaneously.

But which part is instinct, and which part is experience?

How much of an infant's responses are instinctual? How much are they experiential?

At each stage of a child's growth: the answer is different. The more a human grows, the more its behavior is experientially determined by what it learns. Until it no longer cries when it is unhappy, or sleeps when it is tired. Because of the changing dynamic of instinct and learning during human growth: during each stage of growth, these two gateway controls are different.

This process is a sliding scale of two shifting gateway controls. Instinctual control diminishing: while experiential control increases. To the point where instinctive feelings and urges are largely discounted and ignored throughout all human societies; and only conscious learning is used.

How this changing dynamic of these two aspects of awareness occurs during the transformation of a fetus, into an adult: has never been examined. At what level-degree is each of these two survival adaptations functioning at each point in this process? How much are they connected, or related to each other? In what way? The human brain is a layered organism: a large experiential processing center wrapped around a small primitive instinctual core. Yet the small core contains more neurons than all the rest of the brain combined. This is no surprise. It contains 4 billion years of our entire genetic history, compressed and collated into instinctual wisdom. It also runs all of our involuntary body functions.

The maturation of the human brain from a fetus to an adult is a process of two different changing levels of control: learning and instinct. As the outer cerebrum develops, it takes over control from the primitive instinctual core. This is a process of one system growing, while slowly overriding the other. It roughly mirrors the evolution of our brain development over the past 4 million years. It is far too infinitely complex and subtle to be properly studied in detail by any kind of scientific measurement. Yet it is precisely this shifting dynamic which needs to be understood if we are to understand the process of our own growth and development.

The Splitting of Human Life-Energy

Our history as modern humans is not genetic; it is experiential. Meaning our learned history is not stored inside our genes as other living organisms learned history is. Our flow of life-energy was split into two different kinds of energy: Experiential Life-Energy, and Instinctual Life-Energy. This process of the larger Outer learning center of our brain, overtaking the smaller Inner instinctive center: created us as we are today. The life-energy of our bodies split. First into two body-function zones. Then into two body-brain Energy levels. Then our Brain Energy, or Human Awareness, split into an Inner and Outer Awareness.

With instinctual energy: the body is constantly changing, new cells being formed, old ones being excreted, air-water-nourishment entering into our bodies, being transformed into new living cells... all this energy goes on to take part in other energy cycles through the Air-Earth-Water of our living ecosystems... being transformed by chemical-physical changes into other kinds of substances, as all other energies do in our Universe. But: with experiential life-energy, known as a human personality-self-awareness-psyche-soul... it could not dissolve-flow-change. It was reflective. It bounced back. It was separate. Both exist within the same living person at the same time: except they exist on different energy-levels.

When the physical body dissolved, the reflective human self-awareness did not totally dissolve; instead it stayed separate, intact. This includes the self-awareness of ones own entire body. After death; the neural organic circuits of the human tool-brain cease to function. How could any energy pattern relying on these neural circuits remain intact and not decompose, not fall apart and dissipate with the rest of the organic brain tissue in death? The answer is that 99.999% of that reflective neural energy pattern does in fact dissipate along with the rest of the organic tissue. But there remains that faint un-measurable energy imprint leftover, the memory-tape imprint of reflective, abstractive human life-energy.

If humans possessed the power to measure the totality of all of the Energy of a living person before and after death... Assuming one could trace and identify all of the levels and kinds of energies involved, if we were able to identify what kind of energy this discrepancy was made of and measure it: then we would be able to quantitatively, scientifically and mechanically prove the existence of abstractive human life-energy... which can and does survive after the body's genetic death. But we cannot mechanically measure; much less perceive all of the energies involved in human life-energy. In fact, we are completely incapable of mechanically identifying or measuring life-energy at all.

Artists have a saying of how things which they create, take on a life of their own. Writers speak of how a character they create takes on a life of its own. That is because of how the sensory feedback model of our brains and bodies are structured. Instead of flowing out and being processed and changed by other Energies... Our creative Energy reflects back into our brains. As a result: our creative Life-Energy becomes caged inside our own mind, and develops its own Life-Energy... instead of merging with all other Life-Energy around us. Because our reflective brain is getting most of the feedback from its own reflective thought-patterns. This is why and how the dynamic of a writer writing a fictional story works:

Notice it is the story and the characters that evolve, and change, and grow... not the writer.

Using an object... as an object... with a goal, an objective, an object-in-mind...using the mind as a tool, using thoughts as objects-objectives. The only way you can have an inhuman goal like an objective... is to use things and treat them like objects. The only way you can have an objective or have an object as a goal: is to be objectively inhuman; by treating all organic and in-organic living things as if they were dead objects.

This is why Science is inhumane.

This is why human abstraction is so inhumane.

The fact is that we as humans are able to recognize and sense the human life-energy that has gone into the creation of any human artifact. All you need to do is to go to a museum. Humans are fascinated by any dead object that was once made by another human. Why? You might as well ask; why are people able to sense when they are being stared at? There is no scientific explanation for this. Yet all humans possess this ability. Other animals possess it also. All that can be said; is that energy cannot be destroyed. Whatever amount-level-kind of human life energy was focused into the creation of any human artifact, that energy is still there, and we pick up on it and respond to it. Just as we respond to the energy of a person staring at us.

Just because we cannot mechanically measure this kind of Energy does not mean that it doesn't exist. Call it whatever you want: but the intangible life-energy that accumulates into an artifact by a human focusing and working on it; can be felt, and sensed by simply looking at that artifact. That energy does not fade. As long as that artifact survives: it will contain the accumulated life-energy which its maker put into it. The more intense the care and love that was poured into the making of an artifact: the more we are attracted to it and fascinated by it.

Similarly: the memory-tape-pattern of human awareness, psyche-soul does not fade after a person dies. It remains intact even after its organic dissolution. It does so, because that pattern is a reflective-separate energy pattern: which bounces back upon itself; and in doing so, cannot dissipate, cannot merge with other energies.

Human life experience is not passed on to the next generation genetically. What Science does not understand is that these electro-chemical patterns became permanently separated from all other energy pathways. Once designed and set up to function reflectively, they do not change in their energy containment. Why? Because, since these pathways are reflective, the energy itself becomes reflective. It does not dissipate-flow-change as all the other energy pathways of the physical body do. So; you have a situation that while living; this reflective energy-pattern is partially connected to its own body and is also partially totally reflective. When the human animal dies, its genetic-instinctual-life-energy flows-changes, while its experiential-reflective life-energy does not. Even after the structure of these reflective pathways organically dissolves, there is still an energy imprint that remains intact.

How can an energy pattern remain intact even after its physical framework dissolves?

To date, there is no way Science can measure this or establish the truth of this statement. Science is limited to only what it can measure mechanically. To put this into perspective: write down a list, all the new kinds and levels of energy Science has discovered in the last 200 years. Are we supposed to presume that no other kinds or levels of energy exist except those which have just recently been discovered?

We cannot explain life-energy by any kind of scientific measurement: because we are incapable of measuring it, except on various unconnected levels. Nevertheless: human life-energy has been slowly evolving into two separate neural functions.

Part of this energy bounces back.
Part of it does not.

If you think of something to say, and say it. If you decide to do something and do it. You are projecting your life-energy outside of yourself. But if you think of something, and do not say it. If you decide to do something, and do not do it. Then that life-energy stays inside you. It is that simple.

The increasing complexity and reflectivity of the Hominid brain finally resulted in a neural brain function that bounced energy back enough to create self-awareness. So when the first humans died, their self-awareness separated from the physical Universe and remained intact.

The Definition of What is Human

Now we come to what is human: a human is an animal that:

- 1 .Uses tools.
2. Perceives things separately.
3. Recognizes itself in a mirror.
4. And buries its dead.

The first three characteristics are related to the fourth.

Humans possess a reflective self-awareness that perceives everything outside it as being separate from itself...and its own thoughts-psyche as being separate from its own body. Yet, we are regenerating organisms. Our bodies function as processing pathways for different kinds of energy... including the energy of our thoughts, feelings and observations. No human can regard any living cell of their own body as being absolutely separate. Each cell is involved in energy-processes so gradual and so subtle: that there is no way of separating its energy from the interconnections of all these processes... without destroying the integrity of the whole.

Our bodies are changing each day: they are not separate from the universe we live-in. Yet we consider ourselves to be separate. Simply because our awareness is separate from the universe... even though our bodies are not.

This is the fundamental split between our awareness-personality-psyche-soul and our physical bodies.

We are reflectively self-aware animals: separated from birth, by the traumatic separation of a half-developed fetus from its womb-mother, separated by millions of years of tool- use, separated by genetic design, separated by neural brain function... into animals who have separated ourselves our natural environments, from living in natural ecosystems, from our own genetic, instinctual wisdom, from each other, and from our inner selves.

We spend our entire lives perceiving things separately: perceiving a petal as separate from a flower, a leaf as separate from a branch, a branch as separate from a tree, the air we breathe as separate from our bodies. Even when all scientific information plainly shows that all these separate things are mere illusions; we ignore these scientific facts, and cling to our perception of separateness: because that is how our perceptions are designed to function. We are created as a separate awareness: unable to re-enter the energy flow of the universe. We are tool-users who have based our entire perception of the universe upon separation, not connection.

Why do humans bury their dead?

The reason lies in the conceptual nature of our awareness. All human abstract thought, all human language-words, all human tool-use, is based upon the idea of complete, or absolute separation. The term for this concept is called an absolute. All reflective fear is based upon the concept of the absolute. All human ideas are based upon the concept of the absolute, or terms of absolute separation. Absolute separation is the basic terrifying concept-dynamic-process of human existence. The very reason we fear separation, is because our self-awareness is separated from the rest of universe. When a person cuts a tree down in the forest, they perceive the cutting of that tree as an absolute separation. When they pluck a petal from a flower they perceive that plucking as an absolute separation.

If all the interwoven cyclic processes of any life form could be examined, we would realize that this small, narrow, time-focus upon any single separation is meaningless and invalid. That all separations are balanced by connections. But humans are not designed to perceive things in this way. We perceive things in terms of separation. That is how we use tools, how we survive, how we use language, how we see the world around us. We do not mourn the separated petal, or tree. Instead: we mourn our own dead. We bury them.

Why?

Because all human identity is based upon what it is connected-to. Any separation or destruction of our human connections is painful and traumatic: depending upon the degree to which we are connected to them. The explanation for this is because humans depend upon learning, not instinct in order to survive.

A human cannot genetically pass on the knowledge and learning needed for its offspring to successfully survive. Instead: it must do so experientially. And it must do this before it dies or else its knowledge is lost. In the beginning: any loss of learning or knowledge was crucial to our chances for survival. The older a person got, the more valued and important they became; because they could pass on their accumulated learning and experience of how to survive.

Other animals have served their purpose in life, their designed function; after they successfully raise their young. After that, the death of any individual organism is irrelevant to the continuation of its species. But not humans. The older humans got, the more valuable their accumulated experience, knowledge and wisdom became. The more their accumulated learning could aid in the survival of the group.

The veneration and worship of elders is a fixed universal concept in all primitive human cultures. What happened, was that people continued venerating them; even after they died. That is why all primitive cultures have some form of ancestor worship. There is no difference between the veneration of elders, and cultural phenomenon of ancestor worship; except the accumulation of customs-traditions-myths: eventually transforming one into the other.

Humans perceive death as being absolute. We also perceive it as being a traumatic separation. This is the irony of human existence: our awareness is based upon the perception of separation, yet... it is also based upon the fear of separation. We cannot understand how a unique personality-self-awareness-spirit-psyche-soul can suddenly disappear, go away: where? What happens to it? Human survival is based upon the preservation and accumulation of learning and knowledge. When a person dies and a rich resource of learning and knowledge crucial to our survival suddenly disappears. We perceive that living persons death as an absolute separation.

So what did early humans do? How did they preserve all of the knowledge and learning accumulated in that deceased person's personality-soul? Did that dead person successfully pass on all of their wisdom-insight-knowledge? How did they manage to survive without him or her?

Once our ancestors could learn how to survive by using tools instead of adapting genetically: experiential learning became crucial to their survival. Yet, the virtue, which enabled them to survive successfully, was also the fatal flaw of their intrinsic makeup. The very perception of any separation being absolute; made them vulnerable to being traumatized by being separated from anything they were closely connected-to. Because when it happened, they perceived the separation as being absolute in nature... as a shock so devastating; that they could not accept it.

In essence: tool-use, and its resulting evolution of the human brain into a reflective organism; created human trauma. It created the trauma of human separation by increasing the importance of learned experience and interpersonal relationships. Without conscious learning being necessary for our survival, without close intimate ties being necessary for interpersonal cooperation; humans would not be so devastated when the social fabric of their lives is rent apart by the death of a loved one. If we could survive merely by using our instinctive knowledge: we would not attach such importance to the death of anyone close to us. So, we desperately try and keep that connection of their passed-over loved ones intact; by preserving their remains in some way.

All traumas of the human psyche stem from the one-sided split of tool-use. The very definition of trauma is: an unhealed, imbalanced split in the human psyche.

A traumatic experience is one that splits off from the human psyche and is not fully digested, integrated and experienced.

This is because the human psyche evolved into a highly reflective awareness made up of three separate levels: instinctive, subconscious and conscious: with an infinitely creative ability to reflectively process and interpret its own experiences. We became able to dissociate ourselves from our own experiences. The same dynamic that split us off from our instincts and made us self-aware; also made us able to split our present consciousness away from any unpleasant, painful experiences or memories.

The trauma of birth-separation and the trauma of death-separation is a universal human condition. The experience of a fetus being separated from its mother's womb, is just as traumatic as the experience of a person being separated from their physical body when they die. We obsess over the last trauma. But we never look at the first one. Even though it is the first one that is far more important; and determines how traumatic the second one will be.

Other animals do not suffer from the accumulation of reflective trauma as much as we do; because their awareness is not as split-up as ours is. Reflective human psychobiologic trauma does exactly that: it splits off any damaging traumatic experiences it cannot integrate; and stores it somewhere, somehow; creatively... it allows these traumatic experiences to accumulate... to be reflectively split-off, trapped, frozen, and accumulated as blocked memories, or suppressed emotions, or muscle tension, or high blood pressure, etc..

One reason we possess the defense mechanism of splitting ourselves off from our own experiences, is because our using tools produced a faster learning curve.

The biofeedback of hand-eye coordination evolved into such a high reflective speed; that our brains evolved to be able to bounce back neural signals inside the forebrain that had been specifically designed-evolved only for tool-use. We became such highly reflective creatures, we needed to absorb and digest our experiences on an extremely high level of dynamic balance; through an extremely complex and sensitized process of integrated learning. If at any time this complex, delicate, process is upset, if we cannot fully integrate and digest those experiences: those experiences have to go somewhere. The reason we cannot properly digest them is that our awareness resides predominantly in our forebrain and is genetically separated from our bodies. Our brains and our bodies are not fully integrated on an instinctual level. Our conscious awareness is separated from our instinct. Reflective self-awareness, fear, fear of dying, trauma, wonder... are all only different aspects of a single process-dynamic; that was developed and evolved through using tools:

I.e. Separation-segmentation-specialization-accumulation... or repetition-duplication-preservation-perpetuation.

Why do humans bury the physical remains of their own species? Why did all early cultures practice the ritualized burial of their dead? Because it was the only connection they had left with this supposedly absolutely separated life-energy? Because they wanted to honor or worship that once-living person? Because they felt that dead person was still with them? Because they wanted to cling to what they were once connected-to? Because for humans: all absolute separation is traumatic? Because they possessed an instinctive wisdom telling them that energy cannot be destroyed and a human separate-reflective self-awareness does not completely dissolve or dissipate back into the universe? Or was it that in preserving their memory of that person, they tried to preserve their body only because that was all that was visibly left of them?

Here, you have to ask a crucial question.

Why did humans try to preserve something that is dead; as opposed to preserving something that is alive?

Because they couldn't face the horror of this supposedly final absolute separation?

Here is a very profound contradiction and hypocrisy. The perception and belief of absolute separation... that all human awareness, all human existence, all human understanding, all human lifestyles are based upon... is the same horror that humans cannot face or accept when it affects them directly.

In other words. If other people die; who are not connected to you personally.

That is normal.

If a tree you are not personally connected to dies.

That is normal.

If you use a knife to cut, separate.... An animal, or a blade of grass

That is normal.

But if someone else cuts your throat and kills you. By separating your carotid artery so you bleed to death in seconds... that is horrible

That is not logical

Not only is it not logical: it is insane.

Humans carefully and selectively... weed all awareness of horror out of what is normal. The state of normality is just a lack of the sense of wonder.

Nobody wants to admit that human normality is horrible. That normal human existence and normal human awareness is full of horror. Horror and normality are the same thing. It just depends on how selectively you look at it. We choose to selectively look at what is actually horrible and label it as normal. We choose to selectively look at what is actually normal and label it as horrible.

The first humans were born into the same condition of awareness as we are today. As reflectively self-aware animals; accumulating experience into a personality-psyche-soul.

Without the ability to learn experientially at a very high speed, humans could never have survived. This trait produced a universal human perception and a universal motivation.

This perception is... the absolute separation of one's own inner awareness from everything else. Or... an ego.

This form of insular awareness created fear. Humans live in a state of constant, insular, inner fear. Humans suffer from living in a state of constant instinctive-subconscious-conscious state of fear. Which they are mostly not aware-of.

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

We are motivated by fear. Not by courage.
All humans are motivated by fear.

The two universal motivations humans suffer from is:

The fear of dying
And
The fear of living.

This is the universal condition of insanity called human self-awareness.

Each one of us has been genetically separated from our bodies by developing a reflective mental awareness. We are genetically separated from our wombs at birth as a half-finished, half-developed fetus, squalling in terror, unprepared for this traumatic separation... Our parents unprepared in how to properly raise these helpless bundles of total dependency. We grow up increasingly to become separate from ourselves, and the outer world. Accumulating our own experiences into such a unique accumulation: that the uniqueness of our experiential memory-knowledge of our experiences... outweighs our genetic universality as a common species.

For all humans: separation means fear.

All humans fear separation.

All humans fear death.

More precisely not death itself; but dying.

This comes from our unique form of time-awareness. Because we have a split-off inner observer: that can stand back; and watch an impending event about to happen to us.

Keeping the dead alive in our memories would be more than sufficient as a way of preserving their legacy and honoring them. But we ourselves cannot face our own death without fear. So... rather than accept death as natural, or accept our own death: we seek to avoid that fear by clinging to the belief of transcendence.

But... is this supposed belief due only to our personal, subconscious fear of death? Or is it due to human awareness actually surviving physical death?

Actually: it is both.

But humans also fear experiencing life. They fear living also.

So rather than living. Or dying. Humans merely exist.

They merely function mechanically as tools and machines. Brainwashed by their cultures.

Human culture was produced by the re-re-reflecting biofeedback between our tools and our tool-brain.

In order to keep on creating tools: our ancestors had to repeat the same actions mechanically over and over again for millions of years. The basic principle of all these actions is: one-sided splitting.

All of our mechanically repeated actions originate from tool-use. The most obvious example of this in human culture is ritual and ritualized behavior. By performing the same tasks, the same repetitive movements over and over. By using the same tools in the same way for millions of years: tools ritualized hominid-human existence into a repetitive, duplicated, preserved pattern, which ultimately evolved into a complex culture... a lifestyle that was based upon abstraction and duplication. Using abstract symbols and words to communicate-with, and give meaning to their lives in order to justify and rationalize their existence.

Tools programmed the human brain to function and think like a tool.

Tools programmed us to think along separate, linear lines of thought.

Tools gave each tool-action, each tool-task and each tool-function: an abstract meaning.

Combine these tendencies into everyday life: and you get ritual.

All early cultures were extremely ritualized. Literally every action and aspect of life in these cultures was controlled or dictated by some kind of ritual. Both tool-use and ritual contain the same elements of replication, and repetition... all narrowly controlled and defined.

All human rituals are merely an outgrowth of tool-use.

These rituals are passed on from generation to generation and preserved: by being duplicated over, and over again.

Just as all tool making is based upon duplication, and tool-use is based upon repetitive, duplicated motions. Tool-use is based upon learned, not genetic intelligence. All rituals are based upon duplication, repetition and experiential learning: not instinct.

So: all mechanical repetition, duplication, tool-use... including ritual: are based upon the same dynamic of one-sided splitting. To wit.

Separation.

Segmentation.

Accumulation

By the creative use of abstract symbols and ideas: this produces what we call customs-traditions-rituals-myths-culture.

All of this follows the same tool-dynamic of one-sided splitting. All of this is accumulated, preserved and perpetuated.

The difference between this, and all other kinds of repetitive animal behavior: is that it is not instinctive.

You cannot separate ritualized behavior from tool-use.

You cannot separate ritual from culture.

And one of the earliest known rituals of all human culture is burial of the dead.

But even this does not fully explain worshipping the dead, leftover cadaver and trying to preserve it. The ultimate reason for us burying our dead comes from valuing our own tools. This is a natural outcome of tool-use. The most valued possessions humans had were their tools. Without them, they could not survive. It is in this way that we came to value and worship all dead things to which we become attached.

Just as we worship and preserve old furniture, old buildings, old books. Just as our ancestors could not survive without their tools: they could not survive without the knowledge and wisdom passed on to them by their elders.

The only way they knew how to value something dead: was by preserving it in some way.

Combine the corpse of a once living person they were once closely connected to, with their tool habit of preserving all dead knowledge-memories-tools-things: and it is no wonder humans buried or preserved their dead.

But most importantly: this burial or preservation was performed as a ritual. Just as the concept of absolute separation originates from tool use: so does the practice of all ritualized human behavior.

So basically: every possible and probable reason for humans burying their dead: originates from tool-use.

The Origin of Culture

By the time we humans emerged; our tool-brain had developed enough to perform the same processes of manipulation inside our brain without our hands... as we could outside, with our hands.

The result is what I call: abstraction. This process became highly creative. It produced an entire array of things that we call by different names, but all are a product of creative abstraction. The products of our creative abstraction: we call 'culture'.

The universal traits of all early human cultures are: tool use, language, accumulation, preservation of learning, and burial of the dead.

These traits are also the same factors that create all human culture.

What we are separated from, we do not know.

What we do not know, we do not understand.

What we do not understand; we fear.

Basically: separation = fear.

Human culture does have a universal root-origin-motivation. What humans are not connected to, what they are separated from: they do not understand. And what is bigger than they are, what they do not understand, is the universe. Fear of separation translates into the fear of death, fear of the unknown, fear of the universe: needing to control it, to manipulate it, and dominate it by using tools.

The purpose of human culture was to replace what humans lost, when they evolved into humans: their instinctive-genetic-ecological connection to the universe.

All cultures are fashioned and designed to give purpose and meaning to human existence. No other animal needs culture: because they already have a purpose in their life. No insect, or fish; no fowl, or mammal has any need to find out the purpose of its life except humans. Each living organism is already designed to function usefully as part-of its ecosystem. All forms of energy in the universe are designed to function usefully as part-of all the other energies they inter-act with.

All except the reflective life-energy of human self-awareness.

Through tool-use: we had successfully separated ourselves from the ecosystems we lived in. All other organisms inter-act on a very deep, complex genetic basis with their environments. Except for humans. We became loose cannons: roaming at will throughout any and all ecosystems. Our ability to learn faster from our experiences and manipulate tools made any ecological balance unnecessary. We stopped serving any useful function in the ecosystems we lived in. Humans no longer were dependent upon being connectively balanced to any ecosystem in order to survive.

But this works both ways. The ecosystems no longer needed us either. Our tool-brains were now reflective: capable of learning-changing, far faster than any evolutionary process of adaptation. The human tool-brain had evolved into becoming its own tool. It could manipulate not only objects: it could manipulate its own perception of objects through language. It could manipulate its own emotional perceptions, its intellectual perceptions through the use of ideas and attitudes. It could manipulate its own ideas of actuality: by constructing an artificial inner environment to live in.

Except... in the context of the fevered brain in the narrow, focused, pyramidal perception of one person in one instant of time... this creative process was and is non-contextual.

It is not determined or controlled by a larger context, or a larger environment.

As a result: this creative process became completely arbitrary-random-nonintegrated... in relation to the rest of the universe: including members of its own species.

The human animal through its own ability of tool-use, and through its own reflective self-awareness: had lost any greater purpose for its own existence.

It had lost its greater context. It had no larger purpose, no larger meaning. It served no useful larger function because it was no longer an integral part-of the larger eco-systems it lived in.

So... It created its own purpose, it created its own meaning... Arbitrarily through its use of language, it's use of abstract concepts. It found itself in a strange frightening universe needing to understand and explain why it was there in the first place. Needing to serve a useful purpose, needing to have some greater meaning to its life. The nature of all human awareness is reflective: its reflective reality is itself.

So humans reflectively projected that separate self out... Onto the universe: creatively. Arbitrarily.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Anthropomorphizing the universe into human terms, into human attributes: so the earth became a mother, the sun became a father.

All early human cultures attribute a reflective self-awareness to everything around them. These entities or spirits supposedly exist in the trees, the animals, the rocks, the waters, the air, the clouds. What all anthropology is blind to; is that the very definition of a spirit or entity: is a reflective self-awareness. What we call spirituality, is us: projecting our own self-awareness out onto everything around us.

Whatever humans connect-to, they also project-onto and arbitrarily-creatively manipulate this projection to suit their own needs. They creatively made explanations of the universe as a reflection of themselves... As a convenient-arbitrary, non-contextual projection of their own human social microcosm...

This is one basic reason-function-motivation-origin of culture. It includes the accumulation and preservation of knowledge, plus the preservation and worship of the dead. Put all these elements together and you have the creation of cultures-myths-legends-fairy tales-religion-tradition-custom-ritual-imagery-symbols-concepts. The accumulation of all these separate factors piling up to be preserved as an intermixed, segmented accumulation.

When did we first begin to invent myths?

When we began killing other animals. When we began eating meat. When we became hunters.

In Africa on the veldt: our ancestors began eating animal protein simply because there was so much of it. With all other eco-systems, animal protein is the most difficult to obtain, and only the top predators are strong enough and hunt-intelligently enough to get it... and are designed to eat it and use it. This is because their animal protein is designed to recycle itself back into the energy system without needing too many carrion-eaters because there is so little of it. But on the African veldt, there is too much animal protein to be processed by only the usual carrion eaters. If there had only been flies and insects to eat the dead animal bodies, they would have rotted into the earth and poisoned the earth with its un-processable chemicals that stay there and kill all living things in the soil. As long as the carrion eaters ate the dead kills of the predators fast enough so they could not leach into the soil, the soil stayed healthy... too healthy. It became the healthiest soil on this planet. It could... and still can; survive the worst droughts, the worst rainstorms and the worst floods easily.

No other plant-kingdom, soil-oil dynamic balance is this rich in over-lapping energy-forms that have so many near-indestructible links to each other inter-connectively... so in any stage of dormancy, they stay healthy and do not weaken. This is because of the depth of the African soil. It rests on a previously covered and buried eco-system. This millions of years old eco-system was covered by the ash deposits from the volcanic eruptions that spewed out of the rising magma outlets when the African continent (at that time it was connected to other continents)... began splitting apart... separating an entire totality of merged eco-systems. That were irreparably damaged and have never recovered their old, mild life-energy levels. They became aggressive eco-systems... that mostly colonized, or infiltrated other ecosystem areas like the Indonesian jungle, the jungles of Borneo, Malaysia, and the Amazon rainforest.

However in Africa: the increased energy levels were imbalanced. On one side, you have a lush tropical forest with tons of diversity in all levels except animal. Why? Because it is sitting on a weak soil energy system. Tropical forests have too much rain. That rain washes away most of the soil.

Animals... most of them need some kind of soil to burrow into, and open space to move. On the other side, you have much less diversity except animals. Why? A strong animal kingdom... because it has a deep soil-base... that instantly replenishes itself so that animals can use it and open space to move. There almost nothing there to eat except food only designed mostly for grazing animals and predators.

The entire purpose and reason for these two eco-systems were corrupted. They stopped being eco-system that supported as many different diverse species as possible, as harmoniously as possible, as mildly as possible. Instead: they began producing polarized conditions that polarized its species into harsher and harsher levels of conflict and battle against each other.

The early hunting apes began to have a bad conscience about all this killing. They had originated from a peaceful ecosystem, and did not survive the new, evolved new-love... tough-love life-system. Even the ones that survived could not rid themselves of the guilt of being forced to become killers when they had existed previously as non-killers, non-dominant species before the splitting of the mostly African continent. This had to be endured. Human ancestors found a way to not endure it, but excuse it.

In case you do not know... there is no such thing as a happy predator. Unless it is in an eco-system where it is gladly accepted and welcomed by all, and I mean all of the other life-forms; as a good energy.

What were the results of both hominids and humans excusing their killing for millions of year?

Ritual sacrifices... tradition-bound into each culture as sacred, sanctified acts.

How was hunting made endurable? How did humans keep the act of killing almost every week; from turning them into mass murderers and rapists and destroyers?

By separating the act of killing from their own persona and their own personal responsibility.

By creating an imaginary higher power which gave them the right to kill. By a higher power making them lords, kings of their ecosystem. By a buffalo spirit coming to them in dreams; and explaining to them why it was normal and good to be killed by a human?

Once the earliest hunters of our hominid species left the African veldt they found mild ecosystems. And became top predators. Only... not welcome. Not wanted. Not needed. They became displaced animals without any welcome, safe eco-system. They were already killers. But... they were only lowly scavengers... they had never evolved to become integrated into any eco-system as its top predator.

But also...

They became a lost, wandering species... they had lost any true meaning to their own existence.

However.... They also became a more curious, wondering-wandering, exploring species.

The problem in traveling was that, they could not instantly adapt perfectly to each new eco-system. They began breaking the universal law of all living things:

Do no harm

In order to hide this from themselves: they created myths. They began attributing all kinds of superior abilities to the animals they killed. They began to make appeasements to the animals they killed. They began making ritualized sacrifices each time they killed anything. The guilt of killing things wrongly: ate at their insides. So... the only way they could kill anything wrongly; was to invent stories that are such awful nonsense: people today can scarcely understand how these rationalizations were ever swallowed and accepted as an unquestionable sacred truth.

This is one origin of the early destructive myths of all hunter-gatherer societies. Each one has its own set of special rationalizations and explanations and justifications for hunting and killing other animals. Some myths do have positive elements and positive messages. But the positive and negative elements have all been so mixed up together: that it would take thousands of books to sift through all of the thousands of different myths and separate what is fact and what is fiction. What is truth and what is lie. What is actually good and what is actually evil about them.

Another reason for the creation of myths was fire. The invention of fire as a central evening ritual; it had storytellers gathering around the fire and vying with each other about who told the best stories. The best hunters may have come home with the carcass of a big animal.

However: a better storyteller could lie about an even bigger one. The one that got away.

And impress the whole clan more than a hunter who was not as good a story teller, not as good a liar.

So even men who were not good hunters could still be held in high esteem. A social status based upon their ability to entertain others about imaginary monsters and adventures they never had.

So... by their egos being falsely rewarded from delivering an empty, made-up tale-or-myth.

By poor hunters envying better hunters and trying to outdo them around the fire at night instead of during the day.

Their status was raised. Until they dominated the true hunters by storytelling. Until storytellers became heads of entire tribes. This custom of false worship became an unquestioned tradition. Shaman, wise men, cunning liars, devious plotting power mongers... did not have to hunt to prove their prowess at all. All they had to do, was be the most successful, most inventive liar of their respective tribe or band, or religion.

Anthropologists have found this to be the case; in every tribe they have ever studied all over the world.

Humans are uncritical about their own culture. Humans are uncritical about their own beliefs. Humans believe myths without trying to sift the truth from the lies. This is the plain, common-sense fact about the origin of all myths, cultures, traditions, religions and beliefs.

The true domination, true ability of superior bravery, courage and honesty in hunting and living was replaced by false domination, the false ability of fooling people through words-language-exaggeration-manipulation of the truth. The highest status went to those who could fool people better; simply by lying, exaggerating, telling better tall tales.

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

230

Uncritically swallowing.

Any culture,
Any religion,
Any dogma,
Any scientific model,
Anybody else's opinion.
Any tall tale.

Is just as poisonous as eating a piece of shit that might have a few kernels of truth in it.

Human hunting societies merely removed themselves one step further from their own killing by ritualizing it through abstraction, and turning their guilt magically into a justification for their own existence, and literally making their explanation-Myths become the backbone of meaning in their lives. The creation of Myths making killing sacred. The ritualization of these Myths into hunter-gatherer cultures. The mindless use of killing tools. Turned our ancestors and us into killers. We have no problems in killing other animals.

How was it so easy?

Simple. Just invent a convenient myth that superficially rationalizes your killing something. Rationalize your lifestyle. Not anybody else's lifestyle. Just your own custom-made lifestyle. With its own custom-made, custom-fitted customs, myths, legends, and beliefs, and rituals. Simply custom-fit a rationalized Myth, together with legends, sagas, folk-tales, fairytales, rituals, traditions, customs... which becomes your cultural identity. In effect: your culture becomes who you are. This cultural identity conveniently preserves, rationalizes, and justifies, and sanctifies your convenient killing lifestyle. Not any other tribes. So... killers of fish develop different legends from killers of deer. Each tribe made up their own inventive lies, and tall tales. Why do you think they are called tales? Because that was the leftover evidence that they could not hide. It was the one thing they could not use. They had to explain why the tail of the animal was leftover after they had killed and eaten it.

They had to tell the story of the hunt. They had to make up story of the killed animal to explain why it asked to be killed. They had to make the tail longer and bigger; to justify killing the animal. Until the animal, until the tail, was so big that it attacked them... Until they were merely defending themselves against this tall tail. Then the others could kill that animal because those animals were tall... they had magical powers that could kill and destroy them if they were not killed.... There were endless inventive lies told about dead animals and living ones; to explain and justify and rationalize anything our ancestors conveniently wanted to justify.

Simply by looking at the Outer World fearfully: our ancestors magnified their fears and projected them onto the things and animals they feared. Until they became preserved as sacred stories, or Myths. Until the animals gained mythic proportions; and it was alright to kill to kill such huge, powerful, Mythic, feared creatures.

You mean literally all Myths are mostly made up of lies and hidden, twisted subconscious symbols and meanings?

230

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

231

Yes.

Mixed in with a few half-truths and whole truths that are sufficiently poisoned and warped and stunted; to ignore the actual truths these myths symbolically reveal.... subconsciously.

By continually twisting and working at their Myths: they fitted each new generation's particular fancy, or imagination, or needs. Or wants, or imaginations. Depending on the states of their selective awareness. That is, until they became preserved, ossified, and petrified into unchanging, sanctified rituals and traditions. Then the entire process of 'tall tales' and the creative justification for meaning was frozen... and no later generations were allowed to change these finally frozen distorted-evolved lies and Myths.

There is one universal excuse all of these hunting-killing societies used to rationalize their own killing: It is one of the oldest lies and excuses in human evolution...

'He made me do it.' 'All of them made me do it.' 'The devil made me do it.' 'A spirit told me to do it.' 'The ----Gods spoke to me and spoke to me from-on-high and ordered me to kill this animal.' 'The Great spirit told me to do it...' Usually it was the spirit of the animal they killed. 'A higher power made me do it.' 'With the power of the spirits that reside in my bow, I killed this animal. I did not do it.' 'The gun shot that man. I was only holding it and it went off accidentally.'

'I was forced to do it.' 'How? Why?'

'Oh... the animal spoke to me and asked me to kill it. It wanted to give itself to me. It wanted to give its life to me.'

Oh. In that case it's all right... This dead animal is now sacred. Worship the spirit of this dead animal. Not the energy of the living animal. Or else it will come back and haunt you from the grave. It will haunt you forever.

As our own ancestors have haunted us and given us no peace when we disobeyed them and tried to live without killing animals.

We were almost annihilated by that other tribe because we almost forgot how to kill.

All early hunting societies were, and are ritualized down to the bone. The entire hunt is in the co-existing text of a ritual. All of nature is ritualized. Weapons are ritualized. Words, gestures, are ritualized. Techniques are ritualized. Thought patterns are ritualized. Emotions are ritualized. Literally all actions are ritualized!

How can I punch this realization into a modern brain?

Literally everything was a ritual with these people.

There was no such thing as a free thought, or a creative idea...

There was no such thing as an acceptable feeling or wish.

Everything was ritualized.

If anything went wrong?

Evil spirits were the cause of the wrongness; not you

231

The Gods were angry with you.
You have offended the spirit of...
But which spirit have I offended?

Which of course brings us to the witch doctor: the tribal shaman: the sham, the shyster... who is supposed to be able to discern which one it was and what you should do in order to appease it. Until people get used to being told what to do whenever there is a crisis or a problem. Which creates an artificial false authority inside human society... etc.

This is one example of the convenient ways in which our ancestors avoided any personal, or communal, or cultural responsibility. Spirits ruled them. Spirits told them what to do. Spirits were more powerful than they were. Everything had spirits in them. Everything was full of spirits; some good... most were bad and evil. This is where the word and idea of modern spirituality comes from.

The earliest boats were simply upside-down rig cages, with skin pulled over them. How were they first made? By using any large mammal's ribs and spine with its skin pulled over it after the carcass was eaten. You can make a kayak out of one, or two walrus skeletons and their skins. These rib-skin first-boats; explain how the first modern humans managed to migrate to the Pacific islands and Australia 75,000 years ago. Using the bones and skins of the animals they killed needed no fancy technology. All they had to do was kill a large animal that had large ribs and a long spine... curve the spine by tightening it with the drying skin over it: and you have a boat. No Carpentry necessary. Why do you think boats have ribs? And a Keel? Because you have to kill the animal to make a keel out the spine of your kill. Without a keel: the boat keels over. A dead animal keels over after being killed... or keeled.

More than one culture colonized one continent. Different cultures kept their tool-cultures unchanged for thousands of years. The more advanced tool-tribes systematically and destructively killing off all the big game... and also other humans who did not have their superior killing abilities. Why? Because they were all going after the same food resources. Only the less advanced tribes were only after the remains once the killers made their kill. Can you imagine the anger and hate one tribe would have: after they finish with a kill and come back to find some dirty scavenger tribe breaking open the marrow bones of their killed carcass... with their crude stones? Where do you think the concept of ownership came from? From humans owning, and using the dead animals they killed. To ritualize a death, a hunt, a kill. To make it sacred... and find some filthy scavenging tribe despoiling the sacred carcass? Where do you think the word: avenge comes from? From scared scavengers who desecrated the sacred remains of their killed animals, and ran away. From the angry returning owners of those dead carcasses: chasing the scared scavengers ... avenging the sacrilege of their kill being desecrated.

The earliest north American cultures invented bone-tools and flint tools by themselves. Beginning with the most crude marrow bone-splitting with crude stones as the first form of stone technology. After north American humans began splitting mammoth-bones: did they start evolving that crude technology into sophisticated bone-stone technology? Or did the earliest ones go extinct? With newer waves coming later to exterminate them? Regardless: early modern humans in the Americas duplicated the entire earlier evolution and history of human tool-use in Africa, and Asia.

What had happened in Africa and Europe was re-enacted in north America. The Cro-Magnons exterminating the Neanderthals in Europe, and the Clovis culture exterminating the earlier north American humans, and taking over the continent. The same basic history. Only at different times, and on different continents.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

However... once modern humans managed to kill off all the other walking apes in Europe. Once the same sub-species managed to kill off all its fellow tribes in north America. Once the Asian modern humans managed to kill off all the walking ape subspecies in Asia. Once the African modern humans found that all the other walking apes had gone extinct and there were no more human enemies left to kill.

They had a big problem.

They had been evolving and developing a tool culture for millions of years: because half of them had been the weakest, most cowardly, most lying, and dishonest walking ape species on earth.

The others, the braver ones, the less cunning ones were all killed off.

Now they had no more enemies left to fight against. Now they had no more enemies to kill. But they had a tool-culture: based upon killing all the large mammals around them. They had already hunted many of them into extinction. Now the remaining large mammals were no great threat to them... so they only had one choice left. They began killing each other... even though most of these tribes lived so far apart from each other that they had to travel huge distances to fight each other. So in order to rationalize and justify this instinctive need to find and hunt down large mammals, and have enemies they hated and feared: they invented the idea of territory... ancestral lands which their ancestors had traveled through for thousands of years without ever considering that land to be theirs... in any way, shape, or form. But now it was different. Now they were kings of all they surveyed. Now all the animals and lands they traveled over existed only for their benefit. So they began killing each other. They became robber barons... kings of their respective territories, in which they only killed, and used, and traveled through... barons of their huge landed estates... becoming incensed and outraged that any baron or king, or chief, or tribe of robbers... should have the audacity, and the temerity as to even live near them, and not live in constant fear of being attacked. And not run, and leave them in peace... so no other human or other large mammal could ever challenge their superiority and rightful kingship to all the lands of the earth. They could own everything in sight...

Whatever they saw: they owned.

Whatever they said was theirs: was theirs by automatic assumption of the right of the dominant animal species on earth to do as it pleased.

Today... we modern humans use even more killing tools than our ancestors ever did. We modern humans have learned how to use tools in many other ways. We have learned how to kill by abstraction. Upping the power of killing through machines. Through mass pollution, mass destruction, mass genocide, mass extinctions, mass-production, mass warfare, etc.

Make no mistake about this. The first human hunting cultures, the first pre-civilized humans... were walking killing machines.

And in order to hide this unpleasant truth. The earliest myths and cultures were and still are a bunch of crazed, irrational schizoid, insane, rationalizations which make no rational, logical sense.

The origin of human sacrifices. The origin of human non-love. The origin of human guilt. The origin of human culture. The origin of hate. The origin of racism. Not only comes from our ancestors, killing living things wrongly for literally millions on years. But it also comes from millions of years of greater natural forces and influences that our species had no control over.

That is.

Until now.

Now, today: we humans have the wherewithal to understand what happened.

Now today: we have the power to decide what to do about it.

The Tool-Dynamic of Civilized Culture

In essence: the birth of the human species was also the birth of human trauma. By its genetic process and structure; birth itself became traumatic. Simply by losing touch with our instincts. We lost touch with 4 billion years of genetic wisdom.

Human birth became traumatic by our ancestors evolving a reflective, defensive, awareness that could split up its own experiences. By its very nature, human reflective awareness acts as a defense against any trauma.

But it is the creation of reflective awareness itself, which made reflective trauma possible, and also created the necessary defense against trauma. The evolution of human self-awareness created the perception of reflective fear. The evolution of time-awareness also created reflective fear, which is a result of the same dynamic. Instead of only being designed to experience our life directly without reflection, we also have the ability to perceive that: ‘oh, this going to happen...’ this created the vulnerability of the non-integrated human psyche being traumatized by not being capable of integrating certain experiences. It also created the instinctive defense against trauma of splitting off experiences it could not handle or integrate. Only: we did not learn how to later, properly re-integrate these split-off experiences. As a result: humans are mostly stuck with their early childhood traumas for the rest of their life.

Along with infant, childhood and adolescent trauma, all human cultures developed reflective fear: fear of separation, fear of death, fear of change, fear of the unknown. Because of all those fears: humans created abstract codes-laws-superstitions-ideas-rituals-values which each culture forced its inhabitants to live by. Warfare probably magnified the concept of cultural exclusion: creating the xenophobic fear and hatred of strangers. But all of these reflective factors occur simultaneously in a complex series. You cannot say which came before the other. The evolution of human culture and cultural identity is the tipping of the balance where humans changed their entire awareness of themselves, of each other, and of the universe. Their reflective Inner Universe created an inner existence, an inner identity and an inner reality that was self-created and separate from their outer universe. And the group expression of that inner reality became their group identity, their cultural identity.

Apart from the preservation of knowledge, custom, tradition and myth: the most basic, earliest living root of any culture is based upon two complimentary balanced forms of human self-expression that are both abstractive and actual in nature. They are the connected-integrated-balanced creativity of singing and dancing. Both activities involve the body and the brain in a balanced way. But instead of human creativity itself being valued, developed, and perpetuated: it was the product of that creativity which was valued, accumulated, preserved and perpetuated. Due to the dominance of tool-use in human society, rather than continually and creatively changing; singing and dancing became ritualized and repetitive..

The difference between human creativity and that of all other animals is tool-use. Other animals creatively find a way to survive each day, reacting and adapting creatively to each new situation. So did our ancestors; except they did it mostly with tools. But our creative tool-use effectively squelched the rest of the entire spectrum of human creativity by the dynamic that is used to make tools, i.e. Separation-segmentation-accumulation-duplication-preservation. By having to re-make the same tools over and over again, our ancestors were trained-programmed into repetitive actions... into all kinds of repetition and duplication, which was ultimately mirrored in human culture as all kinds of repetitive, duplicated rituals, traditions and customs. We stopped living creatively each day, dealing with each new situation differently; except by using tools. Thus, our everyday behavior became ritualized into a set of narrow cultural norms. While our tool-creativity expanded and increased, our cultural dynamic became ever more rigidly set into the tool dynamics of preservation, repetition, and duplication.

The human brain works by reflection and projection. But how can you tell which is which?

Are you projecting a reflection?

Or are you reflecting a projection?

Which is the actual truth?

Where did the projected reflection come from?

Where did the reflected projection come from?

How many mirrors reflected the actual image: before it was projected as a distorted reflection?

How much is an experience or impression of reality or an experience altered, twisted, distorted, changed, censored, blocked out, ignored, selectively focused on, etc?

How true is the projection to the actual truth, the actual image? How true is the reflection to the actual truth, the actual image?

How true is the projection to the actual reflection?

How true is the reflection to the actual projection?

What is the difference between a reflection and a projection?

Are you experiencing reality directly? Or are you experiencing a reflection... or a projection of reality?

For example:

Whatever is ritualized: automatically becomes sacred.

Whatever is sacred: automatically becomes ritualized.

What is the difference? There is none. Does it matter which came first? No. The result is exactly the same.

We have refused to look at, how anything can be ritualized if you want it to be, how anything can be made sacred. Anything can be turned into a legend, or a myth. We never critically analyze how we use myths. We never critically analyze why myths are used. We never critically explore and analyze where they actually came from, why they were invented, when they were invented, how they were invented... all the pertinent details which would explain everything have been covered up long ago, forgotten, lost, and buried by the passage of time and by human duplicity and the love of telling tall stories and lying and exaggerating. Myth is a result of ritual. Ritual is a result of myth. Sanctification is a result of ritual. Ritual is a result of sanctification. All of these words mean the same thing. All of them do the same thing.

Why is this inconvenient truth carefully brushed under the carpet of human awareness? If you stop long enough to consider the most obvious implications...

If anything can be made sacred... why then. Either everything is sacred. Or nothing is sacred. Or both? Or neither? It is logically impossible to make anything more sacred than something else... without distorting and imbalancing your own awareness and your perspective of what actually exists and what is actually true. And distorting whatever you are trying to selectively sanctify.

Whenever we consciously decide to give something more importance than something else; we are practicing selective awareness.

It is this intrinsic nature of our selective awareness which distorts the dynamic balance of our senses and perceptions automatically.

Paying attention to only one thing is natural. As long as the flow of that passing attention is used within the two totalities of Inner and Outer Awareness... simultaneously and connectively... as a dynamically balanced flow.

Human awareness is not trained this way. Instead, humans have trained their brains just like they have trained their brats... by spoiling them with indulgences when they need discipline, and disciplining them when they need freedom, love and acceptance most. Consequently: human awareness simply does not want to do the right thing. It shies away from even the simplest and easiest of solutions. It shies away from logical thinking. It shies away from logical feelings. It shies away from feeling logic and the logic of feeling. It shies away from emotional logic. It shies away from physical logic or any kind of logic that is organic and direct. This is the problematic dynamic of human reality, this is the problem of normality and abstraction and actuality re-reflecting between each other, so one mirrors the other. The resulting reflective distortions make it hard to tell what is actually true and what is not true.

In order to manipulate your own awareness to produce a desired sense of sacredness through the use of some kind of ritual; you have to use your brain like a tool... you have to concentrate intensely... you have to focus narrowly. Ritual is one way for the tool-brain to focus selectively upon something. By early human cultures ritualizing almost everything in their daily life, they trained their tool-brains exclusively by all sorts of pyramidal-selective forms of awareness. Consequently, the development of human awareness was preeminently devoted to that portion of the brain that focused pyramidally. I.e. Was good at using tools. Tools were what gave humans the power to manipulate and control their environment. They are the only things that insure our survival. By not only prizing and sanctifying their use, but by training their brains to function as a tool through the ritualization of their lives; humans not only guaranteed their own survival, they insured the survival of their tools.

What is invisible in this symbiotic relationship is that it is a one-way street... a total, complete, lopsided imbalance. Our tools evolved: we did not. We were forced to adapt to our own tools. Our own tools were adapted to make our lives easier... more convenient: but in actuality, our lives did not become easier or more convenient humanly speaking. Instead, all this newfound convenience and ease only led us to spend more time making and using more tools.

If you try to separate what you are as a human from your tools and your tool-brain, you will see what I mean. We have remained genetically the same animal; while our tools have evolved through amazing leaps of creative human life-energy used to produce them. We stopped being humanly creative and became the creators of increasingly elaborate and more complicated tools. Tools have been multiplying themselves through duplication and replications... using their human hosts symbiotically to survive, evolve, and flourish by feeding off our life-energy. Humans have multiplied also due to their using tools. Tools gave us an easy crutch of mechanical advantage: which we used and became too successful at survival... and ended up overpopulating the entire living earth with our one species that had never been genetically designed to live in such great numbers and in such close, packed quarters.

As long as we ritualize our lives into routines, habits, normalities: we will continue to be unaware tool-users, addicted to using more and more tools... spending most of our lives using tools; not spending our lives being human. Take away all ritual, habit, routine, normality, tool-use, tool-brain-use; and what is left? Ultimately; all ritualization of human life is dehumanizing. Not only because it forces us to act like mechanical objects; all bowing down in unison, all performing identical motions and seeking to possess identical thoughts and emotions; but because it robs us of our own lives, our own life-energy... which was originally designed to be poured into the sustainment and evolution of hominid-human life-energy, not the sustainment and evolution of tools.

In effect, all tool duplication and repetition destroys human creativity. All tool-use creates repetition, duplication, boredom, dead things and deadness. If you spend most of your life doing only a few repetitive acts like plowing a field, or working in a factory, you become bored, your awareness becomes desensitized; you develop a habitual routine of doing the same things the same way, with no leeway to creatively express yourself otherwise. Once you accept whatever routines, rituals, customs of your community and culture may practice, you stop being truly creative in your everyday life. The curse of all human culture is the inevitable loss-stifling of human creativity on many levels.

Here again you must ask the question: what is valued more? Something that is alive or something that is dead? Just as humans valued their dead tools, and the dead remains of their loved-ones: they valued the dead product of singing and dancing more than the living, creative process itself. Once humans began living in larger and larger groups: individual creativity gave way to the dominance of group creativity. All people singing the same thing; all people dancing the same way. Culture became a form of group identity. Rather than developing individual creativity, it was used to develop group conformity. The problem with this is that it is not based upon voluntary cooperation: it became an externally enforced form of conformity. Ideally in human society: conformity should only come from the closeness and intimacy of what is shared between people: not something being imposed forcefully from the outside. The reason for any compulsory external enforcement of conformity is based upon power, authority and fear. Reflective fear was the original corruptor of social harmony. Due to warfare with other bands... the fear of attack, the fear of death, being killed; this outer threat created the emotional corrupting climate of fear. This was the basic reason why each culture, each band developed an instinctive, protective reaction as a group. It was probably the original cause of all compulsory, enforced cultural conformity. Whenever conformity is a product of fear or hate: it becomes destructive and evil. This compulsory enforcement corrupted the basic cooperative dynamic of the band.

Human cultures define themselves by an outer enemy. Sometimes they define themselves by an inner enemy when there is nobody outside to hate or fear or envy. Most of the time: they define themselves by both an outer and inner enemy. The overpopulation of cities merely intensified this cultural tribal tradition... which changed the basic social dynamic of our species. Once there was no longer any free air to breathe, without bumping into other bands of hominids, once we stopped staying in our original ancestral area, once we became the top predator on earth by using and improving we tools; we literally had no one left to fight except each other.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Without an outer enemy: there is no reason for any human culture to even exist. There is no such thing as a culture without an outer enemy. No culture can thrive and grow without a challenge, without an enemy, without conflict, killing, war etc. History is full of examples of what happens to any race, nation, creed, city, etc. When their major enemy disappears and there is too much peace. Suddenly, people have to redefine who they are; they have to re-evaluate their goals, values, etc. They have to reinvent themselves, and find themselves a new enemy, new goals, new conflicts and new wars. And they don't.

History is full of what happened to non-combative cultures who did not even want an enemy... and refused to look at other races, tribes etc. As enemies: they were all killed, butchered, murdered and enslaved. Their cultures were stolen from them, their cultures were forbidden to be practiced, their cultures were poisoned, twisted, etc. One reason why Jewish culture has survived intact for so long is that it has had more enemies than other culture. Jews learned to survive every kind of brutality and butchery by martyring themselves to their own culture. Because they victimized themselves, abased themselves in public, debased themselves in public, cringed, acted the coward, acted the fool; their host countries tolerated them enough to let them live inside their culture... by acting out this form of public self-degradation and humiliation, they were acting out the necessary signs of cultural submission so they could practice their own cultural superiority in private without being massacred and killed. Until they surpassed all other cultures in the art of self-degradation, and cultural guilt, and cultural shame. And secrecy, cunning, and the arts of deception.

But once their cultural differences became too noticed... once other people read what the Jewish religion was... an elite culture that placed all other cultures below it and called its own people the only chosen people of god... and no other people or culture could claim that arrogant insanity from their past. Then they were persecuted. But once they became powerful... they became shameless, guiltless, and hoisted-projected the past history of their own cultural suffering onto the people they ousted... and excused it as a 2,000 year-old land-contract that they had been cheated out of by their own god... and rationalized re-colonizing that bit of real estate by their cultural arrogance of calling themselves the 'chosen ones' of the god who had originally exiled them 2,000 years ago? How many other cultures have tried this particular swindle? 'we used to live here 2,000 years ago, so now today; we have a legal right to take this land back and kick you out.' the pure audacity of it. The fact that they were the underdog at the beginning; was romantic to say the least. What if the north American Indians tried to do it? Or the Irish...? Oops, I forgot...that attempt is still in progress.

The Jews perpetuated their culture for thousands of years... by rationalizing themselves as the 'chosen ones': doomed to suffer their 'gods wrath' ... as outcasts, and wanderers in the desert. Why did their culture survive longer than others? Because: they had an outer external enemy: for a longer period of time. And also because they developed a new internal cultural invention: seeing every other human culture outside their own as an outer enemy all the time... whether they were enemies or not. They developed a new invention of perceiving the entire world as being against them, as an outer external enemy: whether it was true or not. They developed a new perception off seeing the entire planet, all earth as being against them: all the time. They created their own fate. Now Jews are still justifying and rationalizing their culture as both a victim culture... and also being the elite chosen ones... a culture superior to all other cultures. If you study comparative cultures, you will find that all... and I do mean all cultures... have this belief imprinted into the souls of their members; that they are better than anyone else. Their culture, their way of living, their ways of raising children is not only better; but also more sacred... And not to be questioned. If anyone violates this unspoken taboo; they are severely punished, shamed, killed or ostracized.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

However, what happens to Jewish culture once it is no longer a persecuted slave-culture but an elite power-culture? Once it becomes one of the top cultures of the world instead of the lowest? Affluent, educated Jews began to abandon their own culture in droves. Then anyone who still wants to martyr themselves for no good reason, anyone who wants to sacrifice themselves when there are no enemies to fight against, or sacrifice yourself against, so that your greater cultural people may live... becomes a Jewish comedian instead... and practices the art of self-degradation in public, but makes a good living at it and is rewarded for it.

What good is Jewishness? What good is any culture for that matter? Except to preserve old, dead, obsolete, idiotic beliefs, traditions, customs, recipes, dress codes, etiquette, myths, etc? One reason modern consumer culture is quickly drowning out other cultures is because without an outer enemy, without crisis situations: the old cultures lose their reason for existence and become watered down, obsolete, banal traditions which nobody takes seriously anymore. Without being under a crises, a siege of some kind; all cultures slowly rot, and slowly, agonizingly die out. Unless they are as hugely overpopulated as India or China: cultures only survive as long as their numbers increase. Overpopulation is the main survival tactic of all bacterial cultures and that includes all human cultures.

So: with a communal siege mentality, the need to preserve learning-culture, the abstract identity of the group accumulates and is preserved, perpetuated and worshiped. It is through this dynamic, that the dead product of this creativity strangles any further creativity. The older the culture gets, the more these traditions accumulate, the less room there is for any new, original creativity.

The traditions and customs of any culture are an attempt to compress all the wisdom of the past into a usable format. This does not work: because it is not integrated into the ever-changing process of life-experience-evolution. It just exists as an accumulation of the past: not an integration of it... And a badly accumulated one at that. Retaining only a handful of misbegotten practices. The reasons for which; are lost in the mists of time. From the very beginning: all human cultures have followed the imbalanced dynamic of one-sided accumulation.

But when did humans begin to preserve their culture and accumulate it? The obvious answer is that they did so at the same time when they began to preserve and accumulate other things also as a way of life. The degree to which they accumulated things goes back to the accumulation of learning, knowledge and tool-expertise. It goes back to the burial of their dead, to ancestor worship.

The most obvious thing about this process is that cultures do not flow together but remain stratified. It is only when you mix them together individual by individual, segment by segment; that there is any actual merging. While new customs accumulate on top, the old ones remained unchanged underneath. Just as new cultures accumulate on top of old ones. Today these strata span hundreds, even thousands of years of stagnant accumulation in the present makeup of human culture. This can be seen today in architecture: where modern buildings are still built with facades and pillars of a design over 2,000 years old. Simply because culture is worshipped for its age alone. Or how long it has been dead.

The increasing sophistication of human culture is the benchmark of humans living no longer by actuality, but by abstraction. Abstraction is the root of all human separation from actuality. Abstraction is what separates us from the universe, from nature, from other humans, and from ourselves. Once humans became abstractive, once they identified with abstraction more than actuality, once fear and separateness became a dominant condition of human awareness, then because of the abstractive nature of their different languages and cultures: humans became strangers, enemies. The problem is that all human abstraction is arbitrarily and randomly creative. On the level of abstraction, humans are intrinsically creative: but not connectively. Each person's abstractions are unique to them alone. Each offshoot of language and culture is an opaque mystery to all other languages and cultures. Humans are not universally understandable to each other because of their own abstractions. It is precisely the arbitrary creativeness of our own abstractions and our own culture and language that separate us from other people. So... The evolutionary process of tool-use from hominids to humans, the development of the tool-brain,

Self-awareness, language, culture...

Is all part of the same causal sequence of events: all part of the same basic one-sided splitting tool-dynamic of:

Separation,
Segmentation,
Accumulation,
Pyramidalization,
Preservation,
And perpetuation...

To this day; humans do not understand the true nature of their own intrinsic creativity. They do not understand that any group or individual is capable of creating its own culture: without mindlessly absorbing and copying the past.

Ask yourself: if you can take ordinary people from any walk of life and put them into an amateur theatrical production, and create an entire cast of fictional characters, and an entire make-believe world for them to live in: then why can't people live their own lives just as creatively, instead of putting all of that creative energy into a pale reflection of someone else's fictionalized story?

The problem of balance between the individual and the group is that neither can continue to change creatively if the product of that creativity is valued more than the ability itself. The dynamic balance between the individual and the group cannot be maintained if one or both stop being able to continuously, creatively, grow and change. The preservation of human culture became the straitjacket which stifled all further creative change. The worship of human culture destroyed the entire dynamic balance between the individual and the group. All culture is merely a frozen-dead product of human creativity. It follows the tool-dynamic of accumulation and preservation.

The roots of any culture are expressed through singing and dancing. Simply put: if you do not sing and dance: you are not root-cultured. If you do not sing and dance together with others of your own culture: you do not have a living culture: only the abstract remnants of a once-living culture.

A truly balanced culture is one that is purely creative. This is not an unattainable dream: it has simply never existed. Moreover: it has never even been attempted. This form of culture can only exist when both collective and individual creativity feed and support each other. When the community as a whole sings and dances differently and creatively every day... and each individual does also. With individual creativity feeding collective creativity and vice versa.

The only point and value of living is the joy and fun of being creative. Instead of valuing the product of the process, the process itself should be valued above all else. Only when people can live every second of their lives creatively: both individually, and as a group: will they be living in a truly dynamically balanced culture. And that can only happen if people live in a continual state of pure wonder.

Wonder and Worship

Worship is merely a more intense focus of awareness upon a single thing-person-idea.

Wonder is merely a more reflectively intense focus of awareness upon everything outside you... and everything inside you: simultaneously.

Wonder is much harder to reflectively develop. And most humans almost never practice it. The few that discover some of its amazing benefits do so by accident. It is not taught, or nurtured or developed as something that is desirable in civilized societies. Unless you develop both Inner and Outer wonder, and compare them: you will not be able to evaluate them to decide which is the best way to be aware.

They are both merely different kinds of intense awareness. They are both different kinds of intensity. Anything intense, anything extreme is difficult, hard... anything difficult, hard: needs to be worked at, practiced, nurtured and developed.

The point is; that humans need to develop their awareness.

But what kind of awareness?

Even the idea of developing your awareness, never mind what kind of awareness, or how, or why; is completely missing in civilized existence.

In primitive cultures, wonder was developed in humans by rituals and rites... by habits and repeated attitudes-feeling-thoughts that develop awareness into what we call: superstition-religious belief, cultural norms, etc. But that is a tool form of wonder. It is not human wonder. The human sense of pure wonder does not rely upon artificial tools, or artificial manipulations.

Fear and Wonder

To a large extent, the outer sense of Pure Wonder is consciously knowing that you don't know; it is a continual awareness of the unknown. That your understanding is finite, while the Universe is infinite. And then going beyond; looking at what you don't yet know yet, what you don't understand yet, what you don't feel or sense yet. I.e.

Rather than looking at what you already know or consider normal. That is the difference between an awareness that is expansive and questioning, one that exists in a continual state of wonder: and an awareness that is overly reflective and stays within its known finite bounds of knowledge, understanding and normality. I.e.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

This is the difference between an open awareness and a closed awareness... this is the difference between the perception of infinity and finitude. We developed a finite perception merely because our awareness became reflective enough to create a reflective self-awareness. A single evolving dynamic created a multitude of aspects we now consider distinctly human.

Because human awareness is so incredibly split up and segmentive: a scientist may consciously try to expand his knowledge and understanding about a particular experiment and yet never use this frame of reference or outlook on anything else in his life. To have a selective sense of wonder only about certain things makes no sense whatsoever. But since we are trained to be selectively segmentive in our thinking, our actions and our feelings: since we evolved to have this kind of awareness... which once developed can easily become dominant: we think nothing of the obvious contradiction between questioning some things and never questioning others.

Wonder itself is just a totality of awareness; a sense of universal, expanding questioning exploration. Once you have a sense of that totality, then you can consciously seek to expand it... all of it; rather than just a narrow, selective part of your awareness, or your world, or yourself. Learning, growth, change, understanding and insight: are merely different aspects of wonder that do not cover its entirety.

Outer wonder is an expansion of one's outer senses. That is: trying to listen harder, smell better, see more, feel more, be more sensitively aware of everything around you. This is just your 2 billion yr-old instinct functioning. Apes did not evolve as predators; they evolved as prey. The more acutely you are aware of your environment: the better your chances for survival. Inner wonder is just the same desire-need for a better awareness. Only it is directed inwardly, not outwardly. The more in tune you are with yourself: the more you are aware of yourself, the better choices, the more intelligent actions and decisions you will make.

But both aspects of Inner and Outer Wonder are an expansion, and both are based upon the dynamic balance of biofeedback: which results in the accumulation of learning, experience, growth, change. So: put together the expansion of awareness, the accumulation of experience, the integration of it all: and you get a dynamic, a process, a condition of existence, a result, a state of being. As long as this process is one of balanced biofeedback, the actual accumulation of experience keeps on changing, and as it does so: transforming itself into learning, insight and wisdom. But this process is one of compression. What is accumulated through experience does not grow in size: it actually shrinks in size and becomes simpler rather than more complex: which is in complete opposition to the increasing complexity of tool-knowledge. You can show the totality of human awareness in this way:

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Our awareness exists mostly only upon the outer surface of this totality: our conscious awareness uses only 1% of our brain's resources. And that surface awareness is mostly split up and fragmented into many separate pieces. What is curious, is that the makeup of human awareness matches the makeup of the planet we live on. There is the inner core, the thin, outer crust, and in-between is the most dynamic medium of liquid magma: that occasionally spews out onto the surface. That is exactly what the subconscious does. In a state of Pure Wonder, the reflective dynamic of biofeedback is balanced and extremely sensitive. I know, because this is how my brain works.

Each level of inner and outer awareness interacts with its neighbors. This produces a constant process of learning, change, integration and intuition: all being digested and compressed into wisdom. But if you introduce the sense of complete separateness, the ego, the imbalance of reflective fear: you get something completely different:

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Then you get thoughts bouncing inside the conscious mind without learning anything new. Then you get an overactive outer mind addicted to distraction. Instead of integration: you get imbalanced separation, stagnation, lack of change, boredom: you get a condition of normality, a slowly hardening outer shell of conscious awareness that becomes less and less open to new things. And because the inner observer resides in that outer shell of our dominant tool-brain, the rest of our awareness goes unused and unexplored. By taking its outer environment for granted, once our inner observer develops a sense of normality: it effectively blocks the outer sense of wonder and destroys it. By taking the inner self for granted and not exploring it: the sense of normality cuts off our conscious mind from our subconscious. We stop listening to our gut instincts, our intuition. With both inner and outer aspects, the basic dynamic of normality is reflective fear. The sense of separation, separateness, the sense of fear-pain and the sense of normality: all operate in the same way, and all of them give the same result.

This is the hidden dynamic of two different kinds of awareness at work. What is actually going on are two complementary processes. All reflective fear produces separation: so our conscious, subconscious and instinctive are no longer integrated with each other. All reflective fear produces normality, or a finite, absolute, limited awareness. All normality, all finite-absolute based values, all limited awareness: produces reflective fear. But because most of this occurs gradually on a subconscious level: it is rarely noticed as a developing process. Nobody has ever tried to trace or track the creation of fear in the human psyche.

How can every kind of normality be inextricably linked to some kind of reflective fear? Anything that is finite is fearful, anything that is limiting is fearful. It is a matter of stripping away levels of consciousness and awareness. By examining anything that is taken for granted, you run into a resistance against anything new or strange, or different, or alien. On many levels, this perception of separation is encased in its own set views: often there is a total block of arrogance, smugness, denial, avoidance and indifference. If there is not even an attempt to examine what people consider normal then there also supposedly is no fear. Yet if this examination is actually done, if normality is actually questioned: you will find some basic root reason for this resistance that has its own unique history inside each person. And the root of this resistance is pain-fear.

If you do go deeper into this exploration of why people consider something to be normal, you will stumble over the common elements in their reason to do so: separation, disconnection, numbness, non-awareness, fear-pain... or fear of pain... or reflective fear of anything that is considered to be unpleasant, painful or uncomfortable.

There is a fundamental difference between an open and closed awareness. What keeps any awareness closed is reflective fear-pain. If you only examine this superficially you can get any number of rationalizations. But this universal root never changes. Because it is the root of our awareness. It is how we are aware. To be reflectively separate from all things means to exist in a state of fear. Only that fear is repressed so deeply in our subconscious that we never deal with it. This dynamic of human awareness works exactly the same in all people.

All reflective fear-separateness produces normality.

All reflective fear-separateness destroys Wonder.

It is this process... this dynamic... how this occurs in the life of each infant, each child, each adolescent, and each adult: that has never ever been examined or focused on, or looked at, or questioned. Yet it is a universal human experience and process: despite the unique history and shape it takes in each individual.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

Even as a general state, a description of a certain kind of awareness, a state of being or a condition of existence: the term: a sense of Pure Wonder, is hopelessly inadequate. Because that state-condition-sense-awareness is uniquely different for each individual and is felt and experienced differently. But it is the best term that exists in the crude lexicon of language: so even though it is actually impossible to properly explain or describe, I use this term as a poor attempt to put into words what can never actually be explained. If you look at individual references to this word, you will see people use it as a more or less momentary or temporary experience. Human awareness usually focuses narrowly upon one thing at a time. Our tool-brain is constantly bouncing around with all kinds of thoughts feelings and emotions. So the sense of wonder is usually experienced only as a fleeting thing.

There is a difference between when you experience a Sense of Wonder and when you don't. This difference is the shift between normality and Wonder. If everything is experienced as wondrous, wonderful, or strange, eerie, lovely, sensational, fascinating, out of the ordinary, exceptional; then the only difference between the state of your senses during this is that you no longer exist in a state of normality, you merely exist in a state of continual heightened awareness. And you will never be able to tell the difference between the two until you have experienced them with someone else, and compared them to each other, and evaluated them to find out what makes one different from the other.

Obviously, there are no set bounds or definitions for what people do not consider normal. Only: the narrower this focus is, the less wonder there is. Once that sense of wonder is gone, people return to a sense of normality, ordinariness, dullness, boredom, non-interest. There are endless ways to describe this.

But because humans have been trained in tool-use, pyramidal focus, segmental awareness, distractive awareness, looking only narrowly at one thing at a time: the term 'Wonder' is used for something that pyramidally catches one's attention. Like walking into a cathedral and suddenly being in an entirely different environment full of abstract lines, symbols, shapes, spaces. Or witnessing a thunderstorm, a tidal wave, a sunset. This is the crudest, most commonplace kind of pyramidal wonder. Then there is the intensely narrow focus of peering into a drop of water or an atom, or at a single bird or a cloud or a blade of grass.

Then there is a more general Sense of Wonder that includes all your surroundings. This usually only happens when you are not used to your surroundings, when they are not normal. It is only then that you do not take them for granted.

The descriptive term of Pure Wonder means the attempt to have a sensitized awareness about everything all the time: not only at events that are extraordinary or stand out. Pure wonder is just a condition of sensitized awareness as opposed to a brutalized, desensitized awareness. And because it is a state of awareness, because it is something that can be consciously practiced and developed: it does not need to rely on extraordinary conditions or happenings. It does not need to be sparked by any particular thing. It is this kind of wonder that is most dynamically balanced because it has no specialized or split-off way of functioning. It is this kind of wonder that is the most connective of all.

Since human thought is instantaneous: and because the reflective biofeedback of our awareness is so complex: the sense of wonder has never been categorized as a duality of two different processes or as an integration of these two aspects. But this is precisely what happens, this is how wonder works: both as a balanced duality and as a balanced Triality. There is the outer wonder of your senses, and the inner wonder of your thoughts and feelings.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

To make this work properly, you need both processes of wonder going on and you need each one to be as dynamically balanced as possible and you need to balance these two aspects of wonder and integrate them into the totality of your awareness. If anything in this infinitely complex and subtle dynamic gets imbalanced or distorted, if anything stops dynamically balancing and re-balancing itself: you get a distorted, twisted, stunted, frozen version called normality or reality.

The imbalancing factor in all human awareness is reflective fear. Actually the word fear is not completely accurate. If you over-balance your inner awareness, if you become overly reflective about anything: it distorts your awareness of actuality. And what mostly distorts the balanced biofeedback of your inner awareness is when parts of it split off and are no longer integrated into the whole. We perceive this as fear. Within themselves: all humans perceive separation fearfully. All reflective fear is an imbalanced separation of the human psyche. Anything we cannot assimilate, digest, understand, dominate or control; we fear.

The actual dynamic of separation is fear. Fear is separation. Anything we are not separate from we cannot fear. How this all happens, why it happens, is the infinite mystery that lies within the subconscious of each person. But once some part of your psyche: your emotions, feelings, thoughts, experiences, actions, split off from the rest of you: once that happens, they become frozen, unchanging, and they begin to accumulate. And what's more: the creation of this separation also creates a sense of fear so you don't want to connect them, you don't want to find out the actual truth about yourself if it means digging deeper into your own psyche. So: the imbalancing dynamic of reflective fear is precisely the same dynamic as tool-use. All human awareness exists as a Totality, a Duality and a Triality: that is infinitely, creatively reflective. We need to appreciate the universality of this dynamic rather than focus on the apparent diversity of separations which our reflective brains create.

Now: we come to the basic imbalanced split of human awareness between wonder and fear. This is the result of an imbalance between Inner and Outer Awareness. Our overdeveloped Inner awareness itself became imbalanced. As a result: reflective fear became stronger than reflective wonder.

Every biologist knows that during the fetal development of all living organisms; each undergoes in compressed form, the entire history of its past. However for humans, the last stage of this growth happens slowly: and it happens outside the womb. I am referring to the maturation of the human brain. It represents the last genetic changes that our ancestors underwent before they evolved into us. The development of human awareness can be seen in each person as they grow up. Beginning as a half-developed fetus: half instinctual and half experiential. The infant growing in stages of exploration-wonder... becoming more self-aware. What we have never tried to trace is the development of reflective fear, or the development of reflective wonder. When does an infant-child stop exploring-stop asking questions? Why? When does it learn how to fear? When and how does it lose its sense of pure wonder? Why do all humans lose their sense of wonder? This infinitely subtle process is both genetic and experiential. How much of each is involved? It is an intangible process that has never been examined.

But we can see the results of this process. And we can describe and identify the elements of this process.

The dynamically balanced biofeedback of Pure Wonder has two processes. Inner and outer. The outer process of feedback is how you relate to the outer world: growth-change-learning-understanding: as an infant tests itself learning how to crawl and walk by falling: by making mistakes and learning from them.

Then there is the inner biofeedback of growth-learning-understanding: as it integrates and balances its experiences by comparing them, evaluating them, and putting them into perspective. Just as a child may ask its father for a glass of water just before going to sleep as a way to stay up longer; because it has learned that its request is invariably granted. Whereas: the first time it asked, there was no certainty that its request would be granted. And if it had been steadfastly refused: the child would have learned that this ploy didn't work, so it would stop trying to use it.

And then these two processes must be dynamically balanced and integrated. Just as a child who first determines whether it is safe to jump off something by using its previous experiences as a gauge, and then doing so. So, the expanding, changing, process of learning, growth, awareness, wonder is actually a Triality of three separate processes that must be balanced and integrated with each other. If a child is too outwardly fearful of falling, it will never try to learn how to walk or jump. If during its growth, it becomes too inwardly fearful, it will stop trying to learn new things. It can easily be shamed out of trying to learn also. The fear of being shamed can be just as powerful a force against learning, trying, falling, failing, as any other kind of fear.

Reflective Fear: that part of its neural abstractive life-energy which stays separate-frozen, as an accumulated memory-tape. No feedback, no change, isolation: complete separateness; the condition of the ego. This develops into a state of normality: lacking any perspective: as a condition of total separateness, it is also a condition of subconscious fear, if not one of actual conscious fear. Just as an overprotected child who is not allowed to go outside and play and climb trees and get dirty might develop a phobia about germs, or insects, or a fear of heights, or hate camping, or grow to dislike all sports, because they have not had the chance to develop any physical coordination. Simply by being separated from a natural environment while growing up, not being exposed to the outdoors can develop a later dislike of all outdoor activities. Every negative attitude, feeling, thought comes from separation: what you are separated from you cannot understand, appreciate, or like.

The Sense of Pure Wonder wants to explore and is constantly curious, while the sense of reflective fear does not want to explore, change, or grow. The point is, these two root-conditions of human existence are imbalanced and become more imbalanced as a process of human growth. This development is the increasing perception of normality. We are designed to function as learning animals. If we do not live in a continually learning environment, if we are not continually and exploring our inner selves and the outer world: we slowly sink into a closed, deadened existence of normality and boredom.

Normality

The emergence of normality matches the disappearance of Wonder. One grows as the other fades. Any prolonged exposure or involvement in a tool-created environment leads to an increasingly deadened awareness. This is the deadly unperceived condition of normality which all humans grow into. But this is mostly intangible since no one knows just how our awareness should develop or what it should develop into. Without any opportunity for comparison, evaluation, or perspective on different kinds and states of human existence: each individual condition of normality becomes a process of increasing deadness, increasing non-change. The consequences of this kind of awareness can be stated very simply: whatever you take for granted: you become a victim-of.

Chapter Three A: Summary of Hominid-Human Development

When a person takes something for granted, they tend to ignore it. This can be described as a state of unawareness. For the past four billion years, the consequence of this kind of awareness in all other species has been extinction. Through tool-use: the development of pyramidal focus has fostered this kind of awareness in humans until it became our dominant form of perception.

To put this into context: say you go to the beach and come back with a sunburn. This merely means that you took the Sun for granted and forgot to apply sun block. If you come back with tar stuck to the soles of your feet; this merely means that you took the sand for granted and you didn't notice the small oil deposits on the beach. If you come back with reddened eyes; this merely means that you didn't notice that the Santa Ana winds were pushing all the smog out to sea. If you come back with some sort of infectious disease, this merely means that you didn't notice that the water was polluted.

This is exactly what humans do: we take so many things around us for granted. We take the Sun, the Earth, the Air, and the Water around us for granted. Anything you do not question. Anything you do not wonder about. Anything you are not aware of. Anything you do not notice. Anything you do not see. Anything you do not feel. Anything inside you or outside; that you that you do not see, feel, notice, question, or wonder about... affects you without you being aware of it. And if you are not aware of what affects you; you will become an unwitting victim to these affects and effects. A passive, unaware victim. You will not understand why things happen to you. You will not understand yourself, you will not understand others, or the World around you. You will not understand why you get sick or become healthy, why you are fulfilled or frustrated, why you are stressed or at ease, you will not understand why you are happy or unhappy. Just ask any dead person who was hit by a car they did not see coming and they will tell you; what you are not aware of can kill you Once you're dead, it's too late to learn from your mistakes.

As people get older, they take more and more things for granted. The general instinctive awareness I call the Sense of Pure Wonder is used less and less and basically atrophies into almost complete disuse. As a process of growing up, this is what happens to every human child that is born. By developing and training humans almost exclusively in tool-use, the result is an overdeveloped pyramidal focus and an underdeveloped form of general awareness. This can be seen in the slow death and suppression of any sense of wonder or curiosity. The natural desire for children to explore and ask questions is slowly squelched until sooner or later; they become afraid of asking questions, until they no longer even think of asking questions. Each human child goes through this in their formative years completely unconscious of the process they are undergoing..

Reality

As to the question of what humans call reality: what is real? What is imagined? What is the difference? Anything you can imagine can become real to you if you work at it long enough and put enough time and energy into it. If anything is repeated long enough people will end up believing it. Anything people are exposed to long enough, anything that they become accustomed to: anything they accept as normal also becomes real. There is no difference between normality and reality. Both are merely manipulated forms of awareness which have become frozen. The only difference between something that is real or imagined is that imagination is mostly a conscious manipulation that is still fluid: whereas reality is a result of altered awareness, attitude and environment over a long period of time, and it is largely not a conscious process. The concretion of reality into normality and vice versa spans the gap between the abstract and the actual. But whether you use your imagination to turn something into a concrete reality or not: And vice versa, It's process and origin is the same: the creative use of your tool-brain:

abstraction.

The human tool-brain creates its own reality and identifies with it simply because it can connect-to its own inner-universe far easier than the outer universe which it is reflectively separated from. To the human tool-brain: its own self-created reality is far more real than actuality itself. The more engulfed in one's Inner Universe, the more one exists in a state of normality, the less curiosity one possesses about the outer world, the less desire to grow and change, the more numbed and desensitized ones sensibilities become, the greater ones state of boredom, the greater ones need for distraction, entertainment, artificial excitement, vicarious thrills. These are all results of the advancing stages of normality. The advanced condition of this form of human deadness after a period of time is called senility: the numbed, non-aware deadness of all levels of awareness.

Conclusion

The development of human culture can be explained as a basic split between Inner and Outer Awareness: or the reflective feedback between normality and reality. This is just another way of describing the dynamic of biofeedback between the tool and the human tool-brain. The imbalanced frozen inner awareness developed a frozen-inner norm or reality which was preserved and perpetuated. Then: that reality is made concrete through tool-use and language: translating this inner reality into an outer normality.

If it was a way of making clothes, or utensils, or tools, decorations, it was preserved, repeated, duplicated, perpetuated, as a cultural tradition-custom. This tool-made environment each new generation copied, absorbed and learned how to duplicate. Each person born into any culture, copies-learns from what is around them. This is the process of concretion: inner reality translated into outer concrete normality.

The outer dynamic I call Normality. To an Eskimo raised and exposed to its cultural tales of spirits; those spirits become Normal. The carvings they make to signify these ideas are Normal. The huts they live in, their clothing, kayaks, tools, are all Normal. All are products of the feedback between tool-use and the tool-brain.

The inner dynamic I call Reality. Cultural values, ideas, all accumulated experience-knowledge becomes taken for granted: it becomes Real, unquestioned: so their awareness is trained-frozen into a perception of cultural reality.

Each dynamic reflects and reinforces the other. The myth-tale of a spirit is told: the person imagines it, carves the amulet or icon, the child is raised with the icon that they can see-touch, which goes to create their own impression-experience of outer normality, which they then transform into their own version of inner reality. The concretion of an inner reality becoming an outer normality and that concretion reflecting back to become part-of an inner reality is a hopelessly blurred distinction between these two processes of biofeedback; tool-use and tool-brain use... between an imaginary idea and it's concretion, between a concrete normality creating an inner reality, between an inner reality creating an outer normality.

Here is the obvious, telltale proof: the two words: Reality and Normality... are interchangeable. You can switch these two words around and they still mean the same thing. The reason for that is because they are merely reflections of each other.

Now: begin with elder-worship, develop it into ancestor-worship, add in burial of the dead, tool-brain creativity, a need to find an explanation or meaning for their existence, the reflectivity of their awareness projecting out onto the outer universe, perceiving spirits in everything around them, factor in the reflective feed-back of reality and normality: and you get human culture.

Why do all cultures become petrified into routines, which solidify into customs and traditions? Here is one example of why.

Once, I went into Carvel to buy an ice cream cone. I said to the clerk: 'Give me a soft ice cream'

The clerk behind the counter asked me: 'What flavor do you want?'

I asked him: 'What flavors do you have?'

He answered: 'We've got Vanilla and Chocolate.'

I thought for a second and said: 'Gimme a Chocolate.'

To which he replied: 'We're all out of Chocolate.'

I looked at him keenly; he did not blink or even seem embarrassed by what he had just said.

So I asked him: 'Then why did you ask me in the first place?'

He shrugged his shoulders and replied: 'That's the way we usually do it.'

It is this kind of unthinking awareness which is responsible for much of the unthinking unchanging perpetuation of all human culture.

As in all tool-use, the preservation of human culture relies on its ability to duplicate itself as closely as possible. But the curse of all tool and tool-brain (duplication) is the absence of change which comes from mindless repetition.. Once a particular custom-idea becomes sufficiently ingrained, it may not change for thousands of years regardless of its context or lack of usefulness. This mindless, non-adaptive, non-evolving form of preservation is a universal trait in all cultures.

It is a question of what humans identify with: what is abstract, or what is actual. It is the concretion of the abstract into the actual that makes human reality problematic. It is valuing the abstract over the actual that freezes cultures into non-changing, preserved patterns. It is a valuing of the past over the present and the future; and that is not intelligent.

All human reality is questionable. There is no guarantee of its truth... simply because human awareness is reflective; and those reflective perceptions-thoughts-abstractions can be and are manipulated consciously, subconsciously, and instinctually in so many ways that it is almost impossible to know how much of your impression comes from the inner you, or from the outer experience. That is why the sense of Pure Wonder is necessary to avoid self-deception. If a person is not constantly questioning what they perceive inside themselves and outside themselves: then normality-reality becomes a dominant unthinking, unfeeling reflex: then Abstraction eventually distorts Actuality.

As a general summary, it can be said that the evolving one-sided dynamic of tool-use by hominids resulted in modern humans evolving into a condition of imbalanced Splitness. This imbalance is a condition of our existence. It is how we evolved, why we evolved, it is what we evolved into. It is who we are, how we are, why we are. It explains our “uniqueness”. It explains our entire history. It explains why we do what we do. In order for anybody to be able to fully understand themselves they must come to grips with this unavoidable basic truth. Without the perspective of reflective Wonder, all human attempts at self-understanding are blind; all attempts at human change-growth-healing are blind.

Reflectivity is the dynamic which sets us apart. The energy of our brain has a higher degree of reflectivity than other animals.. That is one major factor which makes us unique. But what does that mean? Plato said it very well in a parable: he described the human race as a bunch of cave dwellers fascinated by the shadows on the cave wall created by the Sun streaming into the cave. In other words: humans ignore the actual sun, and the actual world outside this cave called civilization. We are more fascinated by the reflections of the shadows of the Sun. Only... we re-reflect our own reflections. Until they become pale shadows. We are more fascinated by the reflections of the world than the actual world itself.

2 ½ thousand years ago Plato wrote the puzzling observation about people staring at shadows on the walls of their cave rather than going out into the world and seeing the true light illuminating all of the Natural world. There were no movies in his time. Today millions of people flock to look at reflections on a screen called Movies. Was Plato seeing into the future? Did he know that movie-screens called TV's would be sitting in a billion rooms about the size of a cave? Has anything changed since Plato wrote his observation 2 ½ thousand years ago? Are humans doing anything more intelligently than during Plato's time?

This book is written with the express purpose of understanding ourselves more intelligently. If we can actually understand who we are, we will be able to change rather than continuing to spend another two thousand years staring at shadows on a wall. As a general summary: it can be said that the evolving one-sided dynamic of tool-use by hominids resulted in modern humans evolving into a Condition of Imbalanced Splitness, a Condition of imbalanced, selective, pyramidal awareness. These are only a few of the causal explanations of why our genes are different from Chimpanzees by 1% or 2 %. By attempting to trace and understand only one minuscule aspect of our own evolution, it is possible to stand back and appreciate how fantastically creative this entire process of balanced splitting which created us actually was. How many creatively different ways of splitting were involved in our own evolution.

The same dynamic which created the Universe, created us. Only through the sense of Pure Wonder can we even begin to appreciate the infinite creativity and limitless diversity... which is nothing more than a process of Dynamic Splitness. Except in our case, this Dynamic became progressively more and more imbalanced.

This imbalance is now a Condition of our existence and of our awareness. It is how we evolved. It is why we evolved. It is what we evolved into. It is who we are. It is how we are. It is why we are. It explains our uniqueness. It explains our entire history. It explains why we do what we do. In order for anybody to be able to fully understand ourselves we must come to grips with this unavoidable, basic truth of our imbalance

Human Psychobiologic Totality

Note: The term; Psychobiologic is simply meant to describe the human condition as an integrated emotional-mental-physical Totality.

The Slow Death of Human Sensitivity-Awareness

When humans first emerged; there were no schools, cars, or cities. No books, libraries, media, and no jobs: the concepts of work and school did not exist. Yet, for at least 90,000 years, humans survived, flourished, and spread out over the planet. How? What kind of lifestyle did the first humans have? What kinds of abilities, traits were developed? To what extent? In what way? How much of this was due to their learning ability and how much was due to their genes? How did this pattern-balance change as their environment-conditions changed? We evolved out of a natural world with all of the myriad checks and balances of that natural world. So: what was the original human condition existing inside this dynamic balance? This question is unanswerable because there is no record or trace of how we lived 90,000 years ago. But one thing is obvious: the better humans could use tools, the less sensitive their awareness needed to be, the less sensitively they had to react to, and adapt to their environment. Whatever that kind of life it was, it was before the existence of civilization, and before the development of any sophisticated culture. So: to restate the question... how did humans live before they had a sophisticated culture and civilization?

That is the crucial question: because without the two elements of culture and civilization, you have an entirely different condition of human existence. A condition that is mostly governed by the balanced dynamic of the Laws of Nature. In this environment, in this condition: how did humans raise their young? What kind of social order existed? Whatever existed was designed to function by Nature, not by man. That design succeeded and worked for hundreds of thousands of years. But we do not know how it worked, why it worked, or even how well it worked. Only that it was designed by Nature to work successfully for at least over 90,000 years.

What happens at each stage of the organic-genetic growth of human awareness is invisible-intangible. We cannot see if the human Inner Self has been stunted, or twisted, or starved, or damaged, or numbed, or split-up. The human Inner Self begins inside the womb; and as a causal process, the two conflicting forces that determine its path are one-sided separation and integrated connectivity; or, fear-pain and wonder. However it happens: that awareness has no way of knowing how it should have grown up whatever the outcome. Whatever level-kind of awareness a person develops, they exist inside it: and each person is incapable of gaining any perspective on how-when-why it happened. Each person's upbringing is normal to them... unless later, they can compare it to other kinds of upbringing. What has never been studied, or tracked, or noticed, or spoken of, is the slow death of that original sensitized awareness.

There is a genetic blueprint-design and also an experiential design-blueprint, which must be followed in order for humans to be born, raised and live properly-successfully. In order for humans to develop properly, they must be exposed to the proper kinds of experiences and in the proper order. Otherwise, the entire sequenced development of maturation and growth is aborted, or frozen, or stunted, or damaged. The human animal was designed to learn certain things at certain times. It was also designed to live in a certain kind of environment. Today, we do not have the ability to compare or evaluate the difference between that original working model and our present one. But whatever the original model was: it was not designed by us. Today, we exist in a model called civilization that was designed by us and not by Nature. What is the difference? We cannot even begin to explore such a question unless we have both models and compare them to each other.

Originally, we were designed to follow one universal adaptive pathway that insures the survival of all living things: the path of the increasingly sensitized dynamic balance. Beginning with hominids, that pathway was subverted and split-off by tool-use. Instead of our general over-all awareness being improved: only the selective kind of awareness needed to use tools was improved. But underneath this 4 million yr-old offshoot of selective awareness is the still living-functioning four billion year-old root of general awareness. Regardless of our newly acquired tool-brain, we must still follow the original root design of increasingly sensitized awareness in order to live properly. The genetic wisdom accumulated over 4 billion years of experience that has been collated and integrated and simplified into our genetic code by far outweighs the paltry tool-wisdom our species has managed to accumulate over 100,000 years of its newfound existence.

If you do not listen to and learn from the life-wisdom of your living cells, your body, your instincts, your intuition; and instead, listen to something called civilized culture, or language, or civilization: you will never develop a Sense of Wonder, you will never develop a balanced perspective on anything, you will never truly understand anything, you will merely end up blinding yourself to all truth, you will end up blinding yourself to yourself.

The Human Inner Self

The Human Inner Self is made up of layers. These layers are developed and formed and accumulate through the passage of Time.

They are also connected... through the passage of Time.

They are also experienced: through the passage of Time

They either grow naturally, or they accumulate unnaturally: through the passage of Time...

They either grow, or die: through Time. How they grow and how they die: depends on many factors. If they grow in an unnatural way, if the outer context of their growth is an unnatural artificial environment like civilization: they are starved, or are choked off, or twisted, or poisoned, or suppressed, or repressed, or corrupted. If they grow in a natural way, if the Outer Context of their growth is the natural living environment of the living Earth: they flourish, and evolve, and integrate themselves into an interconnected Totality... through the passage of Time.

The Human Inner Self is made up of an accumulated series of experiences which accumulate over a period of Time... through Time. In order for a Human Inner Self to grow naturally into an interconnected Totality: It has to connect its experiences... through Time and digest them, and collate them, and integrate them to each other and connect them to each other, until they become a concentrated, simplified, essence of life experience called wisdom.

In order for a Human Inner Self to become an interconnected Totality: it has to connect and integrate itself to its Outer Self. The Human Outer self is the Outer Universe which it lives in. The Human Inner Self is the Inner Universe it lives in. Your Inner Self and your Outer Self are made up of two Universes which need to be connected and integrated to each other. Both of these Universes are Infinite. Both need to be connected into an integrated Totality. This is done by using your Experience to integrate yourself. By integrating the Experiences of your Inner Self: you can develop an Integrated Inner Self. By integrating the Experiences of your Outer Self: you can develop an Integrated Outer Self...

In order to integrate your Inner Self: you have to integrate your Outer Self.

In order to integrate your Outer Self: you have to integrate your Inner Self.

In order to do this: you have to use your Observer Awareness to compare your Inner Self to your Outer Self, and your Outer Self to your Inner Self.

In order to do this: your awareness has to exist in a State of Pure Wonder. The state of Pure Wonder is the natural state of human awareness that naturally compares and integrates your Inner and your Outer wisdom into an integrated Totality.

The Imbalanced Splitting of Human Awareness

The development of human awareness is an integrated process of Inner and Outer awareness. Moreover, it is not a simple duality. It is a Triality. Because apart from an inner and outer awareness, there is the separated, split-off, observer awareness: 1-3-2, which is supposed to handle the entire dynamic and somehow balance it and make sense of it all. Then there are the levels of Inner Awareness: conscious-subconscious-instinctive. (Again, this dynamic is a Triality.) Our Inner Awareness is connected to our Outer Awareness mostly through our conscious mind. So... structurally you have:

Not:

This is what human awareness evolved into. This is the evolved, imbalanced shift of human awareness which was the result of Man's separation from Nature. It looks like a tiny imbalance. A tiny shift of focus. But the effect of this shift is huge.

Inner and Outer awareness function as a Center Awareness, and a Perimeter Awareness. Your Inner Awareness is your Center Awareness. Your Outer Awareness is your Perimeter Awareness. They are designed to function dynamically in a state of Pure Wonder. They work generally like this:

Outer Awareness

Inner Awareness

They also work like this:

To integrate your Inner Awareness to your Outer Awareness: both of the dynamics of your Observer Awareness need to work freely between act other without one hampering the other. Your Inner and Outer Awareness are designed to work with each other in an integrated fashion: like this: 3-dimensionally not 2-dimensionally. Pages in a book are 2-dimensional: human energy is 3-dimensional

And like this:

To experience an experience fully: you must experience it all the way IN... and all the way OUT. All Outer experiences are designed to go all the way IN. All Inner experiences are designed to go all the way OUT.

If your Inner and Outer Awareness exists in a State of Dynamic Pure Wonder: if your Inner and Outer Awareness absorbs and reflects energy naturally as it is designed to do: then you RADIATE HAPPINESS naturally, simply because you are alive in a living world and all kinds of living energies are coming into you, and going out of you all the time... There are so many energies are coming all the way in, and going all the way out, in all directions... on all levels... in all ways... that they cannot be counted, or digested, or understood right away.

Babies show this natural radiating energy. Everything that they absorb: they absorb ALL THE WAY IN. Everything they radiate: they radiate ALL THE WAY OUT. This is why when a baby absorbs the energy of a person near it who is crying: it begins to cry also. When a baby next to it, starts crying: it begins to cry also. People call this natural healthy human quality: 'empathy'. The ability to feel what another person feels, the ability to think what another person thinks called empathy is what all babies have naturally. This is how the natural radiating-absorbing dynamically balanced Dynamic of your Human Inner and Outer Awareness should work.

What is interesting about this dynamic of integration is that the more synchronized your Inner and Outer Awareness becomes: the more your awareness of even having a Perimeter Awareness, and a Center Awareness fades away. This dynamic explains what people experience when they try to describe the state of awareness where they become 'one' with the Universe. This dynamic explains what people experience when their Inner and Outer Awareness is perfectly aligned and integrated and balanced, when they feel at one with Nature, or at one with their inner being, or at peace with themselves, etc.

In other words, the way a baby's Inner and Outer Awareness works, is exactly the same way the Inner and Outer Awareness of the wisest, happiest humans who ever experienced a brief flash of insight or happiness works. Or rather, vice versa.... Babies are wiser than the wisest adults. They know when something is wrong and they know when something is right better than the wisest adult.

But when civilization forces humans to develop the thick perimeter Outer Awareness called an 'ego' as a protective shell: this destroys the entire Natural dynamic of your Inner and Outer Awareness. The development of an ego results in unhappiness, loneliness, mental isolation, emotional isolation, social isolation, and the destruction of the natural way your inner and Outer Awareness are supposed to function. The Ego destroys your Sense of Pure Wonder. Having an ego: destroys your ability to absorb your Outer Experiences all the way IN. It destroys your ability to radiate your Inner Experiences all the way OUT; it prevents you from expressing yourself: the result of having a protective eggshell of an ego is this:

The protective shell of the ego which you do not need, makes you incapable of absorbing anything new, and makes you incapable of learning anything new. It is the oldest form of organic protection against harm there is.

What this does to you is that as long as you have an ego, you end up learning nothing new during your entire adult life... except what you have copied from others, and copying from others is not learning. Having an ego makes you incapable of absorbing new experiences. Having an ego: makes you incapable of expressing yourself and telling others what you have learned.

The problem with civilization: is that civilized human who have an ego envy people who are naturally happy. Civilized humans who have an ego hate people who are naturally creative and have fun and laugh and smile. Civilized people who have egos hate people who do not lie and do not deflect all their Inner truths and Outer Truths. Civilized people who have an ego fear and hate and are envious of people who are more honest than they are, more happy than they are, more creative than they are, more full of Pure Wonder than they are, more radiating a sense of natural well-being than they do. Civilized people attack and poison all babies and children and adults who do not have a thick defensive protective ego.

Civilization attacks humans who do not have an ego. Civilization poisons humans who do not have an ego. Civilization traumatizes and attacks and cripples healthy humans who do not have a protective shell called an ego.

In other words: civilization forces humans to develop a protective shell of non-awareness called an ego. Civilization turns people who do not have an ego into sick egotistical unfeeling unthinking evil monsters who in turn... attack and poison other people who do not have an ego. This is the vicious insane cycle that artificial civilized human awareness has created for 12,000 years. It is still going on. And nobody seems to notice it. People pretend not to notice this dynamic. Well... I have noticed this: and I do not like it.

Generally, the evolution and development of civilized human awareness can be seen as a progressive splitting-separating on many levels, in many ways.

No. 1: First there is the process of human brain development as it is trained to becoming able to discern things separately.

No. 2: Then there is the experiential process of being trained into specialized functions-abilities-zones.

No. 3: Then there is the splitting-up of the human psyche into various components, aspects, qualities, identities, personalities, and personas.

Again: there are Trialities within Trialities: raising the Dynamics of Imbalanced Splitness exponentially. As I said before: this is far too complex to even attempt to tackle. Since all human neural signals are instantaneous, it all happens simultaneously. What I want to focus on are the respective balances involved.

Generally speaking: the increase of imbalanced splitting, matches the decrease of connective integration. The lack of connective sensitivity matches the increase of disconnective numbness or non-awareness. The increase of this one-sided splitting or separation mirrors the increase of Reflective fear and a decrease of Reflective Wonder. Basically: this is how the slow death of human sensitivity and awareness happens.

The only way to track this evolving shift is by noting the three basic symptoms or aspects of Pure Wonder: Love, Courage, and Honesty. And the three basic symptoms or aspects of reflective fear: Hate, Cowardice, and Dishonesty. The dynamics of how these two Trialities play themselves out in our lives; determines how our awareness develops depending on how our awareness is balanced or imbalanced.

But the dysfunction of a non-functioning awareness when it is simply not dynamically balanced enough, not sensitive enough, is invisible. It has no positive or negative symptoms to examine or notice: it just isn't there; it is merely an absence. How can you measure any kind of non-awareness? What level of sensitized awareness were we genetically designed to have that we no longer possess? And how much does our awareness need to be developed in order for our awareness to be fully developed? And in which ways and on what levels? How fully should our awareness be developed? Are there any limits to this? Is there any optimum level? The only way to determine anything about our awareness is by comparison; by changing it and then comparing the difference of before and after.

But merely one change, one comparison will not give you much to go on. If our genetic attributes of awareness is more or less a constant; the only way you can get a good comparison is by changing one's surroundings, and all the causal factors involved in being born, growing up, and living. The only way we have ever done this, is inside the context of civilization. There has never been a comparative study done outside of this basic, common context.

Balancing Human Awareness

The endless debate about the two aspects of Nature and Nurture... about the genetic and experiential factors involved in human growth and learning is silly. They are hopelessly intermixed in such an infinitely complex dynamic that all we can do about it is try to find the right balance. If we can do that then it doesn't matter which part of what is due to what factor: and we need not waste our time and energy trying to separate, segment and label them. The only way to compare human awareness to itself is by constantly changing it; the most important function of our awareness is how well it is dynamically balanced. Constant learning-change-growth gives you a better dynamic balance. Constant comparison, evaluation, perspective, re-comparison, re-evaluation, gives you a constantly changing perspective-understanding-awareness of things... or in other words: pure wonder. The best way to dynamically balance our awareness is by living in a state of pure wonder. But in order to do that successfully, you need to constantly change your context, your surroundings: otherwise, you will have nothing to compare it to. But unless you go outside-beyond the context of civilization, you will never find out what your awareness is fully capable of, or how it was actually designed to function optimally unless you find the optimal environment in which it was designed to function. That is the problem of dynamically balancing human awareness: we only have one basic model inside which it functions: civilization; we have no other models to use for comparison.

Because of having no comparative basis, this root question of human existence and awareness which has never before been raised or asked is a complete 'Tabula Rasa'... a blank slate: with no information, no facts, no context, no parameters, no guidelines; no hint of how this might be explored or examined. It is virgin territory: open to any who wish to venture forth and explore it. It is the widest, most unlimited, untrammelled field of human endeavor. It is the ultimate human search for our roots, it is the ultimate search for human truth, it is the ultimate search for true happiness, peace, and fulfillment. However, there is one starting point: and that is the Inner Universe, the Inner Self. How that was supposed to balance with the Outer Universe can never be answered unless you have the right balanced conditions for our outer environment. Moreover, since that original balanced outer condition is missing, the exploration of the Inner Self is all we have to work with.

The Need for Inner Balance and Self-Understanding

The job: and I do mean job, of every living human, is to become transparently clear to themselves. In order to become clear to ourselves, we must become connected to both our instinctive and our conscious selves. The subconscious is the intrinsic balance point of our true self, our totality. Depending on its ability to send-receive-react-act as the balance point between this duality determines our basic personality, our nature, the level of our health, how we live, why we do what we do. When that subconscious becomes snarled, imbalanced, distorted, deadened: the entire dynamic of our inner being is upset. Our inner awareness is infinitely reflective in all three respects. At night when we dream, the subconscious attempts to perform the same balancing-healing processes as the rest of our body, by trying to reconcile the two inner dynamics of instinct and consciousness. What is your instinctive self trying to tell you? What is your conscious self trying to tell you? The middle brain receives these impulses and tries to interpret them in infinitely creative, reflective ways.

So: the job of each person is to sensitize themselves to their own subconscious, to explore their own subconscious, as the balance point between their inner duality of instinct and consciousness.

This means that your instinctive self and your conscious self need to get on the same page, the same program. They need to reflect each other more closely. The closer these two aspects mirror each other, the easier and clearer your subconscious interpretations will become. The more closely your instinctive and conscious selves balance each other, the more dynamic, the more sensitive, the more active your subconscious becomes. The better you can dynamically balance your awareness, the better you can understand yourself... and vice versa. All human understanding is based upon dynamic balance.

All human brain transmission is virtually instantaneous. But the dynamic nub, the crux, the balance point of your intrinsic creativity is your subconscious.

What is never looked at is the role of the subconscious: how it works and what it does. Yet, it literally controls our conscious awareness at the root level. Because whatever we may think is purely a conscious decision or motivation, or urge, or thought, or feeling or action ...actually originates from our subconscious.

Only; these subconscious messages seep into our consciousness without us being aware of it. And then we merely adapt them, rationalize them, and manipulate them to give ourselves a conscious reason for our actions.

To put it bluntly: our subconscious controls our conscious awareness.

Humans are driven by and controlled by their subconscious on many levels and in many ways. And they are simply not aware that this is the case. They mistakenly believe that most if not all of their actions, feelings, and thoughts, are generated purely from their conscious awareness and nowhere else. That they are the masters of their own brains, their own awareness.

This not so.

What drives human motivation is the human subconscious mind. Even down to the most basic fight-or-flight chemical reaction of their hormone balance. Why? Because even this instinctive response is determined by how our subconscious interprets the information it receives.

During the U.S. attack on the Taliban Government, Afghan children did not even flinch when bombs or bullets exploded nearby. Why? Because their parents had been bombed, they had been bombed since they were born: they were used to it: it was normal for them: their subconscious did not interpret the bombs as a dangerous threat to their safety. Whatever you take for granted: you become a victim of.

Each person's normality is what they do not consciously examine and take for granted. Whatever you take for granted becomes your subconscious program that determines how you look at yourself and the world; it determines your entire context of perception, it determines why you react and how you react. If you want to understand why you do what you do: you will only find the explanations and answers within your own subconscious, and why it interprets and who it interprets reality... and how it selectively ignores and discounts certain things.

The question of human awareness comes down to control of perception. Who or what is in control of why and how we perceive ourselves and others? Our split-off observer; or our subconscious?... Our conscious awareness; or our instinctive awareness? What controls our actions, thoughts, and feelings? Are we in control, or are we merely puppets to our subconscious urges, fears, and drives? How much are we driven by instinct and how much by learned experience? In fact, we are driven by both. But what is not noticed or given any credence is that these two factors are inextricably merged into an even more basic control center of our awareness: the middle-brain... and it is this area of awareness which is pivotal in determining why we do what we do. Our subconscious is the balance-point of our awareness. Our subconscious is the deciding and controlling factor in every root-motivation, impulse, and urge.

It is the task of our split-off Observer to monitor, balance, and integrate all factors of our awareness. This is all a matter of Dynamic Balance and integration. If this is done properly: then the totality of awareness operates as a balanced cooperative unit without conflict. However, if any aspect is allowed to become imbalanced or is not monitored, then we no longer have a balanced control over ourselves.

The basic overriding truth is; that whatever we are not aware of within ourselves; is precisely that which controls us. Whatever we do not bother to explore and understand within ourselves, whatever is not monitored or checked: has free rein and acts as an uncontrolled factor which controls our perception. If our subconscious is left to its own devices: whatever its makeup, it becomes the blueprint by which our conscious awareness operates. If your conscious awareness has no clue as to the basis on which it operates: then it becomes effectively blind. It becomes a thinly veiled puppet of the subconscious.

How many creative people wake up in the middle of the night to jot down some insight or idea? The subconscious is used countless ways: when we are intuitive, or in a groove, our hunches, our gut instincts... as the unseen, unfelt arbiter of our decisions. The more active-dynamic the Triality of our inner awareness becomes, the more spontaneous we become, the more connected we become to our subconscious. The more integrated-balanced this Triality becomes, the more integrated our spontaneity becomes, the more widely creative we become in how we live. But to attempt to plunge into the murky maze of our subconscious is not an easy task. To correctly identify what your instinct, your subconscious, and your conscious self is telling you, is an infinitely reflective puzzle. If you try to listen to yourself: is the message a merged message, or merely one aspect, one segment? To even begin in this endeavor: how do you look at yourself? As a bunch of unconnected aspects-ideas-beliefs-opinions-tastes-likings-dislikes? Or as a totality? If you look at yourself as a totality: this means you must look at all the Inner and Outer experiences you have had during your life: beginning from birth and integrate them into a single understanding of Life..

How can you do that if you have not totally experienced and digested all of these experiences? If you cannot remember them, if you disregard some, refuse to look at others, put them into secret places, and cover them up? Your totality is also a Duality and a Triality. What part of you is due to which? Why is it so? What are the reasons for it? How did it happen?

If you segment your own introspection, you will be forever left in the dark about yourself.

However: if you look at yourself in as a wide a context as possible, and try to make as many connections as possible, instead of making separations-differentiations: you will begin to unravel the mystery of this totality-duality-Triality. Your life is a causal chain. It is a linear totality. So, to unravel it: whatever linear sequences are revealed, the more connectively you can string all of it together, the better you can understand your life as a causal process and a connected totality. And, the farther back you can trace this causal chain to its roots, the clearer your self-understanding will become. This in essence is your inner job: your work-in-progress... how you manage and make sense of your Inner Life. Then there is your outer job: how you manage and make sense of your Outer Life. Each one reflects the other. All conflict, comparison, evaluation, connection, perspective should be balanced as dynamically as possible between these two aspects of your life. To abstain from introspection: to not question yourself, your own motives, your own actions is to abstain from developing your full potential, from living fully. To not explore your inner-self is to not develop your Inner sense of Pure Wonder. Just as not exploring your outer world is not developing your Outer sense of Pure Wonder.

These are your two jobs. You have no other job except to live as fully as possible. And that means being dynamically balanced as possible. But to do that properly you need to know what you should do and how to do it and why you are doing it. For that: you need to identify your human tools and use them and develop them.

The three human tools you have; are the three basic aspects of your humanity. Which do not originate from tool-use and are not tool-oriented.

The basic aspect of your humanity is: a Sense of Fun, .and a Sense of Pure Wonder How you have fun is up to you. How much you wonder about everything is up to you.
You can have fun honestly or as dishonestly as you choose.
You can have fun as courageously or as fearfully as you choose.
You can have a Sense of Pure Wonder as lovingly or as hatefully as you choose.
You can have a Sense of Pure Wonder honestly or as dishonestly as you choose.

Depending on how you have fun, what you wonder about: will determine your level of understanding, and happiness. Just as the development of dishonesty, cowardice, and hate will determine your degree of unhappiness, conflict, and misery. The degree of your humanity will be determined by how much energy, time, and focus you spend on developing a Sense of Fun, .and a Sense of Pure Wonder

Some might say this kind of living is too creatively intense. Creativity comes from intensity. The question is: how intensely do you wish to experience fun, joy, happiness, love, bliss? How bored-deadened do you wish to be? How miserable, conflicted, or unhappy do you want to be? How creative do you want to be? You were designed to function in a certain way. To optimize your inner and outer functioning you must balance yourself as best you can. The subconscious is the dynamic balance point of our awareness. It is the root of our existence. Our job is to untangle the snarled mess of these roots. Our job is to untangle our subconscious. In order to even have a desire to explore this, you need a Sense of Wonder.

The Sense of Pure Wonder, when it is properly balanced between Inner and Outer wonder contains the Triality of Courage-Honesty-Love as necessary Conditions for its existence. The Balanced Triality of Love-Courage-Honesty is also necessary for any process of expanding awareness to even happen. This Triality is also a totality of awareness: it is the Condition of your Humanity, your Personality, your Psyche, your Spirit.

If you wish to look at the subconscious of others, all you have to do is look at other people and see what they don't talk about, what they don't focus on. If you wish to look at your own subconscious: just try to find out what you are not asking yourself, what you are not dealing with. What are the questions that go unasked? What are the subjects that we carefully avoid?

Who amongst you is willing to delve into themselves? How deeply? On what level?

The curse of normality is its refusal to delve into uncharted waters. But the only effective approach to self-understanding is the conscious attempt to connect everything to everything else. Only the continual search for connections, only through the unremitting attitude of questioning-curiosity-exploration, can we open up the human subconscious to the conscious mind. And that is just the opening movement. To fully realize-digest that unknown: we must re-experience our unexperienced experiences. Only then can you get any closure from the process. Only then can there be any true healing. Each human animal has the job of asking every unasked question of their life: of themselves and of everybody they ever knew. In the process of doing this, each person will finally unearth their own subconscious and get to know it... until there is no subconscious left... until the dynamic of our human awareness is balanced in a state of Pure Wonder between it's instinctive and conscious self.

If this is not done: the result-effect of the undigested human subconscious is an endless need to creatively re-reflect, (project outward) or re-live (project inward), unexperienced experiences. Once a person digests an experience: learns from it, connects it in context to all their other experiences: then they have no need or urge to repeat that experience, much less re-live it endlessly. The only experiences-needs-urges-feelings-thoughts that are reflectively repeated are those, which have not been properly processed and integrated. If the genetically designed need to be loved is not satisfied, that need will be reflectively frozen as an unchanging, unmet, undeveloped, neurotic, dysfunctional need. And, like all other unexplored-unexperienced aspects of our subconscious: we are driven by them, continually trying to satisfy these urges: we have no conscious control over it.

Since humans are driven and controlled by unmet, undigested, undeveloped, unexperienced experiences-needs... then how much are we actually in conscious control of our lives and ourselves? What can you never get enough of? Whatever it is: there is a deep subconscious-unconscious motive driving you to get it. All you have to do is trace the symptoms of your own needs to their deepest inner subconscious roots, and you will eventually find that any unhealthy need comes from some root undigested-unexperienced-undeveloped need, which is abstractively reflected and refracted, creatively into different kinds of wants-addictions-obsessions-fears-habits-attitudes-feelings-thoughts-actions.

Modern Human Awareness: functions at less than one billionth of its potential. We barely use 1% of our Brain. The remaining 99% is not being used at all except for the minimal monitoring of the chemical-glandular functioning of our organs. Our conscious brain is controlled by our subconscious brain. Which in turn is controlled by our instinctive brain. Modern humans have managed to cut off most of their instinctive brain. We have disconnected ourselves from our own instincts. As a result: what is left, is a subconscious brain isolated and disconnected from both of its natural main connections: the instinctive brain and the conscious brain. Instead of a balanced Triality: the subconscious brain... which is the child of both the instinctive and conscious brains: has been abandoned by both. And is acting and reacting blindly as a baby: because it has never been given the proper upraising and nurturing which it needs from both of its parents. As a result: it has become a monster. A spoiled baby: suppressed and repressing itself, lashing out in blind rages irrationally at the wrong things. Misinterpreting the data and information it is receiving from both sides of its parental connections: because so little data, and the wrong information or no information is getting through to it.

Its potential has shrunken from pure neglect and sensory deprivation, and information deprivation. Because it has been spoiled by both parents, and allowed to grow unsupervised and unregulated by both parents: it now has become a monster that dominates both parents. It has become more powerful than both parents. It has taken millions of years of an imbalanced genetic evolution caused by millions of years of an imbalanced environment evolving into an imbalanced species... to create this glandular, neuro-chemical imbalance.

As a result of this: literally all human behavior is controlled by it. The human subconscious has yet to be developed or fully born to grow to its full potential. The Modern Technology of modern civilization: is actually controlled by the human subconscious. Modern human technology is not controlled by the conscious human brain. Modern technology is merely an abstract-mechanical creation of the subconscious brain. It is a literal creation of the human subconscious, The human subconscious has translated its own awareness, its own memory, its own story, its own understanding: into a mechanical-abstract transliteration: that is seen as the most modern technology of modern civilization. It has transliterated itself literally into modern mechanical technology. Not symbolically or abstractly.

For example, take space technology, and the movie: 'Apollo 13'.

The story of a botched mission to the moon. An aborted mission. An abortion.

Why was it a botched abortion? Because 12 missions had already been done. The full cycle of 12 were fully played out. There was no more reason to go to the moon again. It was a subconscious mechanical attempt to impregnate a dead moon and give it Life.

The Apollo Missions to the moon were literal transliterations of the human subconscious of the earliest Origin of the human birth process: transliterated into mechanical modern technology. This is so glaringly obvious: there can be no doubt about it.

The penis explodes its sperm out. The sperm-rocket explodes off the planet. Inside: are astronauts. Hermetically sealed in space suits that have umbilical cords attached to them for life support; just like babies. Once the sperm-rocket leaves the earth: its 3 stage-rockets fire and fire... like trees catching fire for 25 million years in Africa. Leaving it weightless in space, but still on its guided trajectory. The rockets are the main propulsion system of the sperm rocket. Once they have done their job: the tail falls off of the rocket. Once the propulsion system of human male sperm, the tail-end of the sperm, has done its job: it too falls off also. Once the sperm is ejected by the penis: it exists in a state of weightlessness in a liquid medium. The Apollo rocket once it leaves the planet: is also in a state of weightlessness. Apollo is the Sun God of the Ancient Greeks. The Apollo rocket is the son of the Sun God. Once the sperm comes near enough to the huge female egg: it rids itself of its last propulsion-protection and ejects from it a tiny capsule: which is the actual seed-sperm... which contains the life-force which will impregnate the female planetary-egg.

The entire, international political race to get to the moon first: was merely a mechanical recreation of the subconscious: literally translating the male sperm: all trying to be the first to impregnate the female egg-cell into a mechanical opera.

Cape Canaveral: was the cape of the foreskin pulling back to reveal the mechanical penis: it was the site that Kennedy chose to go to the moon because he could do it: so he chose the site that said 'I can' and created a carnival: a can-averal, and opened up a viral can of mechanical worms to do his bidding. Cape Canaveral was re-named Cape Kennedy because Kennedy was the most virile President who created this National effort to get to the Moon. The most virile mission won. The Nation with the President that had the most energetic sperm cells won the space race to get to the moon. Kennedy was a womanizer. He fucked more girls than any American President in American history. His oversexed drive gave him a permanently weakened back.

The entire design of the Apollo Space technology: is a literal transliteration of the process of an aborted attempt to give life to a dead planet. The entire Apollo mission and NASA, and the US Space program: is merely the human subconscious expressing itself literally through modern mechanical technology. It was a blind, destructive expression of human subconscious and unconscious motivations. It was a blind expression of one of the deepest instinctive drives of the human reptile brain: the medulla.

This just one example of how the human species is controlled by its instinctive urges. This is how blind all modern mechanical technology is. This is how blindly primitive its intent, its motives and its actions are. We live inside an abstract civilization that programs us and brainwashes us to live as we were not designed to live. Only when humans live as they were designed to live will the rest of the undeveloped potential of our brains ever be fully realized. As long as we live inside an artificial womb called civilization: we will never develop our full human potential.

The only reason a flower grows-unfolds-expands so effortlessly, is because it was designed to do so. The closer we get to how we were designed to live, the more effortless living, learning, and growing becomes. Unless each of us explores different ways of living, we will never discover which ways are more effortless, more fun, more loving, more wondrous. The only way people can develop their own humanity is to work at it consciously. People should spend time and energy developing their human-skills rather than their tool-skills. Each person earns their own level of humanity by how long and how well they work at it... consciously. If the only thing people work at are their careers or jobs: then they will not develop their own humanity to any appreciable degree.

Human skills are the skills of connectiveness and creativity: not separation. They are all the aspects of a person, which are evoked-explored-discovered-used while existing in a state of Pure Wonder. The most dynamic of them all is the ability to have fun creatively. To be able to have fun all the time, in all ways, is to live creatively. To live creatively is to have fun in every possible way. True fun and true creativity is the same thing. It's called happiness: the ability to be happy comes from the spontaneous ability to enjoy life by having fun all the time. You cannot have fun if you are not creative. You cannot be creative without having fun.

Individual Awareness

Human growth is a causal process. Its condition depends upon the history of its growth. In order to understand the relative basis of human psychobiologic health, you must go back to its roots. Back before even birth; beginning with the well being of the mother and father. Whether the mother even wants to be pregnant or have a child, whether she even feels connected to it or loves it, what kind of love it may be, what she ingests during her pregnancy, her state of emotional-physical-mental health, the environment she is living in, whether she herself is being taken care of. In short, whatever she is exposed to: so is the fetus. And that experiential-genetic, (psychobiologic) development will imprint itself upon that fetus indelibly even before it leaves the womb. Depending on the level of fear-insecurity of the mother, how mature she is, how capable and competent of raising the infant, caring for it, will determine whether the fetus itself even wants to be born or how it feels about itself and the world it is entering. Thankfully, Nature and Genetic Instinct at this stage is strong enough in many cases to create a miscarriage: preventing a birth that was not ready to be born.

Then the actual birth-split from its mother: how painful it is, how easy or difficult the birth, her level of fear, how much that fear is transmitted to the fetus, whether the mother is drugged or not, how tight or relaxed the mother's vaginal muscles are: depending on her level of fear, how much pain is created by the tightness of the mother's vaginal muscles, how much that muscle tightening produces physical pain in the birthing process, how much the physical pain of childbirth actually traumatizes the infant, the degree of the mother's physical fitness, health, whether the fetus is born into an atmosphere of love-warmth, or fear, or indifference, or hate... how much the fetus must numb itself: in order to survive that first experience. Whether it feels wanted or not. Whether it feels loved and protected or not. Whether it feels safe or not. Its level of health at each stage of development and growth

Then: as a half-formed, half-developed fetus outside the womb: whether all of its instinctual genetically designed needs are met; whether it is kept warm, fed, clean, loved, touched, played with, held. Or, whether it is ignored, abused, stuck into a room and isolated, kept away from its parents, not stimulated. Whether it is strapped into some sort of swaddling straitjacket and not given any freedom of movement. Whether it is exposed to the stimuli of Nature or kept indoors in a boring, unchanging environment. Whether it is exposed to the wide diversity of experiences and is allowed to explore, or kept in a cage with bars. Then... as a child: what environment it grows up in. What it is exposed to. What kind of parents it has as examples to copy and mimic. What kind of feed-back they give it. Every aspect and stage of these crucial formative years affects the child's subconscious blueprint and lays the groundwork for how it will feel about itself, about the world, and about others.

One of the things that human parents habitually do: is... not admitting that they do not understand their own babies. Even if they do admit this. Parents actually do not care that they do not understand their own baby. They may struggle to understand the noises coming from their infant. They may wonder why the infant's face is screwed up in redness, and blind frustration. But do they have any idea of why the baby is actually unhappy?

Eventually: parents give up trying to figure out exactly why the baby is crying, or angry or frightened. People mostly project an assumption of why they think a baby is crying, or unhappy, or sad, or angry... upon the baby.

If anyone asks why a baby is crying: what is the usual response? By discounting it as being 'normal'.

'Oh, it's crying because ----- ... that's all.'

How does the parent know this? They are just guessing. No parent wants to admit that their guesses might be wrong.

But what is even more normal is not even being curious at all about why a baby crying. Or even thinking that it may not be normal or healthy for a baby to be unhappy or crying ever. Most of the time; people do not even ask why a baby is crying at all. It is taken for granted that they are crying because they cannot get something they want. What ever it is they cannot get, is simply unfortunate. Normal. To be expected. You cannot satisfy a baby's needs all the time. Nobody should be expected to.

This is one of the most horrible realizations every human fetus, every human baby every human child experiences. That its needs and feelings are not being understood. That nobody cares about its root needs and feelings. That nobody cares about all of its root instinctive needs and feelings. That nobody listens to it. That nobody understands it. That nobody loves it. That there is no true understanding between a baby and its parents. A baby can be screaming one thing at its mother: and the mother could be interpreting that scream as something else entirely.

The baby can yell and scream, and cry, and weep for hours and days and months. The baby can be in the worst agony and pain imaginable. The baby can be terrified, scared, lonely, lost, confused.

And it is routinely ignored.

All of its sounds and squalling and unhappiness are ignored as being normal for a baby. All babies squall and yell. Their squalling and wailing is mostly ignored, or pacified.

Why are the squalls of babies not understood? Why they are unhappy is something that is not reflectively understood by adults. We have no understanding of how a baby's brain works, or even how a child's brain works. We have no clear understanding what they feel or how they feel, or why they feel anything.

How is a baby is regarded? How a baby is treated? Humans gives almost no importance to a baby, until it is first given a name.

The beginning of all abstract identity; begins with what we call the baby.
We only recognize the abstraction of the baby's name: not the actual baby itself...

Only when the baby recognizes it's own name, its own abstract identity... do we recognize the baby as having an identity.

Unless a baby can recognize its own name... it is not even considered to have a personality.
Without an abstract name; it is not considered to be human.

Without an abstract name; it is merely a living blob of protoplasm that makes a lot of incomprehensible noises.

It is by this universal cultural method that: people objectify their babies.
Without a name: they usually call the baby an 'it'.

How many times do you hear:
'Do you want to see it?... Do you want to see the baby?... or my baby?... or our baby?...' Not even referring to the infant as a 'him', or a 'her'. The child is treated like a piece of property: which they own. The baby is an 'it'... an object of mild curiosity. But mostly: babies are objects of indifference. They are mostly ignored and neglected. They are left alone. Anything adults cannot understand are usually ignored.

When a baby rebels against any treatment they do not like; parents try to pacify them. They never try to find the root causes of their baby's actual unhappiness. Parents give up trying to understand them. Babies are raised to understand adults and fit into a world of adults. Adults are not raised to understand babies or fit into their world.

When do children stop having fun? When do they lose their innocence? When do they start getting bored? When do they start becoming serious? When do they start acting Normal? When do children lose their sense of wonder and learn how to fear? When they grow up and become adults.

The easiest way to track this is through their level of honesty. The innocence of Pure Wonder of every baby is instinctively-naturally honest: while the trait of dishonesty is learned. Nobody was ever born a liar. But all babies are born with a Sense of Pure Wonder.

This huge separated gap between humans and their offspring has been created over a span of millions of years of us losing touch with our own inner Sense of Wonder.

Losing touch with our own inner selves. Losing touch with our own inner sense of curiosity. And only having a mild sense of outer curiosity that is mostly stifled and muffled into oblivion before a baby begins to speak... by being spanked, punished, yelled at, frowned upon, and negatively rewarded for every almost inquisitive impulse it has.

We are so traumatized by the time we are three or five years old: that we lose touch with our own memories of when we were babies... and think it is completely normal to do so.

What is the significance of losing touch of all memory when we were little?
Losing all touch of memories when we were babies, infants, children, or even as adolescents?

This has never been asked or questioned, or explored.

How far back do your memories go?

Memory loss is a universal indication of early trauma in all humans.

If you cannot remember farther back than the age of five.

This means that the memories of those five years are too painful for you to recall.

If you cannot remember farther back than the age of three or two.

This means that the memories of those two or three years are too painful to remember.

The earliest memory a baby's brain is capable of retaining: is a mammary-memory of suckling on a nipple after the age of about one year. This is usually its earliest memory. Only... during that one year of suckling mindlessly on a nipple and sleeping. Is a way of having no experiences to remember because the baby is not exposed to anything new. A baby can easily be traumatized in countless ways, simply by not being properly loved, cared-for, handled, lovingly watched, spoken-to... sung-to..., lovingly caressed, cooed over, laughed with, smiled-at, washed, cleaned, fed, slept-with, touched, etc... simply by the parents not being happy in their own lives, and if that happens. It cannot have a brain memory of that trauma, instead; it has a body-memory. Its brain has that first year of memory missing. Instead: that memory is locked into its instinctive cells. Into its body muscles, its organs, its blood vessels, its bones, its heart, its lungs, its genitals, its nerves, its blood vessels... as pain. As raw unidentifiable, unprocessable pain that is not understood or remembered, or felt, or sensed.

That first year...becomes the plateau-level of normal agony-pain the rest of its entire life is based upon, and grows-from.

And if that first year of trauma is so painful, so pain-filled: that the infant needs to shut down its sensations of pain so it will not die... The infant shuts down other sensations also. Permanently... for the rest of its life.

Or... it learns to eject that pain. Through bodily ejections and functions like defecating or urination... and becomes one of the millions of children known as bedwetters, or thumb suckers, or head bangers, or criers, or whiners, or angry, or short tempered, or prone to violent outbursts, or overactive, or easily distracted, or needing distraction, or short-term memories, or forgetful, or pretending to be helpless... as a way of getting attention, as a substitute for the love that is not given to them.

And if any of these symptoms come up: they are systematically discouraged and repressed and shamed and suppressed....By teaching them how to behave... in a civilized manner. No human parent has ever bothered to try to get to the fucking root of why children and babies misbehave. No human society has ever bothered to find out how NOT to traumatize a baby or a child. Adult humans raise their young by systematically discouraging and suppressing all signs and symptoms of trauma.

After crying and wailing for mommy or daddy to come every night: when he or she is put alone into a dark room all alone... they finally realize that nobody truly cares about them and their feelings. They finally realize that their crying is futile. They finally realize that their parents do not care how they feel, or what they feel. Then they are forced to repress their sadness, and loneliness, and fear, and pain. This systematic dehumanization of babies and children deadens the child. Babies shut down. And are damaged for life.

Why? Because if an infant needs to shut down any pain-filled sensations... it must shut down all its other sensations as well. It must shut down all awareness of what happened to it. It must shut down all awareness of what it experienced and felt. It must shut down all awareness of its outer world... and if that shut-down is....

90% of its awareness?
70% of its awareness?
50% of its awareness?
20% of its awareness?

} of pain... and everything else connected to that pain.

This is how you get memory loss. This is why your earliest memories are blocked.

Then that is 90%, or 50%, or 20% of its entire awareness, which it will never wonder about, or be curious about. Then it will be permanently 90% crippled. Or permanently 50% crippled. Or permanently 20% stunted. Never to grow or develop that crippled-stunted 90% or 20% of its entire human potential for the rest of its life.

Yet the first year of a being raised. The first year of a baby's life... is precisely the year when it is most neglected. Most helpless. Most ignored. Most traumatized. Most vulnerable. Most aware. Most sensitive.

This first year is the period when there is the least importance paid to the baby's development. When its needs and wants are considered to be the least important.

When its parents do not understand its needs or wants at all.

This is why humans have no conscious memories of their early years as a baby and as a child. These memories are too filled with pain, and sadness, and loneliness, and hopelessness, and horror, and pain. These early memories are so full of agony: that when they are grown up... they are not healthy enough and strong enough to remember and re-experience these primal, pain-filled years. If they could unlock the gates to the agony of these unexperienced memories: it would kill them faster than a heart attack. Their entire bodies would explode. The cells of their bodies and brains would explode from that Primal accumulation of agony. Every cell; that had to be deadened so it would not die from all the genetic pain it was being loaded with when it was a healthy, strong infant... is a thousand times weaker and less healthy after living through years of a deadened, unexperienced life that only made those cells grow ever-weaker.

The muscles of a baby or an infant when it is bawling and weeping and screaming in pain and fear and rage.... Are tensed 10 times HARDER than the most powerful adult bodybuilder could tense their muscles when they strain at lifting the heaviest weights they can manage.

When infants or babies do this. They are actively trying to protect themselves from the emotional agony of HORROR. They are actively making their bodies as rigid, and unfeeling, and as STRONG as possible... so the pain will not penetrate into their bodies and souls and hearts... and KILL them with the realization that there is no reason for them to go on living.

There is no greater agony than the pain of not having your basic human needs met.

When babies are not cared-for, and not loved, and not picked up, and kissed... they die.

When babies are kept in prisons and not allowed out to explore: their natural curiosity dies slowly, their natural potentials of development dies slowly, bit-by-bit. When babies have no new experiences they can learn from: they shut down and go to sleep, and stop growing on many levels. When babies are not exposed to new experiences: they become bored, they shut down, and all their natural life energy becomes subdued and weak.

This inconvenient truth is slyly laughed-at, and ignored by civilized adults. Adults have been systematically brainwashed into living inside a thing called civilization, and have become used-to barely functioning as machines. They have been brainwashed into living in a human society that has no love in it. They have become used to living without any love. Living without love has become normal for them. They have forgotten what love is. They do not know what love is. They cannot remember when they were little and nobody loved them. The agony of not being loved has been blocked. They have no memory of not being loved. The pain of boredom is blocked. Bit-by-bit, their boredom slowly becomes normal.

Until they grow up living for the rest of their lives in a state of bored, dulled, unaware dullness. Numbed into a frozen undeveloped state of unchanging normality: simply because when they were babies and children they were not exposed to new experiences every day as they should have been.

They also have no memory of what love was, or is supposed to be. They also have no ability to give love, or show affection. They fear all open signs of tenderness or kindness. They are emotionally dead inside. Over the years, they slowly become deader and deader... They call it aging. Actually: aging is merely the physical body dying slowly... after the heart has already died... then the mind dies... they become emotionally dead zombies; who can barely move, or speak. By the time their physical organs finally stop functioning: they are 99.99999% dead inside already anyways.

The greatest part of dying: happens at birth. Babies die more, and experience more horror, and pain, and rage,... than all the accumulated pain of their later years. They experience more pain, more intensely: than all the pain-filled experiences they accumulate later.

Death is a process of accumulating traumatic experiences and not digesting and fully experiencing them.

It begins with the trauma of being born into civilization. Birth does not have to be traumatic. Life does not have to be traumatic. Birth does not have to be too painful to experience fully. Life does not have to be too painful to experience fully.

Life is an accumulating process of Pure Wonder.

Being born into civilization and growing up inside it is a process of death: not life. Civilization is a system that systematically destroys Pure Wonder. This systematic destruction of Pure Wonder begins with lies. By lying to children. By teaching children how to lie. By keeping the ugly truths of civilization away from children: hiding them, so civilized children are raised inside a protected, unreal fantasy... their natural sense of Pure Wonder is systematically dulled, poisoned, stifled, stunted and destroyed.

When and how do children learn to lie? Their first years are filled with nothing but lies. The Easter bunny: Santa Claus. Fairy tales. Peter Pan. They told how wonderful and how beautiful they are. How can a mindless blob that can't move be beautiful? They learn by example, they absorb everything around them like sponges: sucking up whatever attitudes, beliefs, values, and practices they are exposed to. They absorb every act of duplicity and untruthfulness around them. They learn if lying pays off more than honesty. They may learn to lie only in certain ways, only on certain levels. They may learn simply not to openly speak the truth because they are laughed at or punished for it. They learn from their own honesty being used against them by others. They learn that whenever they confess anything at all honestly, that it is used against them. That their honesty reveals every vulnerable thing, every sensitive thing they are curious about... and that all curiosity and sensitivity is ignored, laughed-at, derided, scorned, and spat on.

They learn that others like fooling them: making fun of their transparent, innocent, honesty. They learn that you are most easily fooled by liars; if they remain honest and forthright. So; in order to keep from being hurt, laughed at, ridiculed, and taken advantage of: they stop being honest. Moreover, if whatever around them is false: they will absorb lies and prejudices unconsciously... subconsciously... it so that falsehood becomes a part-of them, a part of their normality, a part of their reality... so they connect to it, and identify with it, so they can become just like everyone else around them and gain acceptance, so they can conform to all of the pressures and taboos and unspoken assumptions and myths that everyone else holds and practices. Because if they do not conform... they are immediately attacked... instinctively, viciously, savagely... because any nonconformist brings out all the pain-fear-hate-rage-anger etc. that is kept suppressed and repressed in other less sensitive, more brutalized people.

Eventually: every child's ethical balance is tipped towards being more dishonest than honest. The trouble is that this happens mostly on a subconscious level, until it becomes normal... so they are unaware of any relative dishonesty in themselves. The very nature of dishonesty is something that has no desire to examine itself. Dishonesty and non-awareness work the same way; they evolve subtly by how a child is raised: neither aspect can change unless the awareness of a person changes first, or unless their environment or circumstances change in a way that sparks some kinds of inner change.

Why do children lie? First: ask yourself how much fear have they have been exposed to? How have they being mis-led? Mis-raised? Intimidated? Yelled at? Threatened? Have they ever in their entire lives felt not safe? Have they ever been ignored? Neglected? Abandoned? Ordered around? Have they ever been verbally abused? Have they ever been emotionally abused? Have they ever been treated as if they were not important? Have they ever been traumatized? Beaten? Sexually abused? Have they ever been in a situation where they were scared, and nobody came to help or comfort them? Have they ever learned to mistrust what others said, or did to them? Have they ever seen or heard others being abused or neglected or ignored? Have they ever seen their parents fighting? Angry? Have they ever seen or heard their parents deceiving each other? Lying to each other? Have they ever seen any kind of unloving behavior around them as they were growing up? Have they ever seen any kind of violence as they were growing up? The problem is that child rearing is mostly copied: not studied or taught. Children lie for countless reasons. They lie to get what they want, to protect themselves.

The fact remains that the root cause of all dishonesty is fear-pain-need. If they can get what they need without lying, then they would not have any need to lie. If they have nothing to fear, if they have not been trained by example to fear: then they will not have any need to lie. If they have never experienced pain, which they could not handle, if they were helped whenever they were in pain: then their pain would not overload and accumulate into fear. And that fear would not force them to protect themselves by lying. If there was no advantage to be gotten from lying then they would not do it.

The reason children learn to lie is because they are born inside an adversarial, competitive, unloving, hierarchical, civilized environment that teaches everyone how to lie; not just children. Competition turns people into adversaries; it turns people into enemies, not friends. Civilization teaches you to lie to your enemies... If children were not taught how to compete against each other, then they would not lie about who was first or second. If children were not disciplined by any kind of abusive negative feedback, then they would not lie about who ate the cookies. All non-loving, unloving environments are hurtful to our young regardless of what age they may be. This includes parents too.

But how do parents know what a child needs? How can they discern if what a child wants is what they really need? Where do you get that instinctual-subconscious-conscious wisdom? Since there is no experiential or instinctual-genetic basis of comparison that is universal for child rearing, we ignore the question. If children learn that lying does not work, then they will stop doing it. If children are raised in an atmosphere where there is no fear, no dishonesty, no denial, no refusal to connect... if children are raised in an atmosphere of love-honesty-courage and wonder: they will not learn by example how to lie because then, lying will be absent from their environment.

How many times is it necessary in a civilized environment to say 'no' to a child? Never mind the number of times it is unnecessary, but done anyways. What is the cumulative impact of this negative feedback? What is the negative impact-consequence-result of children living in a civilized environment? If the child's environment is not conducive to its needs: it is not surprising that it learns to lie just in order to get what it needs or wants. And if you continually say no to a child's wishes, then they will learn by hard experience, that the only way they can get what they want is by lying, by being deceitful, by being manipulative. How can any parent know what their infant or child actually needs... what they should not have, and what they do not need? That requires maturity, wisdom, and above all; previous experience in raising children under the supervision of experienced adults who will make certain that you do not blunder too badly in your learning curve of finding out just how you should raise your own child. Where are there such courses? Where are there such wise, mature teachers? Civilized societies are not focused on raising children properly, or even better. The bulk of all civilized resources, time, energy, money, training, and expertise go elsewhere. Parents are supposed to learn on an as-you-go basis. There is no preparation, no education, no standards, no guides, no comparison, no evaluation, and no experience in how to raise our young... except the pure blind luck of which family-culture-set of values you happen to be exposed to.

How else could you even begin to evaluate these questions unless you can compare child rearing to an environment where there is virtually no reason to say no to a child? How can you compare negative and positive feedback on children unless you itemize each incident in context, and compare the relative effects? But we never compare different forms of child rearing, much less different environments, to see which are more beneficial. Science has never bothered to seriously explore the question of what is needed for humans to be happy: it is much too busy playing with fancy machines to ever deal with relevant human issues concerning babies. Black holes are more important than babies.

Anything that is done non-comparatively, blindly, and unquestioningly: becomes stupid regardless of what it is. All habits-routines, if not examined, if left unchanged: become unhealthy. No dynamic balance is ever unchanging.

Children should be taught to discern the difference between the truth and a lie. They should never be protected from lies. Neither should lies be forced upon them. As long as they exist in a state of Pure Wonder, they are themselves the ultimate lie detectors: their own innocence reflects back honestly everything that their parents teach them. That is why all magicians hate performing in front of children: because they are not as easily fooled as their parents are: they are more honest. They do not want to be fooled, as their parents want to be fooled. Children instinctively want to see the truth, not have it covered up and hidden from them.

However... Adults willingly want to be awed and fooled by magicians because their entire belief system is based upon illusions, which they try to convince themselves, are true. That is why Magicians hate performing in front of children... they can fool adults much more easily. How honest or deceitful you are with yourself can be measured by how much you delight in fooling others, and being fooled by others. How honest or deceitful children become hinges upon the relative honesty of their parents. All parents can do is to be as honest as possible. The more parents listen to their own children, the better parents they become. The more parents retain their own sense of Pure Wonder, the better they are as parents. The only thing that keeps a person's innocence and honesty from being corrupted is their own sense of Pure Wonder. All child rearing should be creative, simple, and fun. If you're not being creative, if it's not simple, if it's not fun, for both you and the child: then you're doing it wrong. To raise a child non-creatively is a crime. To not allow a child to explore their own creativity is a crime. People can only be creative if they have a sense of Pure Wonder. To do anything to destroy a child's sense of wonder is also a crime. Basically nothing in life should be boring: if it is, there is something wrong with it.

But the root issue is still the two conflicting aspects of Wonder and fear. Children should never be protected out of fear because the act itself of being fearful teaches that child how to fear. To prevent a child from learning how to be fearful means they need to grow up in a society of elders who themselves do not harbor any irrational, unnecessary fears. It means that during their fetal development and during birth, they should not be infected with any fears their mother may have. And after birth, they need to be given total freedom to explore their environment fearlessly. But: being born into a condition of fear already infects them with this imbalance-disease.

Fear destroys Creativity. Fear destroys Love. Fear destroys Wonder. Children should be able to grow up in an environment of no fear: only Pure Wonder. This means that adults must heal themselves of their own fear and pain before they even decide to have children. There is only one requirement for parents before they have children: grow up first yourself. The thing about humans is that they expect their own children to make them grow up. All that does is damage and limit the child's own upbringing. No child should have that thrust upon them. Whatever issues people need to deal with should be dealt with before they have children: not after. But civilization and human culture makes this impossible to achieve. Instead: the tragedy of immature adults, improperly raising children, has been going on for thousands of years.

In order for children to learn how to lie, there has to be a pre-existing condition of traditions, habits, culture, practice of lying. Once a child is born into such an environment, they merely absorb its tenets, values, beliefs, and expectations: both spoken and unspoken. They end up conforming-to and practicing what they see. Each culture by its set-frozen structure inevitably moulds the awareness of each child. So: how can you delete dishonesty totally from child-rearing? You must first delete it from the environment they are born into. But that automatically means that you cannot preserve any set of values, or culture, and try to imprint it onto the younger generation. You cannot have anything that is sanctified and held above questioning, you cannot have anything that is not allowed to be questioned or explored. You cannot allow any secrecy or lying to be part of everyday living. There is only one condition that meets all of these requirements: the sense of Pure Wonder. If a child is born into a social environment of Pure Wonder, it will have nothing to fear, it will not need to protect itself from anything, nothing will be kept secret from it, and no expectations of others to be dishonest, or polite, or well-mannered, or unquestioningly obedient will influence its growth.

Only: this state of awareness is also the kind of awareness that will dissolve any preserved accumulation of cultural values-beliefs, etc... And that will turn human society into such a fluid dynamic of total openness and unlimited potential that no imagination could begin to foretell what such an existence might be like. But, there is no getting around the fact that how each generation lives has a direct, linked legacy of influence on each succeeding generation.

At each stage, there is a genetic model that must be followed for that person to grow properly. There is also an experiential model that must be followed. Both are universal for all humans. If these two models are followed, then the person will grow up without suffering any unnecessary trauma or fear. They will be able to develop their own sense of pure wonder without ever being de-sensitized, de-humanized or traumatized. That means they will be able to experience their own life fully. They will be able to digest all of their experiences fully, integrate them into their own contextual understanding fully in the process of growing up. As yet: no such models have ever been looked for, developed or found.

How should human awareness be developed? How should it be nurtured? Trained? Taught? We think it is perfectly okay to act as if this process were a blank sheet upon which we may imprint whatever we happen to have around as a civilized environment of personal-familial-cultural attitudes-beliefs-values. How should human awareness be developed? All I can say is that we do not know because humans have never creatively explored this question: and more tellingly... nobody has ever even asked this question.

Yet no society; no culture; no parent; no civilization will ever admit that they do not truly know how to raise their own young. It is commonly regarded as a sacred given right to raise our young however we choose. Not how the child actually needs to be raised. And since nobody has bothered to study this: who is to say what is right or wrong? Even if there is documented proof: it is not collated, applied, or used. Nobody is an expert on this. And whatever studies are done: they are only done inside the confines of our artificially concreted civilization. No adult can know what a fetus-infant's instinctual needs are. Any adult who claims to know this is a liar. By the time we are mature, we have lost our own instinctual needs, we are totally blind in how to treat-raise our young. By simply duplicating what we have learned, by assuming that we know: we assume that anything we do, or do not do, is perfectly fine.

Why do babies cry? We do not know. They cannot tell us in words. They have not learned to speak yet. Adults do not even try to understand them because they cannot use words. A baby cries at different times for different reasons. Why are some babies constantly suffering from some sort of illness? Whatever is going on, they cannot tell us: because they have not developed any integrated form of conscious awareness or language yet. Which of their needs are being met, and which are not? We do not know. Except that they are extremely sensitive to everything around them.... in ways, and on levels that we cannot fathom or ever understand as adults. They have an entirely different set of non-adult needs... and since adults only understand adult needs, they are mystified that babies do not care about adult things. So they devalue what the baby 'needs' as not of 'adult' importance... and end up denying babies their basic human rights simply because they do not know what those needs and 'rights' are. They do not nurture and develop the baby's awareness as it is genetically programmed to need to be developed. If this sensitivity of awareness is not seriously damaged, it can develop into a sense of Pure Wonder. Otherwise: it becomes a narrowed, numbed sense of normality

So: no basis of comparison, no basis for evaluation, no basis for perspective: no practical way of studying the development of fear or wonder in any growing infant-child. What are we doing right? What are we doing wrong? We do not know.

As the half-formed fetus-baby develops into a child and then into an adolescent: the experiential part gradually takes over more and more of their awareness. Afterwards, they cannot tell us what was right or wrong about their formative years: because their brains were not developed enough to process everything that happened to them into a conscious memory. Yet the farther back you go in its development, the fetus-infant is exponentially more sensitive and subject to any and all influences. And we cannot trace this secret intangible causal process from its single-cell origin all the way up to maturity.

What we need is not more conscious knowledge to make sure all goes as it should. What we need is not more tools. What we need is to become more instinctively intelligent. Translate that into human awareness and you get intuition-insight-wisdom... that is: compressed integrated knowledge. Not facts, not cultural values. Once people understand the few simple basic principles of how and why the Universe and they themselves actually work; then their existence becomes much easier to navigate. You can simplify your life so it matches more closely the way you were designed to live: provided you have the necessary perceptive tool: Pure Wonder. Humans are genetically designed to live simple lives: not complicated ones.

What we need to do is sensitize our own awareness as much as possible not only to the needs of our young, but to our own needs, so we do not unknowingly brutalize the sensibilities of the young we raise. So we do not unknowingly harm them. Within each of us is the history of the slow death of our own sensitivity and awareness. Which we must access if we are to understand ourselves: not merely accept our present condition as being normal. And you can only do that by asking yourself every question there is to be asked. You can only do that by finding out what are your crucial questions that need to be answered by you: not by somebody else. How we should raise our young is inseparably linked to; 'How should I live?' If you do explore this, if you do find out: 'Oh, so that's why I don't... Because when I was... and that happened... then I... and it...' 'So I... oh!' Then suddenly your awareness is changed-expanded. Suddenly you see better, are more aware: suddenly you know better. And you can only do this by existing in a State of Pure Wonder.

If an overly strict parent realizes that they are still rebelling-reacting against their own over-permissive upbringing: then they will wake up and try to balance how they raise their own children. If a parent who was abused realizes that they are only repeating-duplicating how they were raised, and that it is not right; they will wake up and try not to repeat their own parent's mistakes. But that is not enough. It is not enough to raise the child, and halfway through it, realize you are doing it all wrong. You need to do your own growing up first before you even decide to raise a child. Otherwise you will blunder: and those mistakes can never be erased from the womb. Otherwise, you have merely insured the perpetuation of each generation not growing up as they were supposed to and as they were designed to. But this causal process does not stop at childhood or adolescence. If people try, they can easily mark the slow deadening process of normality, the slow death of wonder-curiosity-aliveness in all stages of human life. But this process begins at the beginning of the child's life, it begins in the womb. And it is the beginning which is most crucial.

All you have to do is look for the signs in yourself and others around you: and you will find them. All you have to do is follow the tell-tale signs and they will lead you to your own insights, your own discoveries. But if you do not open up this Pandora's box of questions, you will never get to understand yourself... ever.

The fact is: there is an explainable-understandable reason for everything in your life. Which can only be found out by you if you search for the answers and never give up until you find the actual truth. The two key elements in this exploration are fear-pain and Wonder. If you are more pain-filled than wonder-filled, you will have no desire to explore yourself. If that pain-fear has forced you to numb your awareness down to the point of insensibility just in order to survive: your Sense of Wonder will also be numbed; your sense of curiosity will be numbed. If you are more Wondering than fearful: you will have a desire to explore yourself.

There is a major obstacle to this process: the best general term I can use is trauma. What is trauma? It is unexperienced pain. All human trauma originates from undigested-unprocessed experience. If the person suffers a painful experience, which it is not able to integrate-digest-understand at any point in its growth, then its defense mechanisms come into play. Here, the conscious-subconscious and instinctual levels of its body-brain react-adapt instinctively-creatively to save it from pain-terror-shock-death. If its needs are not met and the pain of its unmet needs become unbearable, one standard reaction is to shut down. By not experiencing something that is too painful, this experience is then stored genetically and experientially in the body-brain-emotions-psyche. As a consequence, the damage to its development affects its entire later growth. If any trauma happens before the brain develops an integrated memory, it will not even possess a conscious memory of that traumatic incident. If the trauma is too severe at any stage, the memory of that experience may be totally blocked because the sudden violence of re-experiencing it would kill the organism. The integration of experience can only happen as a natural process. All experience is a form of Energy-Space-Time. When that Experience-Energy is integrated, or absorbed too fast, it becomes destructive. In order to prevent that, our defense mechanisms come into play. Human defense mechanisms are infinitely creative; each person's body-brain uses them differently. In the early stages of infancy it is mostly the subconscious, which stores and imprints these traumas and experiences: to serve as the blueprint for the later-developing conscious mind to follow. If this subconscious blueprint is never examined, explored, uncovered, and understood, the person will grow up and follow this pattern unconsciously: unable to change it for the rest of their lives. And not even aware of their own subconscious programming.

All human traumas, all unexperienced experiences split off from the human psyche and are reflected outwardly or inwardly. For instance: take sexual trauma-abuse. Whoever is damaged reflects that trauma back inwardly or projects it outwardly. The in ones become victims who suffer from low self-esteem. They suffer from the inability to trust others or have close relationships. They develop all kinds of behavioral dysfunctions from overeating to bulimia. The out ones become promiscuous, prostitutes, porn addicts, child molesters, rapists, serial killers. All depending on how their defense systems handle it. It is how each person handles their trauma that determines whether they end up harming others by it, or merely harming themselves, or whether they start healing. The entire dynamic of sadomasochism works the same way: it is literally only a way of people trying to connect-to and experience their pain either by externalizing it, projecting it, i.e. sadism... Or internalizing it, reflecting it, i.e. masochism. But because the original root experiences of trauma are not uncovered, explored, felt-digested fully... not processed, experienced, integrated, accepted, and understood: the symptom of sexual abuse merely becomes sexual addiction. In essence: all addictions are only symptoms of unfelt pain or trauma that has not been fully felt, experienced, and integrated. The levels of honesty-denial-truthfulness all depend on how much each person has split off from their painful experiences. Generally: the more severe the damage, the greater the trauma, the greater the pain: the greater the denial... which is why only five percent of child molesters ever admit to their own deeds. However: the yardstick of honesty is not limited to measuring the degree of sexual trauma. How honest people are in other matters also reveals how emotionally, spiritually, or ethically damaged they are.

Sexual trauma is only one aspect of the whole picture. People develop different defenses along different lines for different reasons from different kinds of trauma. Trauma can result from a slow process of exposure to an unhealthy or imbalanced environment just as much as to something that is sudden or catastrophic. What is invisible; is the level of that trauma. Since human society is mechanically based, and since others are similarly damaged; most human trauma is not considered a form of damage in the first place. If you can survive, adapt, function mechanically; just how damaged you are as a human is mostly invisible, or normal. You take the condition of your own damaged self for granted.

The spectrum of all human trauma-damage-defense systems-adapting-survival-functioning runs the complete gamut of society and has no exceptions. The point is: just because you have adapted successfully to exist and survive in a tool-based society by becoming able to function successfully as a tool... by functioning mechanically: this does not mean you are not damaged. Now a new term: adverse childhood experiences: is being used. This has been found to be a significant factor in why certain people commit suicide. Regardless of what term you use: trauma is trauma... and there is no such thing as an untraumatized or undamaged human.

The real travesty of civilization is that the norm of what is considered to be trauma is for the most part, determined mechanically, not humanly. If you cannot function mechanically, then you are considered to be dysfunctional as a human. While if you can function mechanically but cannot function as a fully integrated loving-giving human; you are not considered to be damaged or traumatized at all. Whatever human trauma each person suffers from is of almost no importance. Simply because in all tool-based societies of civilization, people are basically trained to survive in, adapt to, and function a mechanical norm, not a human norm. How badly you are traumatized, or in what ways is irrelevant; as long as you can function mechanically.

Human Babies have been brought into this world for thousands of years with their eyes squeezed shut, and screaming in horror. Does any other baby of any other animal species do this when it is brought into this world? No. Yet, adult humans smile and laugh and think that squeezing their eyes shut in horror, and screaming and wailing so intensely their faces go red is normal for a baby. But not for them; just for babies.

Try an experiment. Shut your eyes squeezed tight, and start screaming in horror until your face goes red. Then have someone laugh at you and think that what you doing is perfectly normal. See if you can understand the insane inhuman callousness of that other person. See if you can make any sense out of why this universal sign that something is horribly wrong has been ignored by human adults... for how many thousands of years.

Can you remember what it felt like to be born yourself? Why can't you remember? Was it because the horror of being born to inhuman monsters who had no understanding of what they were doing to you was so horrible that you had to block out the memory of that horror, or die? Why can't humans remember their own birth? Why is there a permanent mental-emotional-physical block to every human ever born: so they can never remember back far enough to understand what it felt like to be a helpless baby? Is it because every human baby ever born was born already so traumatized and horrified inside their womb: that not one human can remember the depth and intensity of that horror? Is it because every human baby ever born already knew instinctively and subconsciously: that the monsters, that were bringing it into this world, did not know how to raise it? Is it because every human baby ever born already knew that it was going to be tortured and warped and forced to become an inhuman monster just like the monsters that were bringing it into this world?

Look at the birth of every other warm-blooded mammal on this planet: and see if they come out of their womb with their faces twisted and distorted into the ugliest possible visual signals and truths of disgust, revulsion, horror, fear, terror, anger, rage, terror, unhappiness, sadness... screaming as loud as they can in disgust, horror, repugnance, rage, anger... with their eyes shut and their faces red... Trying desperately to communicate to the smiling callous monsters around it that it is in pain, that it is terrified, that something is deeply, deeply wrong.

There really is no such thing as an undamaged untraumatized human. They do not exist. They have never existed. Not since the first squalling, half-developed human fetus was thrust unprepared out of its mother's womb to be taken care of by its unprepared mother: who never had an infant that could not immediately crawl. A specialized infant that first had to develop and grow its huge outer tool-brain; before it could even begin using it properly enough to function without being completely helpless. But because we have no way of tracing the true history of childcare, and because we have no way of comparing perspectives on what is actually healthy and what is actually damaging: this viewpoint cannot be proven.

The only way the human Psyche can survive a traumatic experience is by splitting off from that unbearable experience so the victim does not die from the pain-shock, or go insane. In order to survive, the basic dynamic of the human defense system is to split. This splitting happens in uniquely different ways, on different levels, and in different degrees for each person. The dynamic of this one-sided splitting is not a myth. As an example there is the documented case of Truddi Chase: who was horribly sexually abused from the age of two up until sixteen. Because of her sexual traumas: she split into ninety-two separate personalities in order to survive her ordeals. What needs to be understood is that the one-sided Splitness of human trauma is so creatively, and uniquely different for each individual: that you cannot use any standardized, simplistic formula or approach. Each case is completely different.

All the evidence from studies and case studies all over the world indicate that on average... one-in-four, up to one-in-three children are sexually abused or raped at some time in their early years.

But this statistic comes only from the ones who actually admit it... and can remember it, and have gone public with it, and are found by the statisticians to enter it into their statistical accounts. Most sexual abuse and rape is kept secret because it works as an obvious vicious cycle. If a child, or baby is raped or destructively abused at an early age by an authority figure like a father. Most of the time the entire memory of the rape is blocked out permanently and never remembered. Being raped by your parents destroys trust in authority figures. Who can the child tell about it? Another authority figure? It is terrified of authority figures for good reason. One common symptom of rape is genital and sexual self-revulsion and shame. The shame of being raped is so toxic and painful: that most rape victims never develop the courage to tell anyone about it. Society heaps even more shame upon rape victims when any do confess to being raped. Which effectively stops most rape victims who want to tell, simply because they do not want to go through another ordeal of shame. One way or another: society makes sure these crimes are not exposed or investigated. Every legal and social deflection is destructively used to try to make rape victims shut up and never tell anyone. That is why all statistics about sexual abuse and rape are pure lies. Because most people who were raped: do not even have the memory of it. And even when they do: they lie through their teeth about never being raped. And if then, even if they have the courage to say the truth: they are attacked, and doubted, and shamed and attacked all over again for even daring to bring up such an unpleasant subject

The blocking of traumatic memories is a psychological fact, and has been clinically proven. Even the statistical percentage of sexually abused children is much higher than statistics show. Simply because statisticians never gather their information from the majority: only small, unrepresentative samples. They do not sample the lower income populations, the less educated, the millions of latch-key children, the less well-off children, the children with parents who do not know how to raise them, the parents who are ignorant, the children who are more neglected, more vulnerable to sexual abuse, the children more inclined to be victimized from it. The statistical percentage has to be at least 50% if not higher... But that has nothing to do with the actual percentage of rape victims. Until people regain their memories all the way back to being born: nobody can say what was done to them during the first years, which they have no memory of. The reason humans cannot remember all the way back to their birth is because there is simply too much pain locked up inside these earliest memories. If you ever do a study of how far back people can remember: you will find a huge diversity in memory blocks. Some remember only as far back as five, some only back to six or seven. Usually: the block is obvious. A father or mother dying. Moving. A crisis. A tragedy in the family. An accident, etc.

Yet how many psychologists or psychiatrists specialize to treat this most common of memory blocks of early childhood?... none. There have been a very rare few who have tried.. But they mostly do not know what they are doing, they get spotty results, and burn out so fast, they stop practicing altogether. Moreover; it costs tens of thousands of dollars... and what adult has that kind of money, or the time or the energy, or even a motive? 99.9% of therapists don't want to even touch a badly sexually traumatized individual. They will not even take the case. Any person suffering sexual abuse scares the shit out of them. They have no idea of how to handle any painful emotions or experiences that come from sexual abuse. So all most sexual abuse is quietly brushed under the carpet. And the medical establishment goes on treating all kinds of symptomatic ailments rather than try to get at the root of any patient's problems. It is an indication of how sexually repressed the entire civilized World is: when its medical professions refuse to even recognize the existence of sexual abuse as a medical condition that needs treatment.

Culturally... in nearly all civilized societies for over 10,000 years: one reason why sex has become a taboo subject and considered to be dirty... why feces and urine is considered to be dirty, why genital revulsion exists in all civilized societies; is simply because when humans stopped moving as small bands as nomads, their excrement accumulated and stank and rotted: it became unhealthy. They were eating unhealthy civilized food; and any accumulated mass of unhealthy feces stinks to high heaven. You will not find genital-sexual-excrement revulsion in nomadic cultures that travel; their feces and urine do not accumulate to become a stinking, rotting cesspool of disease-carrying microbes and bacteria. If you smell the feces of a person who only eats healthy living plants and simple unprocessed foods, you will find that it has no unpleasant odor and does not rot or begin to stink... it simply decomposes itself naturally and disappears leaving no trace, no odor, no impure accumulation. If you smell the feces of any wild animal in its pristine natural environment eating the healthy food it was designed to eat: you will find that it just has a pungent but not unpleasant odor... it is merely the animal's odor-essence of its undigested, unneeded organic matter that is designed to recycle itself back into Nature as quickly as possible and leave almost no trace of it being there. You will not find piles of accumulated feces that stink and cause disease anywhere in the animal kingdom. You will not find any other animal except humans who have any genital revulsion or act as if sex is dirty. Take away the effect of all accumulating feces, urine, take away the effect of all unhealthy civilized processed, cooked food, and you will also take away a basic reason for sexual repression, sexual shame, rape, sexual abuse. We became sexually sick and unhealthy when we started fucking too much. The human species became sick when it began having too many babies and overpopulating the earth with an over-accumulation of too many people, which in turn created the problem of accumulating our feces in one place and piling it up until it stank too much and created disease, until by association, our genitals became dirty because it is the root of our sickness: carnal lust, or as the Bible calls it: the forbidden fruit of knowledge... until anything to do with our genitals became 'dirty'... The history of human sexual revulsion is millions of years old. And you wonder why civilized humans do not want to explore it. Expose the ugly truth of our supposedly glorious past? Heaven forefend. Horrors. Better to pretend that this horror does not exist and cover it up and hide it under clothes, under blankets, under the cover of night.

The Inner Child-Infant-Fetus and Personality Integration

In order to grow up, there are necessary stages or steps of experience that humans need to go through before the next step can be taken: whether it is walking before running or making baby sounds before speaking words. When any of the stages of experience are missing or not experienced, the entire linear process of growing up and maturing becomes frozen, or stunted, or damaged in some way. So... it is not only the need to re-experience experiences that that were too painful... that were never been properly integrated or digested... but also the need to experience experiences that you never had... that you are missing; in order to be able to go on to the next step-stage of growth, maturity and learning: in the correct order. How can you tell a person who has never experienced love what love is? How can you describe colors to a person who was born blind? How can you teach a person how to walk when they haven't yet even learned how to crawl? You can't.

In my view; all people have missing gaps of both kinds. Traumatic experiences that were never fully digested, and also experiences that are missing simply because they never happened in the first place. But human society does not admit the existence of these two crucial, crippling dynamics of the human psyche. They remain as undealt with, unexamined issues in every person's life. More important: when there is not a sense of Pure Wonder, each life experience accumulates to produce a frozen normality... which, if not examined and put into a larger perspective and context: cannot be changed or rebalanced. All norms and normalities are frozen stages where a person has stopped learning, growing and changing.

The problem is that we have no alternate model of human existence except the one we live in. However we were designed to live is the missing model I am referring to. And until we find it: we will never know what we are missing or how we should be living. We will never discover what we are fully capable of, what our potential actually is, or what our creativity or our awareness is capable of unless we can unearth the model of human existence, which is optimum for us. It is a search that has never been undertaken.

Why? Because instead of existing in a state of Pure Wonder, people exist in a state of deadened unquestioning normality. The state of normality makes it impossible for people to even consider the relative condition of their own health or awareness; much less go to the trouble to compare and evaluate how healthy they are. Because of the split-up condition of the human psyche people do not even change except incrementally, without noticing the change. The process of rebalancing ourselves, or psychobiologic healing, is not just an elimination of illness. It is a refinement of the totality of our condition: and that means not only our Inner Universe, but our Outer Universe as well. It is a refinement of our dynamic balance in both of these aspects. It is not a question of becoming healthy: but what should the relative condition of our health be? Were we designed to be out of breath after walking three blocks, or were we designed to be able to run three miles without getting out of breath? What level of balance-health is the human animal supposed to reach? Not just physically but as a psychobiologic totality. How much should we Love? How deeply? How Honest should we be? How deeply? What level of Courage should we have? What condition of existence should we live in? What should be our relative condition of health? We cannot find this out of unless we explore and compare different conditions of human existence.

One key to our psychobiologic health, to our balance, lies in the middle brain: the subconscious. The middle brain or subconscious speaks to us through dreams in actual terms: not abstract terms. Dreams are generalized situation-plays. If we examine their context as it relates to us, we can find out their true meaning. But, in order to successfully understand our dreams, we also have to understand the actual situation-context of our own lives. Once we begin to do this, then our dreams can help us to further understand ourselves and the true context of whatever situation we exist in. By relating the situation-context of our lives to the situation-context of our dreams and comparing them, we can gain a better perspective on our conflicts, our own true inner nature, and our true inner conflicts. Since most people are not sufficiently connected to their own subconscious: their dreams mean nothing to them. Many people are so disconnected from their inner selves that they do not even remember their own dreams. They have not learned how to look at themselves deeply or evaluate anything in a truly contextual manner.

Whatever people latch onto, whatever they are exposed to in life, influenced by, attracted to, connected to, identify with, oriented towards, is mostly arbitrary. There is no reliable way of making sure anyone is properly motivated in the right direction, for the right reasons, or given the proper support and affirmation they need. Yet whatever it is, literally determines the rest of their life, their values, their goals. Because of this: the process of living, learning, growing, beginning from inside the womb, how this happens, how we are raised; is crucial. How we live, how we are raised, is crucial. Yet civilized societies do not even bother to acknowledge this. The upbringing of children is left mostly to chance, circumstances, luck... And because of this, our species has no lodestone of determining just how we should raise our young. This is a double crime. Criminal for completely neglecting the issue in the first place, and criminal that however badly we raise our young, it is allowed, condoned, and considered to be normal. Because each person, each society, each culture, is encased inside it's own normality; it also has no perspective or context by which they can determine whether what they are doing and how they are raising their young is good or bad. No family, no community, no society, no culture bothers to go outside of their own normality and ask: "How are others doing it?" And then compare it to their own ways. For some strange reason, people never try to gain a better understanding of how to raise their own children by the use of comparison.

Why? Because in all civilized tool cultures, the more tool-oriented they are, the more importance is placed on tool-values, not human values. In civilization, the amount of time and energy spent on raising children is as little as possible. The emphasis on work and mechanical functioning is as much as possible. Until you get the two-car couple that commutes to work, lets off their children at day-care centers, after-school programs, comes home to watch television, and calls itself a family. Now the culture of 'day care' has been semantically normalized to: 'child care'... as if stuffing as many children into cribs and rooms with no love or personal loving attention is more acceptable since 40-50% of all American families put their children into such inhuman living conditions in order to 'work' instead of bothering about their own children all day. This is just one more step in the ongoing process of dehumanization by civilization.

The U.S.S.R. practiced this crib-method early in its regime, and found that it was raising such incompetent nitwits, that they stopped the practice and let children be raised at home by their mothers. America is steadily dumbing down its own population by this crib-raising process, and is suffering the consequences of it now. How each generation raises its young determines largely the fate of the next generation. The level of brutalized, numbed dehumanization of each generation is passed on to the next through its ignorant child-rearing practices... Every new generation of adults accumulates more unhealthy assumptions, customs, habits, customs, etc... Until the entire society and culture is in crisis: and a breaking point is reached. Until humans cannot live any longer under their own insane brutalized, normalized, civilized conditions, and rise up in a blind, incoherent recoil-revolt against things they cannot define. This has happened countless times in all societies, and each time the reaction has been savagely suppressed and even worse measures taken to brutalize humans so they get used to their civilized normality without objecting or reacting to it. The crib method of child-care is an extremely efficient way to get children used to being bored all the time... But it makes them so uncurious, so unintelligent, that when they try to grow up they can't. And then this entire generation of immature idiots mismanage their society so badly they usually destroy it from the inside out... leaving nothing but an empty vacuum for any other less sick culture to replace its totally corrupt, vacuous, lazy, dumb, incompetent culture with something more vibrant. While raising their children to be even stupider and duller, and unhealthier. Until the entire nation, and culture, and population becomes so rotten with corruption that it is visited by huge catastrophes and calamities and plagues and illnesses, and droughts and famine and invasions.

Every time this cultural, and generational vicious cycle peaks. Every time a continent or nation, or race, or culture, or mass of mindless blind human victims pay the price for what their ancestors did to them. They die and suffer by the millions... unable to understand why this is happening to them. Until no civilized human can explain why these vicious cycles occur over and over.

Rome replaced its own culture regularly with new fads from other cultures and cultural practices... but this did not stop the remorseless dumbing down of its population until there were no more competent soldiers, no more competent generals... until they were easily defeated in battle by all comers, and became despised as a city full of craven cowards and idiotic fools who ran out into the street with baskets of roast dogs for the latest invading army of conquerors to eat because they had nothing else left to offer their invaders in the hope of not being slaughtered along with the others. The victors ate the roast dogs and put leashes onto the fools who brought them their food... and brought them to the public square and slaughtered them before the eyes of the entire crowd of Roman vanquished citizens... And after that: they walked around, casually slaughtering members of the Roman crowd while the entire crowd of Romans who outnumbered the invaders by a hundred-to-one, could have easily overcome their killers. Instead: they just stood there and let themselves be murdered because they were so stupid, so cowardly, so craven, so lacking in any self-esteem, that they simply did not know what else to do... while their killers laughed and sprayed blood into the faces of the ones who were spared. It was the victors attempt to try to teach the Romans that what they despised most about the Romans was their disgustingly uniform, all enveloping culture of cowardice and appeasement. If the Romans had fought their invaders and died bravely in battle, they would have been vanquished only once, and either been oppressed or shaken off their oppressors to be left alone to live their lives: unhumiliated and uncorrupted by literally centuries on invasions and rape and pillage. However, the Romans were too stupid to understand the message. The next invasion brought even more insane examples of Romans hiding in outhouses, up to their knees in their own feces trying to escape their killers as they found them while pissing into their faces... and then nailing the hole shut so they died a horrible, humiliating death. That was the level to which the mightiest military culture was brought to: because of their insane, inhuman practice of putting their children into cribs to be raised by slaves: who not only did not give a damn about those children: but hated their parents and feared them and despised their Roman babies and children. Romans gave their babies and children to be raised and tutored by the slaves they owned. What surprise is it that these slaves did not love the children of their masters more than their own children?

Today: Italians are known as a culturally non-violent Nation... They are now one of the most peaceful and fun-loving cultures in Europe. Try to find an Italian raised in Italy who is brave physically... try to find a fighter, a warrior, a soldier, a general amongst them. Their armies in the 1st and 2nd World Wars were a standing joke. Because their cultural heritage has taught them that 1,000 years of war, killing, brutality and physical violence only leads to the total self-destruction of a Nation and a culture. This is why the practice of kidnapping rich millionaire hostages for money began in Italy. The kidnappers thought the Italians were such cowards that they would cave in and pay the money without protest. But they chose the wrong Nation to attack at the level of its sacred children. The entire Nation banded together; and hunted down every single kidnapper, and jailed them, and executed them. Today, Italians no longer use the detested crib method any longer to raise their children... because that method nearly destroyed their entire race and culture. Only after becoming a weak, non-violent, non-dominant culture did the ancestors of Rome learn to slightly improve their childrearing practices.

Now, modern America's dominance and corruption is leading them down the same path as Rome went... because Americans do not understand anything about history or care the slightest about it. The trouble with civilization is it repeats the same insane mistakes over, and over without ever learning from those mistakes. The future fate of America will be the same fate as that of Rome. It will be virtually annihilated in the future and become a nation of cowards, idiots, fools, and lazy irresponsible dimwits. It is already fast becoming this right now. The only question is how long it will take for its wealth, ease, affluence, and corruption to destroy that Nation from the inside-out... as Rome was from the outside-in.

The same thing happened to Egypt's dominance and power. Until it became a cultural nation of dimwitted fools, idiots... and liars: To lie like an Egyptian was a Roman's highest praise for being out-smarted by a rival swindler. All slavishly obeying their precious, sacred, sanctified Priest-class who only intoned the greatness that Egypt had once been. As if that were a reason to be proud of being an Egyptian, while living lives of near-total slavery and mindless submission to all and any authority figures in their culture. The Egyptians kept on revolting and rebelling... even being found slaughtered by their own mercenaries: who could not stand the effeminate vileness of their own paymasters. The mercenaries then dickered with the Romans for an armistice. The Romans slaughtered the mercenaries and slaughtered the Egyptians until they got so tired of killing weak, screaming cowards; that they never put a standing legion into that country again. Why? Because there was no reason to try and discipline weak, cowardly religious fanatics who could be easily killed; yet did not have the brains to realize that every time they revolted they would be killed again en masse. The Romans understood finally that they could not rule Egypt directly and let the Egyptian Priest class do it for them. Rome never tried to use Egyptian mercenaries because there were none to be had. That is the fate of all long-term advantage and dominance which Empires suffer from. It weakens the culture you live in, it weakens you; it makes you lazy, stupid, and useless. This is what modern civilization is doing to its children today.

Children are now so marginalized, commercialized, sentimentalized, alienated, ignored and patronized that you get a generation gap: a complete cultural split inside what once used to be the close-knit social unit of the insular family. In essence: the crime of all tool-based societies is that what people value most humanly is what they neglect most. The issue of child raising is rarely if ever collectively discussed. And even then it is trapped inside the context of only one family... one culture... one community. Because it is such a sensitive issue it is almost never brought up. So each family's child-rearing practices remain cloaked in secrecy.

All secrecy originates from tool-use, one-sided separation, insulation. This should be obvious without needing to use specific examples. Every part of human existence that is separated and not connected is out-of-balance. Every part of human existence, which is secret, is out-of-balance. The spiritual sickness of all shame-guilt-taboo-repression-suppression-denial is rooted in secrecy. Moreover, the realm of secrecy, the realm of spiritual sickness, the realm of all human terror-agony-pain-misery-fear-hate-rage is in the unexplored human subconscious.

All subconscious urges are self-healing dynamics: but only if they are revealed fully, traced fully, allowed to unfold fully... so each person can explore their subconscious to its roots. But if these blind urges are deflected, reflected, subverted, sabotaged, distorted, they end up just changing shape and surfacing as something else: as endless recurrent urges, needs, symptoms, addictions, fears, obsessions. The exploration of the self is necessary for self-understanding. But in order to do it properly, in order to do it fully; you need to sensitize your awareness as much as possible. You need to explore things to their root. And for that you need a sense of courage, honesty, love, and pure wonder. There is no way around it. Each person has the exploration of their own subconscious as the ultimate challenge of their existence. Sadly: most people do not realize that this is an unavoidable and crucial part of growing up. The unexplored Inner Universe of the human psyche resides in the subconscious. To not fully explore it is to not fully live your own life.

Child Rearing and Health

The creative reflectivity of the human psyche is its own worst enemy when it comes to self-understanding. On the surface of a person's awareness can be a huge distracting, segmented, conflicting body of thought and emotion... which all seem to be separate.

But if you explore yourself more deeply, you will find that at the root of it all, in the realm of your instinct and subconscious awareness; there are only a few basic emotions, which we manipulate and reflect endlessly. To deal with any root problems of psychobiologic health you must wade through all of the superficial aspects to even be able to identify what your root issues are. It is only then, that any psychobiologic healing is possible.

This is why I only list the basic root aspects of awareness. How each person uses them is different. Self-understanding is a process of simplification. All Inner healing follows this universal dynamic.

Depending on what kind of trauma, how much of it, each person's defense system will handle it differently. For instance, children that suffer from lack of stimulation or sensory deprivation may slowly become more numb, more de-sensitized. Their pain may be stored in specific areas or levels: from the cellular level, to the neural-mental level, to the emotional-physical-social-sexual level, or a combination of different various aspects. Depending on how much an infant-child is cared for, touched-hugged, how much it is allowed to explore, how much freedom, support, safety is given, what it is exposed to, how much stimulation it is exposed to, what kind of environment it is exposed to; determines what level of health it reaches. Human psychobiologic health will never be fully understood until it has a universal standard.

For instance: infants and children were never genetically designed to be isolated all night away from their parents in a separate room. Humans are genetically designed to sleep together, touching each other all night. The mere fact that billions of humans suffer from this tactile deprivation starting from as early as two weeks after birth is merely one example of the kind of child-abuse humans suffer from due to their existence inside civilization. What this does is desensitize and numb people to their own bodies and their own skin: it desensitizes their sense of touch so they are not even aware that they are touch-starved. This in turn, creates societies-cultures in which any show of affection or touching is strictly limited, derided, and frowned upon. No amount of affection or love during the day can replace an 8-hour hug at night... Unless during the day, you hug each other for 8 hours nonstop.

One indicator of severe early trauma, or sexual abuse, is the symptom of bedwetting. Why? Because once a child goes to sleep: the subconscious-unconscious comes to the surface. Unconscious urination is merely an instinctive pain-release that the body uses as one of its reflexive defenses for regulating its own pain-level. Later on, this pain regulation is taken over consciously by any number of pain-numbing habits: from overeating, to drugs, to acting out, to masturbation, to self-suppression: as instinctive control fades and conscious control increases. Since bedwetting is not understood: it is laughed at and derided because it apparently shows that the person is not capable of consciously controlling his or her own instinctive behavior. When rather, it is their instincts that are healthy, and the consciousness of others that is sick. As a result: the tendency to laugh at and denigrate whatever people do not understand creates an even greater trauma of shame. This ensures that any root-problems of traumatized and sexually abused children are never openly faced or discussed. That makes as much sense as a person with a broken arm being too ashamed to go to a hospital: so they end up walking around crippled for the rest of their lives. It is also an indicator of how little our society values the instinctive wisdom of our own bodies and our own emotional well-being.

As one of civilization's most effective ways of preserving culture-tradition-mores: shame is also one of the most effective ways to preserve unexperienced pain-trauma.

As long as people can be shamed into conforming to what society wishes, their own self-suppression replaces any need for physical coercion. It is the cheapest form of oppression known: when people take on the job of oppressing themselves instead of having society do it.

Unhealthy shame is an integral part of the tool-dynamic. All cultural attitudes and values designed to produce conformity use unhealthy cultural shame as merely another way to make humans into better tools. Once you take any cultural attitude or value for granted, it becomes a programmed, reflected, unconscious, learned response. Cultural shame is a result of reflective fear-pain that is reflected back as a frozen pattern inside our subconscious, it cannot be processed-digested-experienced-put into perspective-understood-balanced. So it stays trapped, frozen. It accumulates. All cultural shame or taboo, all cultural mores and morals are designed to ensure both private and public conformity. The question of whether these values, mores, taboos, whether any cultural shame is healthy or sick is never examined; because the culture itself is worshipped, glorified and sanctified above all individual concerns.

Questions of Child-rearing

To this date, no model of genetic-experiential (psycho-biologic) human child rearing has ever been studied or developed: instead we have only have cultural models. The civilized format for raising children is basically unintelligent if only for one reason:

There is no comparison, or evaluation, or perspective in how humans raise their children.

How many restaurants do people go to; and compare them to decide which one they like better? How many songs do people listen to; before finding out which ones they like best? How many comparisons of dead things are involved in civilized existence? How many comparisons are involved in trying to decide how you should raise your children? How much comparative exploration is involved in the art of child-rearing? How much comparison is involved in deciding how you should live? If you do not realize and admit the existence of your own limited normality, and try to go beyond it, you will never become able to grow-learn-expand your awareness, your life-style, habits... humanly: except mechanically.

How should humans live? How should humans raise their young? What are the experiences needed for intelligent comparison? What are the comparisons needed to gain a proper perspective? How do we evaluate these comparisons? How many perspectives do we need for a contextual understanding of the issues? How much do we merely copy and how much do we actually learn? What do we question and what do we take for granted?

In the final analysis: the commitments and connections between people are forever. Children are forever. There is no excuse for avoiding this responsibility. No human connection is ever actually lost. But by creating break-ups, divorces, feuds, divisions, strife, conflict: humans merely create the need to heal these wounds. What is the point of creating separations when you will only be forced to heal them painfully later on? When that healing will only make you undergo the needless suffering which you needlessly created? That is the blindness of human arrogance: we not only think we can do this one-sided splitting forever, but that we can get away with it. No individual, family or community has the right to split-up: just because they can do it. That is as rational as saying that we have the right to explode all of our nuclear bombs: simply because we can do it.

This does not mean that anyone should stay in an unhealthy relationship. What it means is that no human relationship is unsalvageable, that is... if everyone involved, honestly works at it. It means that the only reason for the break-up of relationships are because of people being too lazy, cowardly, fearful, and dishonest with themselves and each other to face their own problems... face their own fears-issues.

Relationships only survive if those involved put enough courage, honesty, love, energy, time, and effort into it. And there is no excuse not to do so. There is no human relationship, which cannot be saved if the parties involved work at that relationship using the basic human tools of Love, Courage, Honesty, and the Sense of Pure Wonder.

Imbalanced Awareness and Pain

The question is: which experiences do we actually integrate and which ones do we not integrate? In every case where humans do not integrate experience; they do not learn from that experience. They do not change-evolve-grow. When the two aspects of inner and outer wonder are not developed, not connected, not integrated, not balanced, when they both stop functioning altogether, then the process of expanding human awareness becomes totally frozen. It is precisely the frozen aspect of human non-experienced experience that causes humans to repeat over and over, the same imbalanced, destructive mistakes, evils, habits, and corrupt practices. It is this frozen aspect of human awareness which perpetuates all human suffering, misery, hate, ego, greed, fear, separateness, arrogance, blindness, dehumanization, insularity, numbness, non-awareness. They are all the same thing. They are all merely examples of imbalanced, frozen, abstractive human life-energy. They are examples of energy that has not balanced and integrated its own Triality of energy-experience-evolution. Which is ultimately expressed in different kinds of normality and reality.

All psychobiologic pain-trauma is unevolved-undigested experience. All unexperienced experience is frozen pain. All over-accumulated, frozen pain produces fear. The one-sided evolution of imbalanced splitting, the one-sided separation of the tool produced the one-sided awareness of humans as supposedly separate beings. Fear-pain-separation is a universal human dynamic that must be consciously understood if we are ever to have a chance of healing ourselves.

To only function mechanically, to only be aware on a mechanical level, to have one's awareness focused only upon one thing at a time and block out all other things, to only be aware distractively-segmentally, so that we do not integrate all these segments into an understandable whole, so that we have no perspective on our own existence as a whole, so that we do not digest and experience all of our awareness: is not how we were designed to function-live humanly. The part of our awareness that only pertains to tool-use is what sets us apart from all other animals. We call it selective awareness. I call it selective blindness. Because anything you take for granted or are unaware of, you become a victim of.

Due to the intrinsic creativity of human abstraction: we perceive things as being unconnected, separate, unique, different from each other. We are slightly evolved animals with our specific set of senses, which can never fully perceive, realize, be aware-of, or understand the infinite subtle complexities of the energies around us and inside us, or their infinite interconnectivity. We can only faintly intuit the scope of that infinity due to our own reflective expanding sense of pure wonder. Our sense of wonder is only a faint-dim reflection of the actual infinity we are a part-of and exist-in. It is our reflectivity that makes us what we are. It is also the source of all our virtues and vices. It is the imbalance of our reflective awareness that is the root of our problems. All human trauma, un-experienced experience, blocked memories, denial, lying, silence, fear, secrecy, non-awareness, normality, ego, insularity, numbness, non-connectiveness, dehumanization, is all the same thing: temporarily frozen-imbalanced, reflective-abstractive human life-energy. The terms: evil, corruption, imbalance, bad: can be seen as all meaning the same thing.

One problem with most human psychobiologic trauma is that it can mostly only be reached through the unaware subconscious. It is only when people are in a loving- nurturing environment that they can feel safe enough to explore the deepest recesses of their own vulnerability, their own damaged inner selves. If this condition of living in a caring community does not exist, then they are just plain out of luck. The trouble is that in a tool-based society this almost never happens. All tool cultures, all tool societies, are not sensitized enough to be concerned about, handle, or deal with integrated human issues. They are only designed to handle segments, segmented issues, tool functions.

The entire human race is in a state of denial as to how the human body-brain actually works. Every scientific and medical establishment is in a state of denial as to the root cause of human illness. I do not intend on covering the entire spectrum of maladies here, but the basic fundamental dynamic of human illness can be generally stated. One symptom I can use: and that is the symptom of addiction. By that, I mean literally addiction to anything period: be it heroin, sugar, salt, tobacco, alcohol, coffee, food, meat, ego gratification, or power. The fundamental cause of these symptoms is psychobiologic pain.

The term: Addictive personality, is a mistaken concept and misnomer of semantics. If a president of a firm in one short day can get his power-fix by ordering people around, and drink expensive Scotch Whiskey to get his alcohol-fix, and criticize his maid servant for not making his eggs on time to get his ego-fix, and yell at his driver for not being in the right lane because he is in a bad mood, so his underlings are treated like shit because he is in a lousy mood... his selfish needs are more important than anyone else's...then that president is not regarded as having an addictive personality. As a matter of fact as far as civilization is concerned: there is nothing wrong with him at all; he's considered to be normal.

But a homeless bum in a back alley, drinking booze until he is unconscious because society does not let him have any other chemical fix to ease his pain and boredom and misery with: is considered to have an addictive personality.

If you switched the two, you would find that once the bum worked half of his life; as hard as he could to become a president of a firm, he would act the same way any president of a firm acts. And if that president was not lucky enough to be hired by an up-and-coming firm; and went broke, and became homeless and became depressed and hopeless because he could not hold a job... you would find that he would act the same as any other homeless bum would act. In fact, the president of that firm is more of an addict than the homeless bum is.

All civilized humans have addictive habits and practice addictions of all kinds. Except: some addictions are socially tolerated or approved and some are not, and some are merely regarded as diseases, or dysfunctions, or... as sacred traditions, or sacred customs, or as normal behavior, or abnormal behavior, or any label that people choose to put on them... depending on their own reality... their own normality... their own culture... their own religion... etc, etc, etc.... Each case of addiction is unique depending upon what kind of pain it is, and how much of it you have. All addictions are merely symptoms of psychobiologic pain.

All pain is an indication of imbalance. Any imbalanced excess or lacking of the human psyche is ultimately evidenced as psychobiologic pain. For instance: if a person experiences the trauma of being a helpless victim as a child, they may develop a need for power or control as an adult. If a child does not get enough attention they may grow up to constantly crave it. If a child is smothered by overprotective parents, they may develop an aversion to any kind of closeness. Whatever kind of pain that is, is also unique for each person. From the pain and emptiness of never being loved or hugged, to the pain and horror of being raped or beaten. The symptom of addiction is merely each person's way of finding a way to relieve that pain: numb it, counterbalance it, eject it, project it, reflect it, escape it, not feel it, not face it. It may seek to fill a painful void, or eject a painful excess. The way each person's defense systems handle these imbalances are unique, complex, and creative. If your body-brain does not hold any un-experienced pain, it has no need to continually fight that pain, suppress it, deny it, or numb it, by some form of addiction, or constantly project it, reflect it or re-live it. Whatever your defense system is: that defense system is designed to handle your psychobiologic pain... whether that painful experience has been separated, split-off from your integrated self, and re-channeled into, or locked up on a cellular level, in muscle tension, on an emotional level, a sexual level, a mental level, a physical level, or a chemical level. How successful or unsuccessful your defense system is, will determine how successfully or unsuccessfully you can function in a tool-based society without dealing with these root issues. If your psychobiologic pain is too great for your natural defenses to handle: then the secondary defense strategy of addiction comes into play. But addiction comes in all forms. Suppression of pain comes in all forms. You might be addicted merely to dulled sensations, which come from shallow breathing, and are incapable of doing any exercise merely because deeper breathing also unlocks deeper levels of pain in your body. Or you might merely be too averse to any kind of physical activity because when you were little, any physical activity was frowned on, or negatively rewarded.

Since our tool-based cultures place the priority of mechanical functioning above all else: anybody who cannot do so, is seen as being useless. As a result: those of us who are most damaged, most crippled, most in need of help, are precisely those who are abandoned, rejected, devalued, ignored, and dehumanized the most. The reason for this is because in human society: tool-values dominate over human-values. Functioning mechanically takes precedence over functioning humanly. Also, it is because humans do not understand how addiction works; they do not understand the universality of addiction. All people are addicted to things in one way or another. To separate people by the kind and degree of their addiction is ridiculous.

All addictions; are unhealthy, destructive, debilitating, insane, and insane. The trouble is that humans are very careful in expediently selecting which addictions to demonize, and which ones to normalize. Recently... along with the public demonization of all smoking, there has been a counter-balancing increase of drinking coffee. Places like Starbucks barely bother to serve anything else except coffee. A few paltry muffins or cakes are displayed... or a few sandwiches. No full-size meals, no selection, no variety of anything else except a huge list of expensive coffee. Is there any public outcry from people who hate coffee and cannot drink it because it screws them up so badly they cannot sleep at night? No: because the majority of Americans are caffeine addicts. The only unfortunate thing that happened to tobacco was that so many people quit for their own personal reasons, that the consumption of tobacco products became a minority market instead of a majority market. As long as any addicting substance enjoys a majority market: it is usually not demonized. Alcohol was once demonized in America during Prohibition... and it was a resounding failure. What's more: it increased the criminal elements in society, and magnified the gangsters of Prohibition to an admired status-level that is still in existence today. Nobody is trying to shut down liquor stores or coffee houses. Yet, they are straightforward drug outlets for addictive substances.

But then again... so are gas stations, so are electrical power plants. If there was any unbiased study done on the human addiction to raw power... oil. Raw wealth... money. Raw attention... status, fame, stardom. Raw data... all Science, all information industries, all media... It would have no choice but to conclude that literally every civilized activity, practice, norm, habit, custom, and culture is destructively addictive.

In order to heal addiction, you must discover the reasons for that addiction. You must trace the root of its origin; understand the dynamic of how and why it came about, how and why it works. Once you can access the root to of its origin-trauma, you must re-experience that pain fully, safely, and digest it. There is no difference in the causality of how and why the Universe emerged, how and why Life developed, or how and why human dysfunction and addiction develops. They all have understandable, traceable causal roots, and can be understood: provided we are willing to seek them out. Until the human race pulls its collective head out of the sand: all forms of therapy and healing will continue to be ineffective. All illness stems from the historical causality of psychobiologic pain. We as a species; must finally admit that this pain exists inside each of us, instead of trying to function successfully like machines by going around drugged by chemicals, by countless, endless distractions... in a continual state of busyness, numbness, and denial.

The problem is; that we humans no longer evolve genetically. We evolve only experientially. In short: how we raise our children is based upon abstraction; not upon actuality, upon learning, not instinct. Human experiential life-energy does not flow genetically as a form of dynamically balanced Splitness: it only accumulates. We ignore the 4 billion year-old instinctual model stored in our DNA. We only value the learned experiences of our reflective awareness. So: what happens when humans don't experience their trauma-pain? Where do these experiences of trauma go? The answer is that they bounce back; they get locked up inside each individual, who in turn, passes that trauma on to the next generation. Each new generation unwittingly absorbs that trauma; each new generation becomes desensitized, de-humanized in an infinite number of levels-ways-degrees. The result is the accumulation-preservation-perpetuation of human misery-pain-trauma on all levels, and in all ways.

The entire span of recorded human history is a history of this endless repetitive cycle. Among other things: human history is a qualitative and quantitative accumulation of unexperienced pain and trauma. What was a traumatized child, became a traumatized-defended adult. What were 1,000 became 10,000. 100,000 became 1,000,000. 100,000 became 1,000,000. Until there are now 6,000,000,000 traumatized-defended humans on this planet. The dynamic of human defense systems is the same dynamic as tool-use: separation-segmentation-accumulation-preservation-perpetuation. The unexperienced trauma splitting into unfelt aspects-areas of a person's psyche ... accumulating more unfelt experiences as it grows, then passing it on to the next generation in the form of culture-tradition-myth-religion-psychosis-neuroses-child abuse. In order for this accumulation to be sustainable it must keep on splitting, separating, accumulating. That is exactly what tools do. The dynamics of human defense systems mirror the dynamics of tool-use.

The Preservation of Imbalance

By becoming removed from our own experiences we do not have to feel them: if the act of birth is numbed by drugs: then both the mother and the infant will not fully feel and experience the act of birth. By blocking out the 1st 2 years of our life we do not have to feel the trauma and pain of being and what was done to us when we were too helpless to defend ourselves. By increasing the number of separations, by distancing ourselves form our actions, humans no longer have to deal with the consequences of their actions. Desensitization is merely a form of separation. Consumers can be comfortably numb to all the consequences of buying a certain product because the genesis of a consumer product as a process has been split up in so many ways, that consumers are completely ignorant of the process as a whole and the consequences of their own actions. The life of every individual in any civilized society is made up of countless unconnected, segmented, unexamined, causal processes.

And because human existence is infinitely abstractively creative: humans do not see any connections between the different aspects of their society. The history of human fear has never been fully written, the history of human trauma has never been fully written: because neither has been fully experienced. Numbed non-awareness does not have a history of itself. Whatever you fear, you will not look at, or focus-on, or talk about, or admit, or face, or examine, or explore. And the root of all human fear-pain-secrecy is the subconscious. Whatever part-of our awareness is unexplored-undeveloped, ultimately resides inside our subconscious. It is this inner unknown which humans refuse to explore.

The history of human trauma, the history of each traumatized-damaged life is also preserved culturally. Once the norm of a brutalized human existence consists of being beaten as a child, or being sexually abused: then the culture transforms it into a tradition, a ritual... a custom of the adolescent girl's clitoris being cut off, or the infant boy's foreskin being cut off. Until you get not only a brutalized individual normality; but also a collective, cultural normality that preserves and perpetuates all kinds of brutality and dehumanization as a normal way of raising a child.

You can see the causal dynamic of human experience throughout history not only in the linear path of each individual's past, but also in the form of mass culture. Especially when people are forced to come to grips with some previously non-experienced part of their cultural past. Take Germany and its flawed attempt to bury its recent past. Now German children have computers, and are discovering that they have been lied to. Now, they are finding out that the entire period of Hitler's regime has been mostly whitewashed and deleted from their history books. Now: enlightened Germans are forced to re-experience a painful part of their cultural past which was cut out from their past, a past their elders are in denial of. So: 50 years after this period in their history, they are finding out that unless they face it, and digest it; it will never go away. It remains trapped as a damaged form of cultural guilt-shame-pain, as an unexperienced experience: as a form of non-awareness. Whether individually or collectively: no unexperienced experience ever goes away: they accumulate and are preserved.

Taking your own culture for granted means that you will never be able to understand it in any greater context or perspective. To understand your own culture you must experience it from more than one perspective: and with a sense of wonder. To understand the past, you must experience it and digest it. Otherwise, you will merely repeat it blindly by taking the condition of that past for granted... not questioning it... and ultimately refusing to change it. The legacy of the unexperienced-undigested past can be seen all around the globe: whether it is the legacy of second-class citizenship and lack of self-esteem due to the history of slavery that still haunts African-Americans, or the legacy of racism which still permeates white American society, or the legacy of a stratified caste society that still grips India, or the legacy of elder worship in countless cultures that makes any kind of cultural change painfully slow and difficult. As long as human culture is worshipped, sanctified, and mindlessly preserved and perpetuated: that frozen cultural experience will not significantly change, grow, or heal.

Whether collectively or individually: the lesson is not only that Energy cannot be destroyed: but also, that Experience cannot be destroyed. Any part of your history which is not experienced, understood and fully digested: be it cultural or personal; is preserved and accumulates... in your subconscious, in your culture, in your customs, beliefs, values, ideas, norms. The dynamic of human learning works by accumulation. The dynamic of the human psyche works by accumulation. The dynamic of human psychobiologic defenses work by accumulation. The dynamics of all culture works by accumulation. Unless it is digested, recycled, rebalanced: it rots, it becomes a vicious cycle, and it becomes imbalanced.

The imbalanced split of human separateness, which produced human self-awareness, also produced reflective fear-trauma, as a condition of human existence. This condition was-and-is stored and accumulated consciously-subconsciously-genetically-cellularly-culturally-emotionally-physically-mentally-sexually-socially, in an infinite number of creative unique ways in a causally connected chain of accumulating factors in our subconscious. What is stored, preserved, accumulated, kept secret, on all of these levels is psychobiologic pain. What is psychobiologic pain? All a person has to do is ask themselves: what in their lives they do to avoid, deflect, or suppress any unpleasant or painful feelings or thoughts. And they will find a host of things: from being numbed and drugged by food, or being numbed and distracted by the media, by busyness, work, chatter, socializing, drugs, etc. Whether all of this exists on a conscious level, a subconscious level, or it is merely a part of their upbringing, society, culture, environment, or normality: it makes no difference. The problem of identifying and accurately noting just what pain exists within each person's psyche and body, and how we deal with it, can only be practically dealt with by using the basic tools of human understanding:

Experiences
Comparison
Evaluation
Perspective } Equals contextual understanding.

It is by this process we can change, expand our awareness: and develop a sense of wonder. Through the everyday practice and use of the only truly human qualities we all possess: Courage, Honesty and Love.

This general description is by no means a formula. It only describes in a vague way, how people can actually heal themselves. And none of this can happen without people helping each other. None of this can happen without increased intimacy, closeness, trust, and respect. None of this can happen without sharing and cooperation. But the root base from which all humane awareness stems from is the sense of Pure Wonder.

These are the basic elements of the process of healing. They are also the basic elements of the process of learning and understanding. They can never be codified into any narrow pattern or formula. They are universal: and go beyond any explanation or system of human teaching or wisdom. This description is a completely open-ended approach, which has no rules or set pattern to it. The Stone Age teachings of Taoism attempted to explain these basic, simple principles. But today, those teachings are abysmally out-of-date, and horribly inept at dealing with modern reality. Taoism never had the benefit of Science, or 10,000 years of hindsight to work with. You cannot graft Stone Age cultural ideas and values directly onto our modern culture and expect it to be applicable or useable for everybody.

The Inner and Outer Awareness of humans are meant to balance by interacting constantly with each other. The increased dynamic balance results in increased, expanding-sensitized awareness, which opens up the human subconscious. The more we can access our subconscious, the more consciously aware we become. But that means that our subconscious must be dynamically balanced, and that means it's imprinted tape must be overhauled, corrected, re-connected, re-experienced, re-designed: so that its energy flow is not subverted into the wrong places or channels. So the experience of hurt does not channel itself into hate, or fear, or guilt, or envy. So the experience of pain is not split off and frozen into muscle tension, high blood pressure, weakening the inner organs or causing chemical-biological imbalances, or lowering the immune system and making a person prone to catching every known ailment from a cold to cancer. Re-experiencing unexperienced experiences is how the subconscious re-wires itself properly. It then can experience everything directly: not abstractedly, not in symbols, and not through deflected denials and suppressions.

Now... we can see how the tool-dynamic of imbalanced separation permeates and affects human existence as a condition, as a condition that permeates every second of your life, every part of your body, every aspect of your awareness. Everything that is not fully experienced eventually must be experienced... if not by one generation, then by the next, or the next. "The sins of the father shall be visited upon the son." That Biblical truth merely reflects how in all cultures, each new generation is loaded with all the responsibilities, guilt, and pain of their parent's generation and taught to accept in resignation this fundamental unfairness, this fundamental imbalanced accumulation of unfelt, unfaced, undealt-with pain and experience.

Memory and Wisdom

The reason humans have blueprints, or memories, is because of how we evolved. Our brain is not completely integrated with our bodies. If it was: each experience would be integrated into the brain and the body and become a genetic memory: not a mental memory separated from the body. If a person completely integrated an experience: mentally, physically and emotionally: (by existing in a state of pure wonder) they would have no need to remember it as a separate memory. Instead, it would become an integrated part-of their knowledge-awareness, which they could intuitively use whenever they need or want. But inside civilization so much experience is meaningless-the same-duplicated: non-edifying, worthless: that there is literally nothing to digest. Put a man on an assembly line and he learns nothing: he only repeats what he already knows. Give a person a routine and they merely repeat what they already know. When anything meaningful happens, it stands out because most civilized experiences are not a continual learning process. The more a person functions like a tool (mechanically), the more he repeats-duplicates the same experience: the less he learns. You may become slightly mechanically creative: learn certain specialized-limited mechanical or physical skills. However... in living like this, you will not learn any human skills at all. You will not learn how to be humanly creative. What we call memory is mostly unconnected segments of experience. Instinctually integrated experience does not exist in this form. One difference between us and other animals is that our integration of experience is not balanced, processed, and integrated genetically.

Our memory was never designed, or meant to accumulate into piles of useless unconnected-undigested experiences. Human experience-memory was designed to be digested and integrated and absorbed directly and intensely. It was meant to be compressed and integrated into the shortest, smallest sequence possible. This intense compression is called wisdom. This is why all wise men are feared: not for their wisdom but for their intensity. It is the instinctive fear weak energy possesses of energy which is stronger, healthier and more intensely powerful than it is.

The only practical use of the accumulated-segmented-unconnected complexity of what we call facts or knowledge: is in tool-use. Factual knowledge is a product of unconnected human experience. Intuitive knowledge or wisdom is a product of digested-connected experiences. Tool logic is purely linear. It follows only one linear path-possibility. Human logic is multi-faceted, multi-linear. And through the integration of many experiences, it can reach insights unattainable by any single-linear form of tool-logic. In order for a human awareness to be dynamically balanced within its Inner Universe: intuitive knowledge must override and control segmented-factual knowledge instead of the other way around.

To put it another way: if you can clarify your own subconscious, and can access it consciously; this means that your observer-awareness has shifted from the fore-brain to the middle-brain and exists balanced in a state of Pure Wonder, or a purely spontaneous being; between your instinctive and conscious awareness. By then being able to draw on the duality of both aspects of your awareness: instinctive and conscious experience-knowledge, that balanced-compressed-intuitive knowledge is what most people call wisdom. All wisdom is merely a simplified form of understanding. Without wisdom overriding our segmented knowledge, our pyramidal focus; we cannot behave, think, or feel rationally or sanely. Being completely spontaneous means thinking, feeling, and acting simultaneously in a balanced, integrated fashion; when a person exists in a state of Pure Wonder, then they are capable of living spontaneously... which actually means that they are not living consciously or instinctively, but subconsciously: while getting feedback from both their conscious and instinctive sides. It is in this state that people are most creative, most fun, most funny, most happy, most loving, most empathetic, most insightful, most dynamically balanced.

Encased inside its own reflective separate awareness; the human animal has never managed to develop any larger contextual perspective or understanding of the abstract reality it swims in called civilization. It is not aware of its own type of awareness. Just like a fish swimming in its own water, in its own normality is not aware that it is swimming in something called water: our perceptions are filtered through the reflective medium of our tool-brain: distorting the outer actuality of the Universe into a crude symbolical representation called reality. Just as all the perceptions of a fish are filtered through water, our perceptions of reality are filtered through the medium of our own reflective brains.

The human animal is the only animal that laughs and cries. That is because we are the only animal whose range of emotion includes the entire spectrum of Energy on the Earth.

What makes a human humane is the sensitivity of its emotions and the sensitivity of its thought. This sensitivity comes from sensitivity of its sensitive skin. The ability to feel through our skin is what makes us human. Animals that have fur do not have this ability. The invention and use of tools has desensitized us and dehumanized us and made us more inhuman and less human. This is why the invention of civilization is evil and dehumanizing. This is why civilization must be totally destroyed.

If you look at civilized people today, you will find that nobody cries anymore because they have been so desensitized, they do not feel any pain or sadness. They have been so insulated from all living creatures and all Life-Energy, they are emotionally dead, and intellectually dead; they do not have any Sense of Pure Wonder, they do not have any Love in their hearts. If you look at the laughter of civilized people today, you will see that their laughter is insane; they only laugh at things that are insane. Their laughter is not the laughter of Health, Happiness and Fun: it is the laughter of sickness, and irrational craziness their laughter is sick. This is only a symptom of how sick civilization is. Civilization cannot be healed or fixed because its structure is intrinsically evil and wrong. We are not designed to live inside a civilized artificial womb which insulates us from the Living Earth. As long as human live inside this artificial structure, they will remain unhappy and unfulfilled. The designed purpose of humans is to make Friends with all Living Creatures by Playing with them and making Friends with them and having Fun with them in a state of Pure Wonder and Happiness. There is no other purpose. Civilization has reversed this: that is why it must be destroyed.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Modern Humans before Civilization

Originally: humans lived not as tribes but in small groups or bands of roughly 12-24-36 people.

This is how large our communities were designed to be.

What is a community, or a band?

It is a social structure which is supposed to ensure the proper upbringing of its members.

How?

By never allowing absolute separation, absolute power, or absolute privacy to exist within its makeup.

People may be alone, but never walled off into secrecy: which today we call privacy. Individuals are free to go anywhere, do anything: they are free to choose to be alone as much as they want to. But the community-band does not allow the poison of absolute privacy as a social dynamic between its members inside the group.

This means that no parent is free to arbitrarily raise their own children without supervision by the rest of the community. No family is allowed to run its own affairs without the supervision of the community it lives in.

One crucial reason for this is... to make sure that no infant or child is abused or harmed by anybody.

By all of the community living within earshot of each other: then the band will be alerted to any abuse. If a child or infant is left neglected, its wails will alert the community. If it is beaten or yelled at: the community will hear it and respond.

The major reason for the social closeness of a community: is to prevent child abuse.

This ensures the healthiest possible survival of the group as a whole.

The structural purpose of communal closeness was destroyed by the creation of settlements. It was destroyed by the creation of walls, by the creation of separate dwellings. It was destroyed by the concept of absolute privacy.

The concept of absolute privacy comes from the concept of absolute separation. It comes from the dynamic of using tools. From the dynamic of separating something absolutely with a knife.

The use of tools, the effect of tools... are, and were traumatic.

Separating, cutting: creating separations. Creates pain. This creates trauma.

Humans created pain-fear-trauma by using tools that created pain in other living things.

Our social evolution mirrors our tool evolution.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Originally our hominid ancestors used the same basic tool-kit. But once we started to specialize... Once we started specializing our tools: we started having different strategies on how to survive. We started finding new and different words to describe how to use and name these different tools. We started finding new words for the new things they got our tools from, and what we used their tools on...

The increasing specialization of tools created different languages, cultures, normality's, and realities. We started finding different things that were useful, important... different ways of looking at things, developing different lifestyles. This created the separation of bands, and tribes.... into specialized, autonomous, independent, isolated, cut-off units... that were absolutely separated from each other.

The tool dynamic of one-sided splitting: also created the dynamic of social segmentation. Any greater need for socializing, or cooperation between other bands or tribes disappeared. Each band was self-sufficient. None of them needed each other.

The origins of human social segmentation and child abuse goes back to before our emergence as a species... it goes back to our hominid ancestors. Exactly how it began, or when it began, is unknown. However: the seed of our faulty child-rearing practices originates ultimately, from the basic imbalance of tool-use as a one-sided process of separation.

All human trauma is merely unintegrated experience split-off from the human psyche. Cut off as painfully and absolutely as a knife cuts off your finger.

All human denial comes from some kind of one-sided separation-imbalance-trauma.

Human denial is simply a refusal to connect....

All Human denial is merely separated experiences left unconnected... which is nothing more than one-sided splitting... which is the basic dynamic of tool-use.

Its basic effect on a human is; the accumulation of unfelt pain.

One result of accumulation was the concentration of all power-wealth, status, and knowledge at the top. Until the social structure mirrored, and matched, and reflected a pyramidal pile-up.

As nomads, we revered and worshipped everything outside of us, meaning our whole environment: the Natural World. Why? Because the forces of Nature were more powerful than the forces of mankind. When mankind became more powerful than the forces of Nature: we stopped worshipping the natural world and began worshipping human gods.

Once we settled down and created an artificial environment called civilization; everything we revered and worshipped that was outside of us... was inside our artificial environment.

We began worshipping everything that piled up... everything that was an accumulation.

We began worshipping piles of things. We began worshipping pyramidal.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

The trouble with this is: If the only reason you can find to get together; is to worship something pyramidally: then you have lost all focus and perspective on yourself and your group as a whole. You have lost all perspective on of your own humanity and the humanity of others. People should not need this kind of excuse in order to form a community. Once the only rationale of even having a community became preserved into a pyramidalized structure, it became corrupted. Civilization became so pyramidally structured and corrupted: that no smaller community which is not pyramidally centralized can survive within it.

The Dynamics of the Transition

For at least 100,000 years, we lived as nomadic foragers leaving behind little or no trace of our existence simply because we did not accumulate material things.

As a result of this... there are almost no fossil records of the first modern humans, there is no way of knowing how the earliest humans lived. Or where they came from... or where they went.

The only general conclusion anthropologists can make; is that around 120,000 years ago... Modern Humans came out of Africa, and spread out all over the Earth...

However... one thing we do know. Most of our modern language roots, originate from expanding migrations of different tribes; that came out of Central Asia around 25 to 35 thousand years ago.

Human population grew at a slower rate before the creation of settlements. As nomadic foragers, their lifestyle required a far larger land area to sustain themselves. In order to find a sustainable environment for their way of life, each new group of hunter-gatherers were forced to travel farther afield to find new territory. Anthropologists describe this earlier form of natural, organic expansion as buds or offshoots. This is one reason why early pre-historic modern humans kept on spreading out across the world... and the sparseness of their numbers.

As we spread out: our population density rose all over this planet because we used tools better. It took at least 50-100 thousand years of increasing population density before it reached a critical mass for settled civilizations to be formed... There were so many bands traveling everywhere, they kept on bumping into each other. It became harder to keep on moving peacefully, without robbing and raiding each other. Simply because more opportunities to do so kept on coming up. It took millions of years for our ancestors to develop their use of tools to the level of sophistication needed for the creation of civilization.

For that to happen, at least three things were required.

The tools themselves had to be sufficiently evolved.

The species using these tools had to be capable of evolving them further.

And the right conditions had to exist for the next series of changes to happen.

At the end of the last Ice Age: these three conditions finally coincided.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Modern humans had finally evolved their tools beyond the Achaean tool kit, which had been used for millions of years. They were the only walking apes that were apt enough to evolve these new tools further.

Also... There was a huge increase of new wetlands where all three kinds of ecosystems-organisms meet: Life is a Dynamic Triality of Gases, Liquids and Solids... or as we know it:

Air Land Water

Creating an abundance of Life and a profusion of food.

Which demonstrates yet again, another example of a Dynamic Balance of the Universe becoming more dynamic through increasingly delicate levels of Dynamically Balanced Triality.

Before then: earlier walking apes with earlier tool kits had come out of Africa and lived in wetlands exploding with a profusion of new life after an Ice Age. But they did not have the tools, or the knowledge, or the aptness to innovate and invent new tools that modern humans did. Nor did they overpopulate themselves like we did. Population pressure, and density, and migration patterns were not forcing the least war-like tribes into the fringes of land that nobody else wanted: swamps. Wetlands.

Our ancestors were originally designed to survive in an African ecosystem with intense competition for resources and the seasonal crisis of drought and starvation. With a better tool kit, they could use their tools to adapt to more than one kind of ecosystem. Being able to migrate to other ecosystems put far less strain on their ability to survive. With a better tool-kit: this not only changed their every-day habits, it gave them more free time. And that meant more time to innovate new tools.

Now: change their environment drastically, take away the relative sparseness of food that existed during the last Ice Age, introduce a global warming, and the creation of new wetlands. Give them a situation where they not only didn't have to compete with other large, carnivores for food in these new wetlands, but were faced with a staggering variety and abundance of too much food: and it is not a hard to understand the effect of these new wetlands on nomadic humans.

Why too much?

Because they had never been designed to survive in a situation of continual, unabated overabundance. Their tool-use adaptations had been geared to exploit meagerness-scarcity: never wasting anything. : they had been designed to exist in Africa through recurring annual cycles of scarcity and abundance, in recurring annual crises of drought, starvation, competition, stress, and hardship.

The right species, the right level of tool technology, and the right conditions finally paid off. There is no reason stop using a spear, or a fishing line to invent a weir, or a net in order to catch hundreds of fish if there are only a few fish to be caught. But if a modern human is catching one fish at a time with a spear; in the middle of a teeming school of thousands.... and comes back later to find that school of fish gone: Then the thought of all that food escaping will start gnawing at him. What happens when you are faced with too much food... and all of your genetic and experiential knowledge and wisdom tells you that you better make the best use of any windfall: because in a few short months you may be faced with starvation? You start getting as much food as you can. You start saving it. You start accumulating it.

Again, the dynamic of tool-use is evident: separation-segmentation-accumulation-preservation.

By the time Modern Humans were faced with the problem of too much food; we have been using fire for over one million years. We had already found answers to the problem of preserving food in times of abundance, by smoking-drying-salting-freezing-storing things.

We did this in Africa before we ever left. To this day: African Pygmies in the Kalahari Desert still store edible roots and water underground for future use in the dry season.

Previously: we had been nomadic. Settling down around wetlands allowed us to do things we would never have been able to do before on a large scale. By accumulating more food, we no longer needed to remain as small nomadic bands having to keep on traveling. There was so much food in these areas that we no longer had to travel long distances in order to sustain ourselves year-round. With a relatively permanent campsite: came the ability to begin accumulating things.

Then came a series of gradual changes and transitions. Over time: we lost-abandoned, and forgot our old nomadic lifestyles. The development of a fixed-site existence with an increasing population used up most of the available resources in the areas we lived in.

This forced us into new innovations to exploit our environment better, and in new ways.

As nomadic foragers We had to be constantly on the move in order to live.

In order to eat; we had to move.

In order to survive; we had to keep on the move.

Our living dynamic was based on daily, constant movement-activity-exercise. This is a truth of all Life, of all living things. In order to keep living you must keep moving or you will die. Once you stop moving, then you stop living, you start dying... slowly, incrementally, gradually... Once we Modern Humans settled down and developed sedentary a lifestyle. Once we stopped moving... we started becoming less healthy... we started dying. Once you settle down into a sedentary way of life: then most of a human lifespan becomes a slow death. Then the awareness of death and dying becomes ingrained on the cellular level of each human animal. Then: the fascination with dead things, the fear of dying becomes a universal unconscious component of all settled-sedentary-civilized existence.

What happens to humans with too much food? We get fat and lazy. By settling down and leading more sedentary lives, our percentage of body fat changed. This in turn changed everything. It changed our body chemistry, our birthrate, our psychology, and our culture.

Not being limited by having to carry their infants for two years while constantly traveling and foraging for food: girls could give birth at an earlier age. Their birthrate increased from once every 4-5 years to one every 2-3 years. This doubled the rate of increasing population. We began overpopulating the earth, and have not stopped overpopulating it. Incidentally: the basic human personality is mostly set by around the age of 5.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

By then, their culture had become a culture of ease instead of hardship. The first settled cultures became patriarchal hierarchies: negatively dominated by males. Instead of moving and walking: males sat around the fire, and around council centers. Girls and women were forbidden to assume a sitting posture. Woman had to get on their knees and bow before them in order to be lower than they were. They made the position of sitting an exclusive male privilege. For a young girl: standing became a sin of pride: punishable by death. Males successfully enslaved females into domesticated animals.

However, with the emergence of a more sedentary lifestyle, along with a general reduction in fitness and increase in body fat; a girl's birthing muscles were no longer as fit as before. Gravity was no longer used in squatting or standing... for the birthing position, as a traveling band would naturally do in its daily travel. Instead: girls gave birth lying down, not sitting. A bed became the place for birth. It also became a place of birth-pain. Pain that had never existed. Human babies were born in state of pain.

Giving birth at an earlier age meant a lesser degree of maturity in the mother, a higher level of fear; thus increasing her muscle tension during birth. Not being as fit, not using gravity made it worse: and because of all these interconnected factors: birth became painful. As opposed to a natural, painless birth: birth became a painful traumatic experience: one that would mark every civilized child from then on... Infants no longer came smiling and giggling into the world. They came screaming and wailing... in pain and in fear... They into the Universe with a distorted impression that was indelibly imprinted into their subconscious. Their perception of reality and the world around them was reversed.

By exploiting new food resources with better tools: humans could get more food, and raise more babies, faster. The rate at which human population increased speeded up

All as a dynamic of accumulation and expediency.

If food was so abundant that people didn't have to travel two-three miles each day getting it: naturally, they would not exert themselves unnecessarily. With more food and less outdoor activities they began having more babies more often. This increased the rate of growth of the population. Humans began producing excess population faster.

Offshoot villages or buds spread out faster from the favored areas where food was found to be most abundant. This pushed the increasing population into areas where there was less food. However, by then, their old nomadic culture-lifestyle was already gone. The offshoot villages were culturally frozen... locked into a higher rate of accumulating population.

Why have settled cultures refused to change for thousands of years?

Because they no longer move physically.

They no longer change their artificial living environment.

Their artificial living conditions do not change.

Their artificial environment no longer forces them to change their artificial culture.

Having more babies: they needed more food. Yet they were locked into a settled existence, too lazy to move very far, too fearful of exploring new territory. So they stayed in one place and their population

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

density increased. They were forced to move even when they didn't want to. The areas they moved into were less abundant in food resources:

This forced them to innovate their tools even further in order to survive without traveling-moving... or moving as little as possible. Afraid of encountering hostile tribes... living less active lives: less fit girls lying down to give birth, not letting gravity, and Mother Earth help them give birth, making birth more painful, as the girls giving birth became younger, and more immature, more afraid, sending that fear into the fetus in their womb, giving birth to ever-more fear-filled, squalling, crying babies.

These are some of the factors involved in why we first packed ourselves into denser populated areas; rather than spreading out.

Most of the vicious cycles of civilization evolved out of this basic dynamic: most tool innovation was created simply because people did not want to move. It was easier to use tools: instead of creatively finding food each day in a new area, in a new way, finding new plants, new resources. Rather than continuing to live adaptively as nomads and changing how we lived along with our environment, we stayed in one place, and forced our environment to adapt to us instead...

Thus destructively reversing the Dynamic of our Life-Energy.

We reversed the entire way we functioned in our eco-systems.

Instead of traveling through an ecosystem... we stopped moving, and settled down in an eco system that traveled through where we lived.

We relied upon the moving migrations of animals and birds and fish that move through wetlands for food. We sat on our asses, and let them to come to us. We did not go to them.

Instead of many diverse living things being supported by one Eco-system; they forced the eco-system they were living in to support only one species: us.

All other living species living around us became expendable and unimportant.

Except as resources: to be used exclusively only for our own survival and nobody else's.

Whatever animals or creatures we drove out of the areas we lived in, whatever living things we hunted, or picked, or fished into extinction: did not matter. Because with our new and better tools: we could always find new sources of food and resources to exploit.

Besides, we could always move to a new site after we had destroyed the old ones completely. This is what happened to the Mesopotamian Plain. Twelve thousand years ago, it was one of the Cradles of Civilization. It was one of the most fertile areas on Earth: known far and wide as The Fertile Crescent... known as the Breadbasket of the World.

Today: Mesopotamia or the Middle East as it is called today is a barren desert because twelve thousand years ago in that area is where the agricultural revolution began. This invention of destroying the earth through harming it by 'farming' it... ultimately destroyed the ecosystems of the Mid East so thoroughly that after thousands of years; this area has yet to make an ecological comeback. These first cities also created the Arabian Desert. They and their farms; turned green, lush ecosystems into wastelands. Later, the Roman Wheat crop, the systematic tilling and farming of wheat in North Africa: created the North African Desert.

The Path of Splintress

Chapter Five: Modern Humans: The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

The nomads of Central Asia created the Gobi Desert over 45,000 years earlier by either systematically burning the grasslands, or overgrazing the land, or both. Central Asia was a much easier ecosystem to destroy since it is a high plain... An arid ecosystem is very, very sensitive to the slightest imbalance. All that would have been needed would have been for an animal species living there long enough to permanently destroy the balance between the existing predators and prey animals... is a fire. And humans have been living there for at least 50,000 years. And humans have been using fire for over 2 million years. All the ruins of civilizations even older than the Incas or Egyptians are located in the epicenters of the deserts which they created. This is a stark geographic fact which archeologists and anthropologists ignore and refuse to discuss. Civilizations destroy themselves by destroying the ecosystems they live in and depend on for survival. There are no exceptions to this fact.

The fact is... before modern humans spread out over the planet, there was no such thing as a desert on Earth. The oldest desert in the world is the Namib Desert in Southern Africa: Reverse the name Namib Desert and you get Bi-man... you get: Bye Man. Trees said; 'Bye man'...: Trees sad... Bye man... trees all gone: trees say bye to man...man says bye to trees. Man stands up on two feet and says goodbye to trees forever: never again to live in trees ever again. The trees dying out of loneliness because the ape that lived with them for untold millennia has forsaken them; they had no more reason to go on living. The land becomes a total Desert, reverses its entire Energy from Life into death, logically the name is also reversed. The Land of the Bi-Man became Namibia. A Bi-Man Desert, empty of Life and abandoned by apes. The Namib Desert. The Bi-Man deserts his homeland forever. . Go away said the trees: we don't like you anymore, you burn and kill us. The Namib Desert is between two rivers called: Kuiseb and Usiab reverse their letters and you get: Besiuk... Be See I You Kill. The land of Besiuk saw Man commit his first sin; his first crime... killing another living creature. Baisu means 'Bye...See you!'. ' Be an Eye... See You.' 'Be an 'I'. 'Be an Ego', be separate from the land you live on and destroyed. Kuiseb: Kill-You-I-See-Energy-Bad. Reversed: Bad-Energy-See-I-You-Kill... The letter 'U' is yourself. It is the reversal of perception of the first reflective ape. . An ape whose energy became actively reflective and reversed everything it did, everything it had done including its perception of itself and everything around it... this is the buried story of the Namib desert. Nubia is also a reversal of the bi-man Life energy turned into the Nubian desert; the first bipedal African man becoming a naked negative nude walking ape that finally became black from the sin of turning an African paradise into an area of dead sand. N=Negative U=You B= bad I= ego A= A man...one man, one action, one time... each single walking bipedal ape committing each single crime against Life, one Act At A time, a step at a time. Reverse the letters Kuiseb and you get; Kill You I See Energy Bad. That is how evil and insane the first walking apes were.

Deserts are areas which our ancestors created and then abandoned, deserting them. The just desert for those responsible is to become deserts of the soul; empty of all inner life. No matter how many different ways you analyze or interpret the meanings of these words: they all tell the same story. The Namib Desert on the West coast of Africa, the Olduvai Gorge which is on the east side of Africa: North of the Olduvai Gorge is the Serengeti Plain and North of that are the Rift Valleys. All of these areas were the ancestral homes of the apes we came from. The coast of the Namib-Bi-man Desert is called the Skeleton Coast: populated by ships wrecked by the fogs, treacherous currents, and westerly storms that make this entire coast feared and uninhabited by man. If shipwrecked, there is no hope of survival because the entire coast in uninhabitable desert.. The undead have inhabited that region for at least 55 million years. The result was: all life has disappeared from that shore. No other desert is as totally DEAD as that desert is. It is empty of nearly all life.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Even today the truth of the original ecological abomination of the original bipedal man; of creating death from life, resurfaces and screams out the responsibility and crime of the first apes that created a land of death out of a land of Life. The web site: <http://www.touristlink.com/namibia/namib-desert.html>: has an eery cryptic truth on it: The words say: “Is this your property? Click here to claim this property” The evil of the first clicking man: the bipedal ape that used clicking tools to create weapons of mass destruction and became an insane clicking thing that spoke in the language of its own tools because it had become a tool of death. The abandoned land of death: the Namib desert waiting to be reclaimed by the ones responsible for killing it with clicking tools: the tools that clicked when used; the first flint knapping tools invented by an ape that stood on two legs and used its hands to make tools with. Now, millions of years later, the clicking tool being used by the ancestors of the first bi-man is the computer mouse... and the dead land of Namib is still waiting to be reclaimed by the last surviving sub species of that first bipedal ape who created that dead land. This is not coincidence.

What was the first ape the first naked ape that turned an entire are into a desert? It was the ape who had 23 chromosomes, who merged its 24 chromosomes into 23: the two ape species merging together in order to escape extinction as a species: just like the Polar bear is doing today: mating with grizzlies in the Arctic to escape from dying out completely as a species. This genetic merging creating a huge increase in its intelligence, an unnatural imbalanced intelligence. How old is the original Bi-man of the Namib Desert? 53 million years old. That is how old our species is. That is where we came from. “To Be or not to Be” To be bi-pedal or not to be bi-pedal: should we sit in one spot and become a settled people, or should we become nomads, always walking, always on the move?: this was the first two questions-in-one ever asked by the bi-man, the bi-sexual man; the first ape with 23 chromosomes who actually had thoughts which split into indecisiveness... The first animal to realize they actually had a choice of how to live. The only animal able to choose which sex it wants to be after being born. Being split, indecisive... The curse of Bisexuality from interbreeding with another ape or monkey species... later turned and poisoned into homosexuality and lesbianism. BE I... The birth of the Inner Self, self-awareness. Be I a man? Or Be I a wo-man? Be I filled with woe, filled with fear or Be I filled with Courage and Happiness? Be I brave, or Be I a coward? The first animal that asked a question of itself... and sought an answer... and went out and began solving problems intelligently. The “B”irth of “I”nner awareness of the reflective ‘I’, the Id, the Human Ego.

Who was the first Bi-man? He was the first bi-pedal ape that walked upright. He came from Namibia: Namibia spelled in reverse is “A bi-man” Chased out of Africa; you can follow his journey going steadily North: first Northeast to the Olduvai Gorge, then north to the Serengeti Plain: there along the Rift Valley which splits into three chasms, all going North until they all lead you right out of Africa into Egypt and the Middle east. What is so surprising about this? Nothing. A split man: following its Path of Splitness, splitting rocks to use as tools, drawn to the deepest tectonic split in Africa because of its own genetic/physical/spiritual splitness. One tribe of bi-pedal apes walked along the shores of all the way around Asia to end up in Australia. After living on the shores of the desert sands of Namib for how many millions of years, that is no surprise either.

Why is the Namib Desert such a crucial area so crucial a link to our origins? Now it is buried under 53 million years of soil erosion and mountains of sand. It was the one place in Africa during the Age of

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Volcanoes where monkeys and apes had the best chance of surviving extinction from the dust clouds and pyroclastic death which volcanoes spewed for hundreds of mile. The Westerly Atlantic Winds blew that coast clean of the poisonous fumes and ashes, blowing all of it inland, across the east coast of Africa out into the ocean on the east side of Africa. This area explains so many aspects of our present and past: why humans to this day think the most romantic thing in the world is to walk along a sand-covered beach. Why the Australian aborigines coming out of Africa walked 20,000 miles along the shores of Asia without going inland.

Science has been looking for the famous missing link which would explain our origin... when it should be looking for two missing links instead of one. Now the buried story of the squatters and the walkers begins to make sense: the constant fight between nomadic and settled tribes for over 100,000 years begins to make sense... The split between matriarchal and patriarchal human cultures begins to make sense. The original bi-man, the first bi-pedal ape who left (bye!) the Namib when it became able to walk... turned that area into a desert and deserted it; reversed it from a Garden of Eden into a Desert; was a merged interbreeding between a nomadic and a sedentary species of apes. In one species the females were dominant: in the other the males were dominant: thus began the unnatural war between the sexes as to who would dominate the other began and has never stopped. Now our lesbians and homosexuals cultures begin to make sense; now the Amazon warrior cultures and the homosexual warrior cultures begin to make sense. A merged DNA interbreeding of two subspecies of apes: one male, the other one female; coming together as equals: each one used to being dominant, both fighting for dominance in the new merged tribe. Was the first bi-pedal ape the true Adam and Eve of our race? All the evidence is gone: buried under 53 million years of soil erosion and Ice Ages and sand and catastrophic events. But history does not lie. Humans have always left places of desolation in search of a better place to live. They say bye to them once they have turned them into total deserts and move on; they have done this for millions of years.

What is crucial to understand is that over the course of thousands and millions of year, the order of letters in many words, the spelling of words, their pronunciation, and their meaning has been changed, twisted and reversed. In order to uncover the meaning and origins of words is both an art and a science. The reason I do this is because the older any word or historical site is: the more chance there is of finding hidden meanings of words by reversing the spelling, since that is exactly what humans have been doing with their words ever since they were invented.

My interpretation and decoding of words does not have anything to do with the encryption and decoding of letters and words which Sufis practice. You will find my use of this technique to find hidden meanings of words everywhere in this book. For instance: the word Sufis is in itself an encrypted codeword which can be taken apart and interpreted. The letter 'u' means 'you': referring to whoever is reading the text. The superficial meaning of Sufis means; See-U-Find-I-See. And: See? I Found ... now I See! Reversing the spelling means almost the same thing; Sifus which means: See I-Find-U...See? and: See...I Find...U-See? It also means: See-I Found... U-See...? And: See, I Found U...See? The letter S is never a simple direct meaning or truth. It is a cunning, sly way of looking at things that is never direct in its meanings, never straightforward. Sufism is the most infantile level of the earliest human search for wisdom and truth: it exists at the level of babies playing hide-and-seek with their eyes. Discovering they have the power to see something, and then not see it by hiding behind something and coming out from hiding.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Uncovering the semantic puzzle of words can only be accomplished if you know enough of the actual history and can link it together organically so it makes sense and you can put it into the correct relative historical context. Take for example the two nuclear plants disasters of 3-mile Island and Chernobyl. The reason that disaster occurred and the reason it has this name is because the destruction of the entire continent of America was set off by the first European colony establishing a foothold on an island 3 miles off the coast of that continent. We may not see that destruction as an explosion, but on an ecological time-scale of billions of years, the speed and explosive destructiveness with which America has been destroyed by European colonization is the equivalent speed and explosive destruction of an atomic nuclear meltdown. The true meaning of the name Chernobyl comes from the Russians cherishing the supposed nobility of the atom, and cherishing their own Russian nobility. The ecological destruction of Russia stemmed from these two sources. If Russia had not bankrupted itself by trying to match the United States in its atomic nuclear capabilities for global destruction, it would not have destroyed itself. Furthermore... if the Russians had not fallen in love with their fucking Czar and their corrupt nobility; who taxed, killed, brutalized and degraded them for 1,000 fucking years; they would not have destroyed the land they live on. This meaning applies equally to their nuclear programs which has poisoned entire regions of the former USSR and their feudal system which they refused to change. When O = ALL and Y = Why, then you get the hidden semantic meaning of Chernobyl: Cherish Negative-ALL; but Why Love? Why love energies that are negative and destructive?

Now back to Africa and the question of our earliest origins...

The only time our ancestors did not have a destructive effect on the ecosystems they lived-in was in their African veldt. Why? Because the ecosystems of the African veldt are the only ecosystems on earth powerful enough to spring back from total drought and devastation in a single season. Why? Because our ancestors had been burning it down for millions of years, and before we burned it, volcanoes had been burning it down for more millions of years. The eco-systems of Africa developed their resurgent capabilities slowly over many millions of years as a genetic response to these forces, until they could survive cataclysmic volcanic eruptions, forest fires and the burning of grasslands.

When our ancestors did not use tools, and were not nomadic. Back then... we had no need to invent, or create any artificial kind of culture or invent any artificial meaning, or purpose to justify our existence. We survived because there was a useful niche we could fill which served an overall purpose that was greater than the survival of our own species. In that larger context: our lives were meaningful and had a purpose.

But once we left Africa: and became nomads: we hunted the European Bison, and the Woolly Mammoth, and the Mastodons into extinction. Once we began to use tools and emigrated out of our natural habitats: no matter where we went: we upset the natural balances of the ecosystems we traveled through.

As a foreign species moving through ecosystems that were never designed to have us there in the first place: our hunter-gatherer tactics of reaping, and harvesting, and moving-on: had the effect of a scythe. Reaping is rape. Apes raping the land they lived on. Rage-infested apes projecting their unconscious hate slyly outwards and carefully not noticing or looking at what they are actually doing and never questioning why they are doing it. In the beginning, we did not cut down everything, we simply took the easiest resources at the peak of their abundance. The ecosystems of Nature can mend themselves from the effects of a small band of traveling humans raping an ecosystem. A small tribe of humans hunting geese or ducks on their migration routes cannot make a real dent in their population. Simply because there were too many geese, and too many ducks for any one tribe to kill at any given time with their primitive tools. That oversight was corrected by the Industrial Revolution.

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

North American Aborigines have lived for thousands of years by the same spawning rivers; catching salmon without driving them into extinction because they never took too many salmon. They only took what they needed. They were not interested in making mass-catches which they could sell to other tribes. They were not interested in profit. They were not capitalists. If humans had only traveled through wetlands and never settled down near them, and left well enough alone: our population would never have risen to the astronomical height of billions. But once the idea of accumulating food to sell... and make a profit from was invented Human population exploded.

Instead of growing Life around them, Cities began to grow death around them. When humans began domesticating animals and creating cities; they created a growth-dynamic that kills everything else in its civilized area and around it. This is still true today.

In this new model of Human existence called Civilization: tool innovation was fostered by two opposite dynamics. The over-abundance, and the under-abundance of food.

The natural accumulation of the over-abundance of food meeting a species that was used to existing on an under-abundance of food... plus the accumulation of human learning and tool technology: combined to produce the shift from a nomadic lifestyle to living in settled areas. The ecosystem they lived in had stopped having any control over human population because the tool-dynamic of accumulation became predominant as their major form of survival-adaptation.

The domestication of plants and animals signaled a major splitting off from their natural environment. Nature no longer grew the food they ate: they grew their own food. They no longer merely harvested what was available: they had to plant, irrigate, weed, tend crops, and tend livestock. This involved much more time; but it also produced more food: and probably more reliably. In order to accumulate, you need to preserve what you have already accumulated. As long as humans lived from hand-to-mouth, as long as they were nomads: the amount they could accumulate was strictly limited to how much they could carry. Once humans settled down, they began to accumulate all kinds of things: especially food. And once they could do that, they could use it to trade for other things. With civilization came the use of salt as a preservative in food. Suddenly a trade in foodstuffs was born. Once animals became domesticated, they could also be accumulated and traded. The origin of all trading and barter comes from the accumulation of food.

Throughout all this, the basic dynamic of tool-use is evident: Separation, Segmentation, Accumulation, Pyramidalization, and Preservation. On all levels and in all ways, no matter how creative, its basic process remains as the root of civilization's development. What happened was that a species with a specific set of survival traits got out of its designed functioning parameters, and began over-running most of the planet: just like the rabbit in Australia.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

The Creation of Robber Baron Culture

Is not hard to understand. It grew organically from modern humans stealing eggs from nests. It grew from humans stealing food from jackals in Africa. It grew from our ancestors living as scavengers for millions of years before tools were invented. It grew from accumulating overpopulation. If the nearest tribe is 50 miles away: stealing any food they might have is not worth the effort. But if they live only 3 miles away, and have lots of foods: then it's easier to steal their food than go stealing eggs one-by-one from the nests of small birds. Humans robbed each other long before they began overpopulating the earth. Then they started robbing from each other even more simply due to overpopulation. We were the robbers of dead carcasses in Africa for millions of years before we ever developed tools. This survival tactic is not unique. It is just not a mark of intelligence. Human overpopulation of the world has merely intensified this survival tactic and exposed how destructive it actually is. A few naked apes stealing a carcass in Africa is one thing. But 7 billion human bent on robbery, all stealing from each other... becomes a moral catastrophe and an ethical atrocity... an inhuman social insanity that is destroying the earth today. You cannot keep on robbing Peter to pay Paul forever. But that is exactly what humans believe they can do indefinitely without suffering any consequences.

The Basic Factors

Even with their spread across the world: modern humans lived as nomadic foragers for at least 90,000 years before civilization was invented. If not for our unique sense of time awareness: we would still be foragers today... in spite of our tool-use, our tool-brain, and our development of language. At some stage of our evolution, the tool-brain became able to separate and accumulate its own experiences into a linear form of accumulation, while remaining separate from the ongoing process itself.

Once the human awareness could stand outside its own experiences as they happened: time-awareness was created.

All animals have perceptions... but only the human animal has a separate split-off observer of its own perceptions.

It is the existence of this split-off awareness, our Inner Observer... which makes our reflective self-awareness at all possible.

It is also the existence of this split-off awareness, which makes it possible for humans to fear reflectively: to become afraid of later not having enough to eat... even during a time of plenty. Because the split-off awareness is governed by a causal accumulation of linear experience: it can look back at its own series of experiences and predict what cyclic patterns will happen in the future from what it has undergone in the past.

But it does this only by reflectively looking back: and assuming that what happened in the past will happen again.

Our time-awareness is one-sided. We have no awareness of the future. We only have an awareness of the past. We almost never have an awareness of the present moment except as a state of bored expectation or distraction from the present moment.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

When did this separate observer-awareness evolve in human or hominid brains? And to what degree or what level? What was the nature of human time-awareness during their 90,000 years as hunter-gatherers? How much did this evolving time-awareness influence human tool-innovation? Or vice versa?

There are no answers to these questions: except that the agricultural revolution, which began the invention called Civilization, could not have happened without it. After being forced to adapt as foragers in ecosystems which never had enough food resources for them to stop moving, it was the overabundance of food, plus their time-awareness, plus their level of tool technology that was responsible for this total shift in lifestyle from nomads to squatters.

The unique nature of our time-awareness is the telltale clue to just how and why we evolved to separate ourselves from the rest of Nature and the Universe.

Early Modern Humans probably did anticipate and plan for cyclic conditions before this; but they never had the opportunity to settle down in one spot for a long period of time simply because there was not enough food around them to live in one place for a long time. But with the end of the Ice Age and an overabundance of food in marshlands and wetlands, where they did not need to keep moving to eat: they also had more free time on their hands. And you know what they say about the Devil and idle hands. The Devil finds work for idle hands. It is called tool innovation. Once these two factors came into play together, then they were given the opportunity of exploring how to exploit this overabundance by developing and innovating better tools. Then their time was not used up in traveling, moving, or having to constantly innovate their tool-use to changing climates, environments, and resources. Now they could have more time for tool experimentation and innovation on only one environment, one small area, one set of resources. Their tools did not have to be general, all-purpose tools. They could be specialized and custom-made only for one specific ecosystem, one specific function. Only when we settled down in one place could we do this... Only then did tool innovation really start accelerating.

Without the learned ability to change and adapt experientially to new environments, they would have remained nomads. But, time awareness was also a curse:: because it gave them a perception of their own mortality. It created in all humans, a universal fear of death on a conscious reflective level, which no other animal has. So they adapted to a new environment. But their fear of starvation did not vanish even though it was completely unjustified. If we humans had never possessed a conscious fear of death and of starvation: we would have enjoyed these new wetlands: but we would have never gone out of their way to accumulate anything, or stay there any longer than anywhere else.

We would have remained nomads in an area of plenty, using the same old nomadic skills. And once having exhausted any available resources: we would have kept on traveling... still operating on a feast-or-famine basis, and not bothering to save for the future: regardless of the opportunities to do so.

What drove us to accumulate unnecessarily was fear and fear alone... the fear that only time-awareness could give us... the fear of starvation in the future, the fear of dying slowly in the future ... and trying to plan for the future; so that fear would not haunt us every day of our lives. If only from our own past oral history of the countless near extinctions, and crises that we had endured. There is simply no other possible explanation for this change in our lifestyle. If we humans had not possessed a fear of death and starvation: then we would have never undergone this change in our lifestyle in the first place. The only way we could have possessed this motivating fear was if we possessed time-awareness.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

With Modern Humans, an entirely new form of animal awareness was born. Instead of an integrated awareness, it was the creation of two different kinds of awareness:

An Inner Awareness,
 and
 An Outer Awareness.

The tool-dynamic had managed to split human awareness in two. But that presented an entirely new problem for this awareness. The result was that the Inner and Outer Awareness needed to be integrated properly by the split-off separate observer-awareness in order for the organism to be balanced. But its awareness was already genetically imbalanced. It was connected to its Inner Awareness more than its Outer Awareness.

With its ability to creatively change-evolve through learning increased, and the role played by its instincts decreased: its life-energy was split into two different energy levels:

Genetic and Experiential,

 or

 Instinct and Learning,

With the development of civilization: what happened was that humans were becoming more reflectively aware, more abstractively creative. The abstractive aspect of our tool-brain became dominant. The entire evolution of humans, from pre-history up to the present is primarily one of cultural abstraction: not genetic.

Settlements and the increased accumulation of human population; merely allowed this evolving creativity of our tool-brain to accelerate. The evolution of our awareness becoming more segmented can be seen in modern and ancient music. Compare the eery wailing of aboriginal music which has no separation of notes or sounds to the 12-tone scale of separate notes we use today.

Fear of death is fear of the future. Dread of dying is fear of living. Fear of the future, and fear of living is the fear of all change.

The Consequences of Accumulation

By settling down: people were no longer limited in their accumulation of things or wealth by needing to carry it. As civilization developed, they could separate more things, segment more things, accumulate more things, pyramidalize more things, and preserve more things, develop more tool innovations, becoming more abstractively creative.

What anthropologists call the agriculture revolution; was in actuality, a dynamic of: separation-segmentation-accumulation-pyramidalization-preservation.

In fact: this is exactly what we did with our food... We cut the grain stalks down, separated the kernels from the stalks, accumulated all the kernels into one pile, and preserved the pile for the future.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Once people stopped living in small cooperative bands where everything was mostly shared, the physical-emotional-psychological-spiritual effect of this accumulation was;

Inequity and Unequalness.

Depending on circumstances, luck, effort, and ingenuity. Any one group or individual could accumulate more than others. Or less. The result of this was...

more separateness,
more segmentation,
and more pyramidalization.
Socially, what was created was...

The Agricultural Revolution

What was this new way of living? This new way of eating? This new way of growing food?

It was the urge to eat seeds and nuts. It was the urge to kill and eat the smallest young growing things possible. The urge to crush seeds before they could grow up. The urge to crush as many living seeds of life as possible.

It began from the peer example of predators; killing the young babies each year being born on the Serengeti Plains. Killing and eating them before they could grow up and defend themselves. These walking apes escaped those plains... and began stealing seeds and nuts from new eco-systems as they traveled through them...

Giving nothing back in return, except the dead husks, the unwanted outer shells they could not digest... because they were not designed, and not meant to eat them in the first place. Eating seeds and nuts, and leaves as they walked became the easiest way to survive and leave the areas they lived in.

Until they found places where there were so many seeds and nuts and leaves and fruits to eat, that they did not have to travel anymore. Until they ate themselves into laziness and starvation; because they ate up all of the food around them, and then refused to move on.

Until the seeds and nuts that went through their digestive systems came out the other end, and sprouted from their own feces. Until they developed the idea of shitting all around where they lived... so more sprouts and seedlings of undigested wheat seeds and rye seeds and other grains that were designed to be eaten by the animals of that eco-system. Were eaten by them instead, and fooled into thinking it was safe enough to sprout and grow in a safe environment where they would be protected enough to grow up safely. Until they began artificially planting these seeds and nuts, and irrigating them, watering them, fertilizing them. Fooling the dry dormant seeds into thinking it was all right to grow. They found they could not digest many of these raw seeds and nuts. They had to crush them, and throw away their husks to be able to digest them. But they had grown so lazy, and so fat: that their digestive systems could not properly digest even the crushed seeds and nuts.

So they had to artificially remove the husks from the dead seeds. First killing the mother plant, then raping the seedlings, and then crushing the naked, raped seedlings, and then heating them, burning them, cooking them, and killing them even more.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Until the raped-crushed-cooked seed-energy... was dead enough to match their own death-energy, and could be absorbed and digested into their own deadened bodies.

The artificial process human squatters invented 12,000 years ago called agriculture; was what anthropologists call the Agricultural Revolution

This was what created human civilization.

The Principle of Greed

Nomadic People were limited to accumulating only what they could carry as hunter-gatherers: it was not possible for greed to exist. Previously when by sheer practical necessity: everything was shared in order for the group to survive. Then they stopped moving, and that changed everything. The agricultural revolution made greed not only possible, but greed became the basis of all further civilized human evolution.

What destroys Human Intimacy? Trust? Cooperation?
The answer is: one-sided Accumulation.

If one person or group has more than another, then they must defend themselves against others who are less fortunate, or envious, or greedy, or greedier than they are. Then these others become enemies, not to be trusted. Once a person has less than somebody else then envy is created. Envy-greed-mistrust: are all results of accumulation.

Whether that accumulation is one of power, wealth, prestige or knowledge. The result is the same: human inequity-inequality-imbalance. Human society began to resemble the same tool-use piles which resulted from their accumulations of excess and waste.

What is the principal of one-sided accumulation?

It is part of a vicious cycle. It is an imbalanced one-sided process. It is half a cycle. It is not sustainable. It is merely separation with no connection, no regeneration, and no balance. It is merely the one-sided dynamic of tool-use. It is merely Imbalanced Splitness. The tool had finally trained the human animal to act like a tool, think like a tool, function like a tool, and live like a tool... using tools, in a tool environment, to create more tools.

The dynamic of greed has no exceptions. It is irrelevant if you are rich or poor. Once the agricultural revolution began: humans found that the only way they could survive; was to accumulate. The principles of accumulation and the principle of greed are exactly the same. The degree of this accumulation or the degree of one's greed is completely irrelevant. Whether you stand out in the rain, or whether you jump into a lake, the effect is the same: you get wet.

The dynamic of accumulation split human society into people who had more than they needed to live... and people who did not have enough to live.

The effect on both rich and poor was the same. Both became obsessed with the desire to accumulate more. Both are conditions of imbalance. Both needs are insatiable. The poor never get enough to live-

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

eat. The rich never get rich enough. There is simply no way around it: fear of poverty is just another form of greed: greed is just fear of poverty.

By erecting a structure that pits its inhabitants against each other as antagonists, the pyramidal nature of the structure alone: creates greed in every living soul within its boundaries. At no point in this process is there any balance.

Different kinds and levels of greed-accumulation were created in the human psyche by the dynamic of accumulation.. Whether this Condition was a result of shortage, or excess: it makes no difference.

Just as the conditions of food shortage or excess didn't make any difference in how human settlements developed once we stopped moving. Whether a rich person becomes poor, or a poor person becomes rich, this does not change their need-desire to accumulate. It is the tool dynamic which is at work. It is the tool dynamic of separation- segmentation- accumulation, preservation: which controls and governs all civilized human behavior. We may not like this bitter pill of truth: but the facts are obvious.

The Birth of Irresponsibility

Before the advent of settlements: the nomadic foraging lifestyle of humans dictated that they exist only as traveling bands. The high level of social interdependence and cooperation needed to use tools as a traveling band created the optimum band size of 25-30 individuals. This kind of lifestyle and environment naturally made cooperation a way of life.

But when humans settled down and the size of their communities increased: this all changed. With larger and larger groups: how do you get everybody to cooperate willingly as a cohesive social unit? It becomes harder and harder to effectively coordinate all of the various activities of the group as a whole. Enter the hierarchical system of authority: enter the idea that someone in authority knows better what to do... and expects others to obey him. Enter the idea of having to do something not because you have to, or want to: but because you are told to.

The idea of enforced participation only became necessary with the accumulation of unmanageable numbers of people. This upset the entire balance of communal existence and forever made it an imbalanced dynamic. So socially: what you want to do and what you should do became polarized. It became two different things. As a result within the community: human motives and interests became conflicted.

All responsibility and cooperation is based upon the personal ethic of voluntary giving. That is: each person pitching in not just because they have to, but also because they want to. As foragers, humans had to cooperate willingly with each other in order for the group to survive and exist in peaceful harmony as a cohesive, balanced, functioning unit. In this model the lines between nature and nurture, or training and environment are hopelessly blurred. But as long as both their training and environment were on the same page, each reinforced the other: so there was no conflict of interest. People cooperated because they both had to and wanted to. No other choices existed.

However: once any group of people became too large for everyone to cooperate willingly without coercion: you get the problem of social irresponsibility. And the basic reason and origin for this irresponsibility is the concept-dynamic of authority. No person can tell what another person should do-think-feel. Once any person is given authority-power over another: they become unavoidably irresponsible since their own wishes and needs come into conflict with the wishes and needs of those they have authority over. The wishes of those in authority override the wishes of those without authority. As group size increases, the roles-functions of people begin to split up. Who should be responsible for doing what? What are a person's responsibilities as a member of their society? How do you define each person's role in their society? What are the boundaries between individual and social responsibility? Who determines these responsibilities? And if others do not agree: what can they do about it? The inevitable result is: irresponsibility... on all levels and in all ways... by those in authority and by those who have no authority.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

What happens when you can order other people around to suit your own needs? How long before any consideration of other peoples needs begins to fade and become less important than your own wishes? How long does it take you to begin to believe that you really do know what is best for others? Until you start using your authority for your own purposes and not for the benefit of others... until you start acting irresponsibly towards others?

What happens if you are told to do something and you don't really want to do it? Rebel? Defy? Or just not do it? Or do it poorly? Or do it with resentment building up inside you? Any kind of enforced coercion can never hope to equal the full participation of willing cooperation. As long as you have a social system based upon Power and Authority: you will have the rampant spread of all kinds of irresponsibility.

In any hierarchical society, a split is created between those who delegate, and those who serve. With the invention of a new lifestyle, came authority: creating the imbalance of power and powerlessness.

If one person becomes more powerful than others, how do they enforce that power? Physically? By threats of ostracism? Punishment? By creating cultural traditions and values that teach unquestioning obedience? What if the person in power is a poor administrator of that power? Who suffers? What if the needs of a group become so unwieldy that it must trample on the rights of the individual? Where and when (if ever) was there a proper balance between the two? Here you see how and why culture became a tool for the enforced participation of its members. Along with the accumulation of human population, came the necessary tools to control this unwieldy mass: cultural conformity and oppression. We call it civilization.

So, if you are born into this accumulated social structure at a certain strata or level: let's say as a peasant... Your culture ordains your fate for you:

‘Thou shalt labor in the fields and do nothing else.’

This entire mess was created by human communities increasing in size. Social harmony was systematically destroyed by the simple process of the one-sided accumulation of overpopulation.

Also: the increase in the size of any community forced people to specialize. By splitting up the functions and roles of the group: social harmony was splintered also. Any kind of specialization in anything narrows down people so they become increasingly one-dimensional in what they do, how they think and feel. Having fewer things to share in common with each other: be it functions, experiences, or interests. This was the result of increasingly specialized and sophisticated tool-use. The tool was successfully forcing humans to spend more time using tools, and in doing so: they gradually became more tool-like. So: once the natural balance of individual and group autonomy became imbalanced with the increase in population and group size; the natural balance of the willing cooperative responsibility involved in any small band became imbalanced into people telling others what to do, and people being told what to do. The two resulting developments of authority and irresponsibility are actually indivisible and part of the same dynamic, to wit: accumulation. In a cooperative band of relative equals, the concept of responsibility does not exist as a separate aspect of life; it is merely a part of the complete social-individual-environmental dynamic balance. Once you increase the size of any human society; everything becomes more split, segmented, and complicated. The more you complicate your life, the more conflict you get: until you get a cultural norm of everyday stress.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Freedom and Responsibility

Other animals need no such artificial definitions of their freedom or their responsibility. They behave both freely and responsibly because that is how they were designed to behave and that is how they fit into their ecosystem. If humans could find a way to fit naturally into an ecosystem, then these two terms would disappear and not be relevant anymore. But since we have created an artificial ecosystem called culture-civilization, we must also erect artificial rules for how we behave inside this system: so we invented the idea of responsibility because of the creation of irresponsibility.

Before that we simply lived as we were meant to: we were not responsible or irresponsible. This all began when we ceased being a natural, functioning, useful part of the ecosystems we lived in. So, when our social structure accumulated to the point where it was dynamically imbalanced... when what a person had to do was no longer what he naturally wanted to do... the imbalanced dynamic of power and powerlessness, the imbalanced dynamics of authority, power, oppression, and irresponsibility were created as a norm of civilized existence. The more imbalanced society becomes, the more these terms apply.

Today, the imbalance of power and powerlessness, responsibility and irresponsibility, continues to exist all over the Earth. Moreover: it has steadily worsened as this basic imbalance has become greater and greater. As human population continues to accumulate, there are more oppressed people living today than ever before in human history. Irresponsibility is more rampant now than ever before.

Ownership

Once fixed settlements arose: then came agriculture: more tool innovation, increased population density, changing social structure. Everything in human society changed drastically. The increased population raised the number of people in any one group. Their lifestyle-activities-social dynamic-diet all changed: including social relationships, functions, and roles. With more people in any one group, the social roles people took on, and their everyday functions became increasingly specialized. Human society began to accumulate-pyramidalize into a layered structure according to the importance of their specialized roles-functions, in terms of expertise, knowledge, prestige, power, status and wealth.

But these are only the external signs of what actually must have happened. Merely the fact of not being nomadic anymore changed the way they perceived the world around them. By putting all this hard work into their one small area of tended land they became connected to it. Losing any sense of being at home in the wilderness of Nature, they evolved a new concept of a permanent base: a home. Once they became connected to this small parcel of land, they identified with it. That land became their land. Ownership of land was created.

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

To try to put this into perspective, let's say you were given the deed to an idyllic unspoiled piece of Nature, which has never even been seen or visited by humans. Now imagine yourself going to visit this piece of land with a team of surveyors. Have them set up their instruments and lay out the boundaries of that land with wooden pegs and strings. Walk around that land: view it, decide where you will make the road, where you will build your house, where you will dig your well, lay your pipes, how you will landscape it, which trees you will cut down, which ones you will keep.

Now: if by some miracle you could just sit there and not move for one whole day and one whole night. If you did not fidget, scratch, or eat, for 24 hours: and stayed completely alert-awake during the entire time. What would you see-hear?

If you stayed completely still, the animals would come out and not even notice you... you would be able to see the goings-on of all the day creatures, all the night creatures. assuming you had infrared vision... You would see the sun move around the sky, clouds pass over, the moon and stars come out. You would feel the wind on your face; hear it blowing through the trees. Under the earth, you would be able to watch the burrowing of tiny organisms; you would be able to see the activities of ants, the creeping growth of all the root systems... Provided you had special X-Ray vision. You would be able to see, feel, hear, an infinite, complex array of things going on...

Now: once having done that... ask yourself: for how many billions of years have the stars shone down on this land? For how many billions of years have the clouds passed over it? For how many billions of years has the wind blown across it? For how many millions of years have the plants and trees lived there? For how many millions of years have living creatures inhabited this land and moved across it? You on the other hand, have only been there one day, and one night.

By what stretch of imagination makes you think that only you own that land, and nobody else?

How much do the trees own that land?

How much do the animals own that land?

They have all been there for millions of years... much longer than you have.

By what magic transformation do all of their rights of ownership suddenly vanish?

What justification allows you to violate all other ownership of that land, and use it only for your own personal use and benefit?

The wind does not recognize the sacredness of your abstract string lines: it passes over them. The animals do not recognize your boundaries: they go where they will. The plants do not suddenly creep over to the other side of your string and stop growing on your side. Nothing in the Universe recognizes your right of ownership to that land except you. If you choose to cut down the trees, raze the earth, dig it up, lay down foundations... whose rights have you violated?

However, if you became part-of that land for as many billions of years as everything else has: then you would gain a certain kind of ownership, which you would have to share with all the other shareholders.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

But you have only been there one day. Your share of those rights is less than one billionth of all the other shares. In this context: maybe you can begin to see the utter strangeness of the abstract concept we call ownership of land.

The concept of personal ownership originates from tool-use. In Aboriginal nomadic cultures: ownership only applied to their few, personal possessions which they carried on their bodies: that is: their tools. Otherwise, they shared their environment freely with other living organisms. Living in small cooperative bands, sharing their communal resources, being constantly on the move: ownership had very little meaning for them. They were connected to their environment generally: not through a narrow, selective focus on one small piece of land. The modern human concept of ownership only became possible after humans had managed to cut themselves off from the rest of Nature and establish settlements. Over-intensive tool-use, power, wealth, greed, authority, and irresponsibility created the concept of ownership... and idea of ownership created over-intensive tool-use, power, wealth, greed, authority, and irresponsibility.

This concept: the idea that you can own something, manipulate it, and use it solely for your own benefit, led humans to own not only own tools, land, property, and all kinds of dead things; but living things as well. It led us to own living animals and domesticate them for our convenience. People began enslaving dogs and chickens for their own use. We went and enslaved our fellow humans and domesticated them to become domestic slaves. There was no such thing as slavery before civilization. Civilization invented slavery. Civilization begins with enslavement of animals for our benefit. You cannot have slavery unless you have a concept of ownership. Slavery is merely one form of the idea of ownership. Whether it is the ownership and use of tools, or the ownership and use of other humans as tools, or the ownership and use of other animals, or the ownership of land: it is the same thing; it is the same basic abstract concept.

The concept of ownership automatically presupposes that you have an unlimited right to use, manipulate, control, possess, and do anything with whatever you decide to 'own'. The human concept of ownership ignores the entire Universe. It ignores all the rights of the Universe. It replaces the rights of everything in the Universe with Human Rights. It assumes that any human personally knows better what to do with a rock, with a tool, with a living plant, with a living tree, with a living animal, a river, an eco-system, than Nature, than the Universe does. It is the origin and cause of all humans fighting against each other. It is the origin and cause of all greed. It corrupts all our values, morals, ethics, and humaneness. We have been taking the concept of abstract ownership for granted for over 10,000 years.

You cannot own something that grows. You cannot own the growth of a living thing. The idea that owning a tree means you also own the apples that tree grows is bullshit. You did not grow those apples, you did not make them: The nutrients in the soil, the sun, the rain, the air, the winds, the insects, the bees, the sap of the tree,, the genetic DNA that exists inside every apple seed grew those apples; not you. You are stealing the fruit of a tree that is designed to create more life.

The point is... you cannot own Life. Life is a flow of energy. Eco-systems are flows of energy. You cannot own an eco-system. You cannot own the Gulf Stream and the Jet Stream and the clouds and the rain and the sun. If you tried to, you would kill them. You cannot own the air of the world; you cannot own the oceans of the world. Life energy flows. Damming rivers and lakes: stopping the flow of Life of an entire huge eco-system is the destruction of Life. The earth, the ground, the valleys and plains and mountains cannot be separated from the eco-systems they are in and separately owned without destroying the ecosystems they are in. All human abstract forms of Ownership are forms of ecological destruction. Ownership is form of enslavement. Ownership is a form of killing. Ownership is a form of death. If you try to own a living thing; you kill it. In order to own an animal you have to break its spirit, you have to kill its spirit, you have to destroy its freedom, you have to enslave it, you have to take it out of its natural habitat. Owning is a form of killing; spiritually, physically, emotionally, morally, ethically. The only things you can own that is not an act of evil are things that are already dead. Living creatures owning things that are dead is not natural, it is not logical, it is not useful. The concept of ownership is a form of abstract insanity. Why is it insane? The idea of a living creature owning a dead thing is not rational or sane. When you own a dead thing you are owning death; you are owning a dead object. You become what you try to own. Dead objects do not recognize being owned. If they did you would not be able to own them. What you own; owns you to the same degree. That is the Universal Law of Dynamic Balance of the Universe; there are no exceptions to this law.

The Attempt to Own Everything

Is not new... for centuries the robber barons and the kings of Europe tried to own everything they could, even if they couldn't see it or catch it or kill it or enslave it. All the poor people were forbidden to kill deer in the forest because the ones who oppressed them and enslaved and taxed them, claimed ownership of all the forests and all the land including everything living on that land. This is one example of the insane arrogance that the abstract concept of ownership creates. The idea... that once inventing an abstract claim of ownership over a piece of property or territory, that literally everything which exists on, or in that region is your personal property, and that you have the power to kill it and do anything you want to it, without any ethical or moral obligations whatsoever, without you having to answer for your deeds, without you having to have any responsibility whatsoever.

This is what being at the top of civilized power does to you. You become accustomed to never having to be responsible for anything you do: 100% irresponsible ownership of everything you own and do and say. This is where the arrogance of all elite ruling classes comes from; this is what being at the ultimate top of the pyramid of power does to you... There is nobody higher up to answer to. There is no higher power or authority to challenge or question or punish you for your misdeeds, crimes and sins.

For centuries, the temporal power of Kings and Barons in Europe was supposed to be held in check by the 'higher' religious power of the church... Was this an effective control over their power? No. The church itself was even more corrupt than the kings were. The church tried to sell the idea that if you committed a crime in your life and got away with it... that you would eventually pay for your sins in the afterlife: after you died.

This resulted in the two corrupt hierarchies of corrupt power making up a social contract, a swindle, a propaganda stunt. An evil king could kill and butcher and rape and tax and oppress and commit all kinds of atrocious horrible bestial acts of cruelty and evil, but as long as they confessed their sins to the Church just before they died: they would be 'forgiven' their life of evil by god and be allowed to pass into heaven instead of being cast down into the everlasting fires of hell because they were finally admitting that the religious authority of the church was ultimately greater than their temporal authority on Earth. This was just fucking fine with the Kings and with the Church. Both kept their façade of false authority and bullshit going, while being free of all responsibility for what they actually did in this life. The problem with this propaganda scam was that the lower classes began to catch on to it, and started to

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

ape the upper classes, and copy them, and act just as irresponsibly and immorally and unethically as the Church and the ruling classes... and stopped believing in all that dogma.

The point is, that the entire fucking rotten bullshit structure of pyramidal civilized authority and power rests upon abstract imaginary concepts of 'ownership' which does not actually exist in the world. The history, the origin of civilized power and authority is a history of imaginary non-existent abstract assumptions of ownership; the concept of ownership originates from an imaginary idea, an imaginary assumption that something is 'yours' if you 'say' it is... or if you have a piece of paper saying it is... or if you have an imaginary idea that it is, and claim that some imaginary being or god or deity gave you this 'right' of ownership... etc, ad-vomit, puke, puke.

Of all of the animals and fish and birds and insects, all of the living organisms living in a region what was 'owned' by some royal fart.... not one of them recognized being 'owned'. None of them even knew that they were 'owned' by a 'king' because they happened to be living on 'his' land... If you asked a deer in the forest "Who owns you?" it wouldn't know what the fuck you're talking about because it isn't an insane human who believes that abstract ideas, abstract concepts of ownership are more 'real', more important than the actual 3-dimensional world they live in.

This how irrational and insane human abstraction can be: just by a few mental swindles, a few irrational assumptions... humans can spread their concept of abstract ownership to include not just the domesticated enslaved species they had worked to enslave... but all the creatures living on earth. The greed to possess and own land spread from owning all the land around your castle... to all the land everywhere... to the idea of owning the entire Earth as your personal possession!

That is like an arrogant flea standing up on the back of a dog, claiming that it 'owns' the whole dog, and all of its skin and hair and everything that comes out of that dog... And furthermore: that this fucking flea is the most important and powerful authority on this dog, that it has authority to control, use oppress and own all the other fleas living on that dog's skin,

Why can this little flea do this? Because this little, arrogant, fucking flea is capable of having an abstract thought. And since this flea assumes that the dog is not able to have abstract thoughts, though it has no way of determining whether this is true or not... since this fucking arrogant stupid flea is able to have abstract thoughts and invent imaginary non-existent ideas and assumptions of abstract ownership... why that means that this fucking flea is the most intelligent thing in the whole fucking Universe, and can 'own' the dog it lives on and depends on for Life, and the dog can be used by that flea for its own selfish personal gain without having to be responsible for anything it does to the dog.

Using the abstract ability to imagine imaginary ownership as a claim to superior intelligence and superior authority and power is cyclical logic; which is 100% bullshit. Because humans do not go to the trouble of tracing the logic of their assumptions back to their origins. Because they do not go to the trouble of tracing the origins of their own history back to the roots where they came from, because they do not bother to connect the facts together logically; this accumulation of crap called human history which civilized humans read about and accept as being normal is never questioned.

The entire idea of owning something bigger than you are... is insane. You cannot own the ocean or the air. The idea of owning something smaller than you are is insane. You cannot own an electron or a molecule. The idea of owning yourself is insane. What you are cannot be owned. The idea of owning your own organs is insane. You do not own your brains or your heart or your lungs. They live because all of them function cooperatively. Your brains don't try to tell your lungs how to breath and your lungs don't try to your brain how to think. The idea of owning other people is insane. The idea of owning anything is insane... The idea of ownership comes from using others. It comes from using tools. It comes from millions of years of insane human using and never giving back what they used. It comes from millions of years of humans destroying what they use. It comes from millions of years of tool-using apes destroying everything they use with their tools. The evil of financial usury comes from the same root of evil. Using anything for your own selfish purposes is intrinsically evil. Until humans grow up and realize that the basic assumption of ownership which their civilization is based upon is completely false; they will never realize that the entire system of civilization is also false and evil.

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

Law

The emergence of the two concepts: ownership and authority came out of human societies simply growing in size once they established settlements. Once there were too many people vying for the same land, the question of ownership forced people to come into conflict: thus threatening the cohesiveness of the group. In order to normalize relationships within the group, boundaries had to be created and upheld. For that you need some kind of central authority. The larger the society, the more difficult to manage, the more it became necessary for a system to make sure that people would coexist peaceably. Otherwise conflict would arise: factions, feuds that could threaten to tear that society apart at the seams.

This problem never existed before in smaller groups simply because the dynamics of accumulation had not yet created an unmanageable mass of people whose numbers were simply too great to effectively cooperate with each other. You can get along with others as a family: even as an extended family. But when you start bunching up more than one extended family, more than one clan: differences arise that cannot be easily worked out.

The concept of law is a cultural stamp of approval upon a society's procedures, beliefs, and values. Whatever is legalized becomes normal-accepted-taken for granted; regardless of how imbalanced, corrupt, or unfair it is. The earliest legal documents determined who owns what. As settlements grew into cities and kingdoms, the concept of law was used to try to keep order in the continually increasing populations. With too many people massed together, too many conflicting interests, rulers tried to enforce human behavior through utterances of authority:

'Thou shalt: or else.' This is the Law of the Land: Obey or be Punished.

All legal systems are based upon the concept of ownership. Add the concept of authority, the concept of the absolute: and you get an abstract system that is designed to determine who owns what, who is guilty and who is innocent... all as an exercise of power from the top on down. From there it is but a short step to the creation of an arrangement that becomes a law. Include the concept of linear reality, linear boundaries, the creation of a linear form of language: writing, and you get Hammurabi's Code.

Law, like all government, is based upon the threat of physical force, violence, and power. Without brute force: no human legal system can exist or survive. So, the dynamic of increased population also created the dynamic of a hierarchically stratified society, which in turn created leaders and the led, which created power and authority, which in turn created the system by which this power was enforced as a enforced norm called Law... which those who were ruled; hated, resisted, rebelled against, avoided, disobeyed, ignored, sabotaged, as irresponsibly as possible. And you are expected to believe this is the only way you can get people to be responsible mature adults. The idea sold to all lower classes that the tyranny of Law and Order is in their best interests, is the biggest bunch of bullshit since Kings declared that they were living gods and expected to be worshipped by all their subjects and obeyed without question.

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

War

The effect of all tool innovation including the domestication of animals had one common result: it increased the wealth and power of human society. Once different groups could become wealthier or more powerful than others; this imbalance created conflict and warfare was inevitable. Before this explosion of tool innovation, there was little difference in the size, strength, or wealth of any nomadic band. There was no reason for raiding or warring upon people who did not own anything and who did not accumulate anything including territory. It was only the newfound ability to accumulate that created warfare: simply because the accumulation of any wealth automatically created envy and greed. Conflicts arose when cultural lifestyles and values became based upon accumulation instead of cyclic regeneration. The dynamic of war is based upon accumulation: you can only get an army by packing together as many men as possible into a solid mass of accumulated bodies. The entire idea is that the larger accumulation of packed men wins by routing and dispersing the other pack of massed men. The concept of victory is based upon the accumulation of men and power.

Once humans developed the abstract concept of ownership to include territorial rights: conflicts over these rights, warfare, raiding, became inevitable. Whether this happened due to the creation of a settled lifestyle which necessarily included the ownership of land, or whether territorial rights and conflicts arose before civilized settlements is unknown. But in all aboriginal cultures that are settled; there is continual strife between tribes, villages, and bands, regardless of how sparsely populated the area is. Was warfare a training ground for developing hunting skills? Was it due to the clash of cultures or languages? Once Asiatic Mongols started using horses, they became incredibly warlike. So did the North American plains Indians. War is usually a manifestation of accumulated power. Regardless whether a culture is settled or nomadic; warfare usually has a territorial imperative of some kind. You cannot have territorial warfare unless you have already developed the concepts of... Ownership, Accumulated Power... the concept of all forms of accumulation as being good... and become greedy or envious, and start fearing or hating other people.

The dynamics of accumulation, greed, wealth, power, fame, are all plausible reasons for the emergence of warlike cultures and the cult of the warrior being glorified. In fact, without these motivations: war could not exist. The most obvious one is overpopulation. Once human societies became overpopulated, over-complicated, over-conflicted... once a powerful authority could forcefully mobilize an entire society to do its bidding... once humans overpopulated the areas they lived in, once they started accumulating things; warfare became inevitable.

This only became possible when the cutting-edge tool, had finally trained the human brain how to use linear concepts. Only when human perception had evolved into this condition of seeing everything separately, only when language and culture had evolved so humans were capable of thinking in abstract symbols-sounds; did the concept of absolute separation come to be used in how we lived. Then we began to us this concept in countless creative ways. Only then did we begin to own and accumulate things.

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

One of these ways was the concept of ownership; another outgrowth of this idea was the concept of the abstract linear line. What should be noted is that a line has two balanced functions: separation and connection. But our use of this concept is mostly one-sided and imbalanced.

For example: take the linear-like fibers of a tree. They have two basic functions: separation and connection. This allows the different areas of a tree to function separately from each other. It allows the integrity of its different organisms to be protected from the elements, and from each other. But it is also crucial in allowing all of its life sustaining functions to connect to each other. It gives the tree connective flexibility, connective structural strength. If only one aspect of its linear design worked, it could not live, it could not exist. If its connective aspects were missing, it would explode into its constituent parts. It is only the balance of these two aspects, which makes it possible to exist at all, that is: Connection-Separation existing in a state of Dynamically Balanced Splitness. In fact it is not a balance at all: the connectivity of a tree far outweighs its separations. The linear aspects of its fibers connect far more than they separate.

What this illustrates is that the basic concept of absolute separation, of one-sided separation with no connection is anti-life. The entire premise of separation with no connection is anti-life. It makes perfect sense for a tool: tools are not alive and do not have to be concerned with such issues. But not for living things.

The emergence of civilization marks a crucial point in human abstractive evolution: Humans becoming so connected-to, and identifying-with their own abstract ideas, having become so separated from the Actual Universe they exist in, that Abstraction became more real than Actuality.

As a result: Abstract Reality was created.

Where did it come from? Go back to Africa and the bone technology of walking apes. The use of bones; to symbolically represent animals that once were alive. Counting how many had died; by counting their bones. Lining up bones in a row. Linearly.

Where do you think writing came from? Where do you think the idea of the written line came from? Short lines in a row... some parallel, some crossed. Bones in a row, some parallel, some crossed. Even the idea of using a period for an 'i'... the cap or tip of the bone broken off. The Capital letter. One bone longer than another. Holding bones in your hand for thousands of years. Using them for thousands of years. Counting them for thousands of years. Using them to represent animals that had once been alive.

How much of a stretch is it to represent an animal that had been alive, three-dimensional, and round; with a stick of a bone... to representing that animal with a line drawn in the sand representing the bone, which had once represented a living animal? Once you begin counting anything: you automatically strip things to the bone. Once you begin using bones: you automatically have something that is stripped of living flesh. You already have something that is more two-dimensional.

The entire universe of abstract thought which humans erect inside their own minds became more real than their Outer Actual Universe. Everything that they created with their tools became more important than anything which was not created by their tools. The imbalance of their Inner and Outer awareness took on a one-sided evolutionary path of the Imbalanced Splitness called: Inner Reflectivity: or, the development of abstraction.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

As human population accumulated into cities, humans began building walls.

Walls have a two-fold function: one is to separate individual living space and give people privacy from their overcrowded environment. To keep people out, and to keep people in.

Another function of walls is cutting off all awareness of your outer environment. Once the tool-culture of humans evolved to the sophistication of a walled city, they had no use for any greater Outer-Awareness. Since they were not living in Nature, outdoors: developing that part of their awareness was literally cut-off because it was not needed. And along with it, their greater sense of awareness or wonder was cut off also.

The fundamental shift of human existence and awareness from living as nomadic foragers to living in densely populated areas brought about by an explosion of tool-use and innovation. However, it was also a fundamental shift in awareness due to a new kind of environment, the use of new tools. It came about by a shift in human awareness: in how people used their awareness, trained it, focused it, and developed it. It came about by the human brain developing a reality where it could imagine, create, and bring into concretion a tool-constructed environment that was both abstract and linear in nature. Linear fibers of flax were used to become linear threads called lines, or in the plural of a cloth made of linear threads: linen. What was happening was that our tool-brain was becoming more dominant. Now it was possible not only to create abstract lines, but fight over abstract lines. Let another group of people encroach on somebody else's land and the owners of that land became threatened. Their livelihood was based on holding that land. As a result, the concept of modern war was created. This concept is very simple: draw an abstract line anywhere you want and kill anyone who dares to cross it.

How much conflict, how much death and horror has been created by the creation and delineation of imaginary lines-boundaries-borders? If you examine history: it is an endless conflict between imaginary-created abstract lines and actual human conditions. After every war: the new national boundaries which are enforced; merely become a cause for the next series of conflicts and wars. The endless greed for power and possessions has driven the human race into a frenzied attempt to slice up the entire planet like some global pie. In modern times: what has been the human cost in suffering, violence and death from drawing an imaginary line and splitting up countries into two segments... like Ireland? Or the American Civil War? Or South and North Korea? Or North and South Vietnam? How much suffering and further wars has been created by the re-drawing of arbitrary boundaries such as the treaty of Versailles after the 1st World War? Or Palestine and Israel? Or the destruction of all tribal boundaries in colonized Africa... now frozen into nation states with no unifying language or culture? All because humans draw abstract lines, and worship and sanctify these dead abstract lines more than living things and living boundaries.

Land is only one part of an ecosystem. The animals, plants, insects, microbes, which inhabit these ecosystems cannot be penned up into convenient compartments and owned. Water in the forms of clouds, rain, groundwater, humidity, moisture, lakes, rivers, oceans, glaciers, snow, ice; cannot be easily sectioned off and owned. Neither can the sunlight or the air, or the atmosphere. How much sense does it make to attempt to section off only one aspect of an ecosystem? Simply because it is the only one which is not as volatile or dynamic as the rest? Simply because the minerals and stones that make up the

323

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

earth are the deadest, lowest forms of energy? Simply because earth is a solid material that does not move and is not a gas or liquid? We need all three elements to live: Earth, Air and Water. All living creatures need the same three elements to live as we do. What right do we have to steal one of these 3 elements from them and claim it all to ourselves? None whatsoever. No living creature has the right to own the whole world. The idea of abstract ownership is insane. Because if you do that, if you make human rights of ownership sacrosanct, and place them above all other rights: then you upset all the other factors. Suddenly all other living organisms no longer have any right to even exist. Suddenly all the other living creatures on this earth have no place to live anymore. Suddenly we are destroying their natural habitats and building suburbs. Suddenly all the Earth and all the Air and all the Water can be destroyed and polluted. Suddenly all other living things are faced with the threat of extinction because of one insane species: us.. Suddenly the entire basis of Life on this planet is threatened.

Why are we doing this? Because of the abstract concept of human ownership. Because of the concept of absolute separation. Because of the concept of the linear line. The entire history of human environmental destruction exists simply because it is a logical extrapolation of the concept of absolute separation and linear reality. Our abstract creations became more real and more important than the Actual Earth we live on. How relevant is this to everyday human existence? We exist within civilization. Civilization exists within Nature. Nature exists only upon one, small, fragile planetary eco-sphere.

The only sane solution to living on this planet for any extended period of time is to coexist with other living things in a balanced manner. Unless we put our life-situation into its proper context and perspective: we will never possess the wisdom to make the right choices.

If you make the abstract linear line sacrosanct above all else. If you make any abstract line more sacred and more important than anything else... if you translate everything into abstract linear lines. If you translate human awareness at the root level... into linear abstract lines-words-writing-borders-walls-threads... then human awareness becomes an abstract awareness which is divorced and separated from the actual Universe at such a root level that human awareness becomes literally insane.

Why is diamond cutting the most sacred of all uses of human tools? Why are jewels more valuable and sacred than even gold? Because the making of jewels uses the oldest, most obsolete, the most ancient technique of tool making. It uses the same technique that the 1st ape used to make the 1st tool. It is a regression. The most valued things in human civilization: jewels and diamonds are valued because they represent and preserve the oldest most obsolete techniques of tool making. The value systems and priorities of human civilization are the reverse of progress. They are the opposite of progress. They are upside down values. They are reversed values. They are insane values. The creation of the cutting tool evolved to become an abstract imaginary line that has been used to separate: not connect... And what has been the result of thousands of years of drawing these abstract imaginary lines?

Then you get the questionable problem of where do you draw the line... and why? Where do you draw an ethical line? Where do you draw a moral line? Where do you draw a territorial line? Where do you draw an abstract line of any sort...? And turn it into an actual road, an actual wall, an actual tradition, an actual ethic, and an actual value-idea-expression that is concreted by you. Where do you draw the line and say no more? Where do you draw a line and build a wall between yourself and the rest of the world? Where do you draw the line that limits you? Where do you draw the line that limits others? Where do you draw the line and not dare step to over it? What do you forbid by drawing a line? What do you limit by drawing an abstract imaginary line? Then you get uncoordinated random line-drawing. Then you get each person drawing their own personal moral-ethical lines out of pure expediency and convenience. Then you get people fighting over where the line is drawn. Then you get people fighting for the power to draw the line. Once the line is drawn and the wall is built: who dares tear down that wall? Who dares to tear up the road that was built? Once a wall is built: people get used to it being there. Once a road is built: people follow it without thinking who built that road and why it was built and if the road is going in the right direction, or if it should even be used at all. Then as years pass it becomes normal, it all becomes taken for granted. All the walls and roads and buildings and territorial boundaries invented because humans can imagine an abstract line-separation where there was no separation, and make that abstract imaginary separation concrete... accumulates and accumulates until nobody can go anywhere or do anything because everything is forbidden and limited by concreted lines, and everyone must follow these concrete lines and never ask questions and never ask why all these linear abstract pieces of shit exist in the first place because the abstract line is more important than all of: Life. A living creature is not important: an abstract line made concrete is holy and sacred and fought over and preserved and perpetuated religiously and mindlessly because abstract symbols are sacred and never to be touched or questioned or challenged: why? "Because that's ad way we usually do it."

Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

A good example is the debate about the medical research of cloning humans. Science claims that if it allowed to do stem-cell research of human DNA, then it may be able to find a cure for such diseases as Alzheimer's. So far, this kind of research has been banned in the U.S. But not in other countries. Now South Korea of all places, has cloned a human egg and is trying to grow it into a baby. It took over 200 unsuccessful attempts that destroyed over 200 fertile eggs before it finally worked. If Science finds that this cloning can avoid certain birth defects known to exist in the donor's sperm and egg... Some scientists claim that this is an ethical reason enough to continue this type of research in stem cell research.

It has also been discovered that genetic manipulation of drugs can give athletes more massive muscles. Some scientists say that this is not an ethical use of cloning research. Of course, since they are not professional athletes whose careers can be determined by the extent of their muscle build-up... they can safely sneer at such a self-serving 'unethical' use of their research. However, once they do develop such cloning techniques, and DNA altering drugs... do you think all the athletes in the world will suddenly refuse to use this new technology? Because a bunch self-serving scientists who only want to use that technology for their interests say that other uses are 'unethical' ...?

Where do you draw the ethical line of scientific research? Where do you draw the moral line? Then every living human becomes a God who has the power to decide what personal ethic or moral, or rationale they wish to live by... without ever having to study ethics or morals, or be trained, or tested for their logic, their honesty, or their intent in creating their own self-serving ethics and morals. It is little surprise that civilized humans secretly see themselves as superior creatures. It is little wonder that human ethics and morals is a mess which makes no common sense... Simply because humans have been evolving the use of abstract lines for over 12,000 years. Simply because abstraction has replaced Actuality in human awareness at a root level of human awareness and human culture. Manipulation is sacred: the ability to use tools is more sacred than anything else in human civilization. It is what sets us apart from the other animals. Does it make any fucking sense? No. It doesn't matter how much we kill living things as long as we can keep on using tools to manipulate things with because 'that's what we've always done it, and also it makes us feel special because we can use tools to kill other living things with'. Does this make any fucking sense? No.

Conclusion

Long before we actually began living in settled villages, tool innovation forced us to centralize ourselves: Tools were forcing modern humans to come together simply because our tools had become specialized. You can see this obvious dynamic today. If your car breaks down, and you live far out in the country. Trying to find replacement parts for it is almost impossible. But if you live in a large city where there are hundreds of auto-parts stores specializing in all kinds of things: you can find your part quickly and easily, and you do not have to drive 30, or 50 miles to find it. If you live in a city and need someone who does some specialized work: you can find them. But if you live far out in the country: you will not find them.

All of our tool skills became so specialized that nomadic tribes traveled hundreds of miles just so they could get a fletched arrow that was straight and re-usable, pots that were better than they could make, leather garments that only skilled craftsmen knew how to make. It made practical sense to put all of these specialized workers into one place. This way you could get your arrows and your pots in one place. This way you didn't have to travel miles and miles for each single one of your specialized tool-needs. Tools created the need for centralization. If our tools had not become so specialized. If every human had developed the same skill with tools as every other human as they had before civilization for millions of years. There would have been no need and no desire for us to centralize ourselves into larger and larger tribes and clans, and finally, small villages and then cities.

The same applies to human overpopulation. If we had not increased our populations, if we had not had too many babies too fast: we would not have needed to band together against larger groups: just to protect ourselves from being killed, robbed, raped, and murdered.

Making better tools, more specialized tools, creating more specialized skills, having more people, creating centralized population centers that bred more people, creating more territorial conflicts, needing more people to protect us from more people, needing better tools to kill ourselves with, as tools improved, and evolved to become even more specialized, and the rate of our population grew and grew... All these vicious cycles grew out of each other. All of these vicious cycles grew out of the same dynamic:

The Dynamics of the Tool: { Separation
Segmentation
Accumulation
Pyramidalization

Civilization only began around 10,000 to 12,000 years ago. Before the emergence of settlements most of the world was populated very sparsely with nomadic tribes that had already been spreading out from Central Asia for tens of thousands of years. It was from the center of Asia, which the most recent waves of migrating tribes spread out in all directions across the earth to settle in different areas. These waves of migration continued up until around 1400 A.D.... when the Mongol Empire of Genghis Khan exploded upon the scene. Only to be quickly absorbed, or taken over by the existing settled cultures the nomads conquered. For thousands of years: the most powerful military weapon had been the horse-archer. Up until the 14th Century, the superior mobility, speed and long-range killing power of the horse-archer gave Nomads the power and means to continually expand onto settled civilizations... while preventing settled civilizations from conquering their homelands. But, with the invention of invention of artillery and firearms, these expanding waves of Nomadic migration and conquest were halted.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

The birth of civilization resulted in a profound increase of physical ease, a lack of physical movement, a completely different outlook on Life. It was a profound splitting of an entire species into two completely different lifestyles: nomadic and sedentary. Active and inactive; mobile and immobile. One was healthy; the other was sick. Both of them had already developed vicious cycles of territorial greed and conquest and endless expansion. The humans who remained nomads developed their own forms of civilization-culture through the domestication of animals, and tool innovation. This allowed their population to accumulate from small bands into affiliated tribes or clans called Nations. Most of the last 10,000 years of human history has to do with the constant strife between settled and nomadic civilizations. This splitting of humans into two conflicting opposed lifestyles lasted until the 14th - 16th Centuries with the end of the last Mongol empires.

This was all an inevitable dynamic of overpopulation. It is the one-sided dynamic of one-sided accumulation at work. Once overpopulating Humans ran out of space to roam in: then there came the chaotic whirlwind of this single species constantly accumulating, increasing its population, expanding into each others territory; encroaching upon itself in endless waves of expansion and collapse as nomadic and sedentary cultures vied for supremacy. Fighting amongst themselves. The origin of all social conflict came from this overcrowding, the accumulation of numbers, the steadily increasing level of overpopulation... which is merely the one-sided dynamic of accumulation without any cyclic down-curve of depopulation. It began with the increasing population density of our species, i.e. accumulation. It forced us into a perpetual imbalanced context of self-conflict. Now we compete against each other in order just to survive: rather than competing as we were originally designed to... against the natural balancing elements of Nature which makes Life interesting and exciting.

So what has the condition of people being piled up into masses, into cities done? It has created the conditions of overpopulation, power, cultural oppression, conflict, irresponsibility, greed, war, and corruption. It created all the ingredients necessary for increasing and intensifying human misery and suffering. Settled civilizations expanded, became Nations, then Empires. Nomadic tribal civilizations expanded, became Nations, then Empires. Today, nomadic life has almost completely disappeared as a way of human life. The history of civilization has been the growing imbalance of this relatively recent, new form of human existence slowly extinguishing a much older one through the dynamic of accumulation... Settled civilizations expanded, occupied, and took over all the major habitable landmasses of the Earth; thus extinguishing nearly all nomadic existence: and thereby creating a more imbalanced condition of human existence and sedentary life styles.

Once the new technology of agriculture was in place, new forms of tool-use developed. Once the concept of the ownership of land was invented, the invention of the abstract-linear line followed. The tool-brain began relating-to, connecting-to its own abstract reality and projecting it out onto the world. Human abstract reality became increasingly linear. The tool-brain created abstract lines: the tool created concrete lines. This reinforced feedback made the expression of both human reality and normality primarily linear. The basic invention of the tool-brain: language was then transformed into a set of linear lines. Writing was invented. The old system of barter was replaced by an equivalent of actuality; or abstract symbols. These symbols were then concreted back into segments of metal: money was invented... which was then further abstracted back into pieces of paper. This abstract system became the dominant, universal measure of all things. More and more: every conceivable thing, idea, claim; was translated into money.

Population centers around farming areas grew denser until cities were developed. The separation and

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

segmentation of people became piled up into layered strata of class distinction. Throughout the world the same process of accumulation unfolded: people raised piles of stone into accumulated heaps called Ziggurats, Towers, Temples, Pyramids. The example of ancient Egypt shows how pure this blind drive had become. For thousands of years, a significant part of its human resources was devoted to the piling up of stone segments into Pyramids of dead stone. All of the early offshoots of civilization did this, and all of them crumbled... only for new civilizations to rise out of the ruins and began piling up things anew, and more creatively... In China it became The Great Wall. In Europe it became Cathedrals. In Renaissance Italy it became Towers. No matter what form it took: whether it was practiced by Individuals, Groups, Tribes, Clans, Nations, or Empires: they all practiced this same dynamic, this same process. Separation: Segmentation: Accumulation: Pyramidalization.

As civilization continued to separate and segment, the cohesiveness of this pyramidal accumulation fragmented into more creative-abstractive forms. Human pyramidal focus was manifested in countless creative, abstract ways. The dynamic of separation-segmentation-accumulation-pyramidalization-preservation and perpetuation was, and is evident in everything humans did, and continue to do.

Look at any aspect of civilization; look at any aspect of human civilized existence and you will see the same thing. To wit: the separation-segmentation-manipulation-accumulation-pyramidalization-preservation of dead things. All abstractively-creatively different, unique.

The point is; the degree or level of each part of this process-dynamic is irrelevant. The degree of pyramidalization, the degree of pyramidal prioritizing, the degree of pyramidal values is irrelevant. The order in which they are piled up, what is placed where; is irrelevant. How you use this dynamic, what you separate, what you value, what you accumulate, how much you do it, how you do it, is irrelevant.

Because it is basically all the same dynamic and it has the same basic effect. The way these dynamics work have not changed and will not change until we change the basic dynamics at the root level. Human pyramidal focus itself remains unchanged. The same basic dynamic applies to all of human civilization. As proof, I challenge anyone to find one civilized exception to this basic set of dynamics. The fact that there are no exceptions makes the indisputable truth of these assertions crystal clear.

Now we can see how this begins to make sense of our past history.

The biofeedback of hand-eye coordination between the tool and the tool-brain in hominid apes produced hominids with larger brains... which ultimately produced us. A long series of earlier imbalanced splits created our dominant tool-brain, producing the imbalanced split between human Inner and Outer Awareness...

which created Time Awareness, and a further imbalanced Inner Awareness... which created the human ego... which in turn created the Imbalanced Split between Wonder and Fear... which split off human awareness from the Actual Universe... which split the human psyche into perceptions of Reality and Normality... all of which created Abstractions called language, culture, and civilization.

This created an entirely new condition of human awareness and existence. Suddenly you have a growing accumulation of power, authority, irresponsibility, greed, war, law, linear reality, roads,

328

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Five: Modern Humans:
The transition from hunter-gatherers to settlements

writing, etc. Accumulating at an exponential rate which never stops going faster and faster and faster... more and more and more... The trouble is, it all happened simultaneously. And it is continuing to happen. So far it hasn't stopped... yet.

This makes it literally impossible using any linear form of language or logic to properly explain or describe their complex evolution in one linear line of causal, logical story-telling. There are simply too many inter-connected relationships involved. The complexity is so enormous, that it boggles the mind. Even using the most sweeping generalities, you would need six-sided words to stick in all the connections which exist. It is only now, that by connecting and integrating our collected knowledge, we now can gain a larger perspective over our own history and our own true nature. Now we can begin to look at what effect all this has had upon us with a better perspective and understanding. Now we can study the effect of civilization upon humans.

But remember this... what created all this, the engine which drove it, the dynamic which produced it all was the dynamic of our ever-increasing population, of too many people having too many babies... too many people fucking, the oldest sin of the Jewish Old Testament: the original sin of Carnal Knowledge, the sin of sexual self-gratification and self-indulgence: not for the purpose it is designed for, the survival and propagation of a species; but merely because as apes who have no tails and stood up on two legs and started using tools and started fucking too much... using tools allowed us to move out of the small ecological niches we had been living in so we could spread out all over the entire Earth.

The root causes of the one-sided accumulation and the increasing overpopulation of too many people is millions of years old. A Naked ape whose male genitalia and female nipples were no longer hidden under its belly, but exposed for all to see because it stood up on two legs. It is no wonder that the first apes who stood up felt ashamed about their exposed sexual organs, it is no wonder in the biblical story of the first humans; Adam and Eve; they sought to cover up their exposed sexual organs. Humans still do not want to face this nasty truth about themselves: that we are a pornographic species who fuck too much. A species that has no self-control over its lowest animal instincts is not superior to other animals: it is inferior to them. The disconnect between the upper and lower half our bodies took millions of years to develop: a penis disconnected from its brain; fucking and overpopulating the Earth with too many naked apes. A brain disconnected from its penis; manufacturing nuclear penises called missiles; this is not a sign of intelligence: it is a sign of insanity, it is a sign of pure, stark raving madness. The human male penis and the metal penises of manufactured bullets, missiles and bombs are both out-of-control; they are the result of human overpopulation. We are overpopulating the Earth with too many human babies and too many bullets and too bombs and too many nuclear missiles. The result is the insanity of two World Wars, mass genocides, the mass slaughter of animals, the mass slaughter of fish, the mass slaughter of birds and all the other ills created from billions of people using tools destructively... just so they can overpopulate the entire Earth with their numbers even more. This is not a sane reason to live, it is not a sane way to live. Unless Man can control himself, unless He stops his mindless killing and fucking and hating; He will destroy not only himself but the entire Earth as well.

The reason civilized humans cannot find any true meaning to their lives is because civilization has no true meaning to it. The reason civilized humans have not been able to find any true meaning in their lives is because there is no meaning in mass overpopulation, mass consumption, mass slaughter and the mass destruction of the Earth. Only when humans reverse their entire way of living from destroying all Life to nurturing and helping all Life and helping all living things to flourish and grow, will any human ever find any Positive meaning to their life.

The Beginnings of Civilization

Human history has never been a monolithic tale of one species, one population, in one area... It is a vast, dispersed, global unfolding of diverse populations and countless factors. The many disparate paths of humans in different areas make any single time-line account of what little we know of our past: hopelessly confusing. However, with a broad enough perspective: certain aspects can be seen as being generally universal.

In the beginning: all human societies were the same size. All human societies were composed of bands of people. The anthropological term: 'band': specifically means a group of humans; numbering between 25 to 35 individuals. Anthropologists have found that for over a hundred thousand years before civilization was invented: all human societies were basically the same size. All of them existed as small bands; of 25-35 people; with no exceptions. This is very, very important. Throughout the entire world, over a period of time so huge it dwarfs the lifespan of civilization: the social model of all modern human structures was universally the same size. The significance of this fact is so huge, that its importance cannot be stressed enough.

This was how large human societies were meant to be, and are still designed to be. We are not designed to form any human social group larger than 36 individuals. We were never designed to form any human social group larger than 36 individuals. Once the magic number of 36 was arrived at: the group either split off into smaller bands of 12 or 24 people, or it found a way of getting rid of its extra people in some way. Today in civilization: human groups do not exist in these sizes anymore. They do not exist in the special numbers of 12, 24 and 36. These special numbers of 12, 24 or 36 people have never been allowed to form as a social group inside civilization. Why is this? Because no mass of overpopulated humans can abide a natural community living that is socially healthier than it is within it. Civilized societies are always larger than 36 people. Civilized communities are always larger than 36 people. Or smaller than 24, or smaller than 12. 36 was the magic limiting number of all human societies before civilization was invented.

For at least 100,000 years, this was the natural number for the size of all human communities. The entire history of the overpopulation of human species has been an avoidance of this special number. This is very important information. When a species that existed universally as a community in the same numbers, suddenly changes its social structure and refuses to go back to the size that worked for 100,000 years: there is something very, very wrong about this. There is something very, very fishy about the coincidence that for 12,000 years now: no human community or society has allowed themselves to be in a group numbering 36, 24 or 12 people. These three numbers are the most powerful natural numbers in the Universe. These numbers are very, very powerful in their own right. They have the power to change human awareness and how humans live. They have the power to make people become better human beings naturally. Logically. The very LOGIC of the number of people within the group will transform every person in that group.

The only two known mythic example of these numbers in the history of all human civilization: is the mythic 12 disciples of Jesus, and the 12 mythic knights of King Arthur. The trouble with these groups is the unlucky number of 13. There were 12 disciples plus one more; there were 12 Knights of the Round Table plus one more. Neither of these two mythic groups ever existed as cooperating community without the unlucky added 13th member which guaranteed all their enterprises would fail. Never in human history have 12 people lived together as a community for any extended time without a leader. This in itself is an eery, strange, unexplained mystery. You would think that after we over populated the earth in our thousands, and then hundreds of thousands, and then our millions, and then our hundreds of millions, and then our billions... that somewhere along the line, somebody, somehow, somewhere, would find themselves living as a community of 12, 24, or 36 individuals as cooperating individuals. But this has never happened.

One reason why this has never happened is that the basic Triality of human society was destroyed when humans stopped living as independent bands of 36 people with no leaders. The reason anthropologists have never found any evidence of any band of people more than 35 is because when the magic number of 36 is exceeded: then the group has two options: either to choose a leader, or go back to their incomplete number of 35, and have no leader. For how long is any group exactly 12 or 24 or 36 people? The math tells you that any small group will be imbalanced for most of its existence. Most of the time it will not have exactly 12 or 24 or 36 people in it. Thus; automatically: before the magic numbers of 12 or 24 or 36 are ever arrived at: there will already be a leader existing in the group before this happens.

That leader is the invisible buffer which separates 2 Totalities from touching each other. But wait... if you have a group of 12 people with one person as a leader: then the dynamic is 11-1... not 12. And if the group increases to 13... That number is 12-1... which is 13... Not 12... By this sabotaging of the equality of a mathematical harmonically balanced group from the very beginning: the magic number of 12 or 24, or 36 is never achieved. Only if a group of people grows from 2 to 3 etc all the way up to 12... with NO leader at all: only then can it for a brief time in its existence, be a mathematically balanced social dynamic that is logical and powerful as a single group. And if at any time in this groups history of development, one person becomes the leader of that group: it will never be a Totality of 12. It will always be either a group of 11 or 13... And even then: it will be these numbers only for a short time. And even then...

Groups of 13 people cannot co-exist with each other peacefully simply because each leader will try to dominate and win the position at the top. The result is: whenever any two small groups with a leader try to form a larger group, there is conflict... until the 2 groups merge into a single group: led by one leader. Which again, makes it mathematically impossible for that group to ever reach the logical number of 24 as a Balanced Duality of two groups of 12. Because when 24 is reached: it is actually 23 + 1... and when 25 is reached... and exists for a short time: the leader is so powerful, the fact that he or she even exists, destroys all dynamics of equality simply by the fact that the group's social dynamics during its entire history and formation were not based upon the dynamics of equality, and the short period when the group is 24 or 25: there is not enough time to develop an entirely new dynamic before that magic number disappears. It is not long enough to force any basic change in the entire social dynamics of the group.

Three leaders of three groups of 12 cannot co-exist unless they are all so perfectly matched as equals that they agree not to try to dominate the other two: this has never happened and will never happen. Once you have three leaders instead of two: one will eventually triumph over the other two. As long as there are only two leaders of 12 then they can partnership their forces and compete against each other, and have a balance of power. But again: then you don't have 24, you have 26... 13 + 13 which is actually 12+1+12+1... which is not the magic number of 12-12 But even that is fleeting. Sooner much more than later, one leader will stand out and the harmonic balance will be lost.

And even then: the magic number of 12 + 1 has never existed except in myth of King Arthur and his 12 knights... and for one short, tiny span of time in history... when Jesus finally found his 12th disciple... The instant he did that... the entire group revolted against him, and began arguing with each other... and plotted to get rid of him... And when they finally managed to find a way to have him killed: the sin of that crime drove them apart from each other and they never again came together as a single Totality of 12... Yet even so... the power of them existing for a tiny, brief span of a few short weeks as a group of 12 equals: changed human history beyond imagining, beyond conception. To think that a group of the lowest, most powerless, hunted criminals of a tiny sect of fanatics in the poorest section of Judea: unable to even agree with each other about anything. After they split up... were strong enough to become the most powerful Western religion of the most powerful Western Empire to ever exist... and then... outlast that empire, take over that Empire...not as a military power, but as a spiritual power... and spread its religious dogma all over the world... That is the only example of how powerful the magic number of 12 equals is... that is the only example we have in all human history. It is the only example of how powerful the magic number of 12 can be... Humans should take note of this: it is crucial, and very important. Once humans recreate these magic numbers of 12-24-36 as the universal size in which their communities are formed: humans will then again, share a universal culture so basic, that humans will be able once again to coexist with each other no matter how large the total numbers are or what specific culture they are. This has been prevented and poisoned for 12,000 years by civilization. Modern humans think they know better how to structure their mass societies than people who did it successfully for 100,000 years. Well: what has been the outcome of not following this universal design structure of human communities for 12,000 years? 12,000 years of overpopulation and war: that's what. We are genetically designed to live in communities of not more than 36 and not less than 12 people. This is the universal number for all human communities to live as. This is the only way we can act as intelligent humans and not as gangsters in gangs: but in bands that are not criminal, lawless, undisciplined, unsupervised bunches of male killers on the prowl.

Another reason this happened is more basic: human societies changed their basic way of functioning from cooperation to competition. 3 groups of 12 people can co-exist easily with each other: as long as their basic ethics are based upon cooperation. But once the basic ethic of cooperation is changed into competition, then never mind 36 people, never mind 24 people, never mind 12 people... then not even two people can co-exist with each other peacefully. The ethic of adversarial competition destroys ALL human social structure and all social bonds. The ethic of competition makes it impossible for humans to live together: period.

The logic of this is obvious: before there were leaders: there had to be an ethic of cooperation. Once the basic ethics of humans changed from cooperation to competition: then leaders were created as a result of the change in human ethics. You cannot have a competitive society without leaders. You cannot have a cooperative society with leaders. Once they had leaders: they were led. They were led out of Africa by leaders. They were lead: they were dead lead: dead souls, with no self esteem or individuality. The word lead is the word for the heaviest grayest deadest material in the world: the most malleable, the softest inert dead metal on earth. They became what they named this material: gray souls: dead, grey, lifeless, plodding followers following leaders instead of happy healthy cooperating people who had unique personalities that were not trodden down and squashed.

The fact of human overpopulation automatically forced bands to become more hostile towards each other. The more bands there were, the more these bands infringed upon each others territorial boundaries. The more friction there was between bands, the more fighting there was over who would control and use certain areas. The more fighting and friction there was: the more killers were valued as opposed to cooperators. The more human bands overpopulated the areas they lived in: the more they had to fight other bands just to survive: the more valued dominant personalities called leaders became, as opposed to cooperative personalities, the more they needed aggressive leaders who would not back down if another band tried to infringe upon their territorial rights the more aggressive they had to become just to survive. Bands that had space between each others territories had no reason to become competitive. Overpopulation automatically created friction and competition. Competition automatically created leaders. Leaders automatically became killers. Killers automatically became rapists and oppressors. The destruction of the humanity of the human species happened over 100,000 years ago as a slow evolution of pressures that automatically forced humans to become more and more inhuman. The development of inhumanity, competition, aggression, war, killing, hate etc... came from the increase in population density. It came from population explosions. It came from humans having too many babies. This has not changed, in fact it is increasing. Humans still have not learned how to control their own populations. The vicious cycle of increasing Population density created all the other vicious cycles, and is still creating them, and it is still getting worse and worse...

The latest genetic data shows that Modern Humans originally migrated out of Africa; as small, independent bands into the Mid-East.

Then they went their separate ways, and Split off onto 3 different paths.

Some never left the center of Africa which is not a path of migration so they will not be counted... as they are still not counted because their ancestors had no initiative and no drive to move or change.

The first ones traveled on the shores of Asia until they ended up in Australia.

Others traveled through the Mideast and ended up Asia.

Some ended up in Europe... either directly from Africa, or through the Mideast or from Asia

Basically: we came out of the center of Africa: traveled along the shores of Asia and settled in the center of Australia. And then in the center of Asia. And then we began expanding out from these centers into Europe into the two American continents. After these initial migrations: more tribes came out of Africa, forced by geography to migrate into the Mideast where other tribes had already set up shop. This turned the Mideast into a killing field of tribal conflicts for 100's of thousands of years... which it still is today.

All walking ape migrations before us, including us: began from traveling along shores and later penetrating a continent, and ended up in the center of a continent and then radiating out from that center. First around and then in. The same basic dynamic which Impetus had in the prehistory of shaping of our Universe.

Even the two Americas were populated like this: Down one side of the Americas from the Bering Strait, and down the other side from the Arctic through northern Europe. The overpopulation of later migrations simply drowned out the entire dynamic before the first migrations could play out their own migration pattern without interference from other waves of newer immigrants... The increasing overpopulation of humans which resulted in waves of migrations overrunning each other flooded the entire planet like waves continually crashing against the shores of a beach except they crashed against each other. The whole world was flooded with so many millions of humans that they could not move anymore, they could not migrate anymore without coming into conflict with people who were already living there.

Europe was the last to be colonized as a subcontinent of Asia by Stone Age humans. It was also colonized from the center out just like Asia was later geographically: this does not make sense. Europe is closer to Africa than Asia or Australia. Why didn't modern humans colonize Europe first? The reason we did not colonize Europe first is that we are tectonic animals. Europe is a collection of small tectonic plates jammed together, it is a subcontinent of Asia: it is not a true continent. We colonized the continents in the order of their creation and their age. The migration of humans from Europe to North America matches the migration of tectonic plates that traveled across the Atlantic to end up on the shores of North America so exactly it is amazing. Every major migration from the Portuguese to the Spanish to the Africans to the Dutch to the English is matched with a tectonic plate arriving in the exact same historical order on the shores of North America... and what is even more wondrous, these tectonic plates arrived in the exact same locations where the first Portuguese, Spanish Dutch and English colonies were founded. This is definitely not a coincidence... In fact it turns the idea of human initiative and free will and exploration into a laughingstock. The supposed bravest explorers daring to go where no man has gone before? It turns out we were only following the tectonic plates which had made those trips to land on the shores of the New World millions of years ago.

The colonizing migrations and movements of the human species matches exactly; the migrations and movements of the tectonic plates of the Earth and the migration of continents splitting off from the super continent Pangaea. Africa was the first continent to be formed. Australia was flung off after that. It was the second continent we inhabited, Asia was the third, Europe was the Fourth and South America was the fifth with North America closely following. This is the exact order of continents we migrated to first, and colonized. This was also the same exact order in which the continents were first formed. This is not a coincidence. If this were not true: the first Africans would have, and should have colonized Europe first. Not all the way over in Australia, ignoring everything else. If closeness and convenience of colonization were what determined where we went: Australia should have been the last continent to be colonized: not the first.

Mass human migration and colonization is instinctive. It does not happen because a certain person just happens to explore farther. The Grand Banks between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland were fished for hundreds of years before Europeans ever set foot on North America. Europeans colonized each tectonic plate in North America in the exact order the plates themselves migrated from Europe and joined to other plates in North America just like the first modern humans colonized the continents in the exact order the continents split off from the supercontinent of Pangaea...

But I am digressing from the story. The first major migration of modern humans ended up in a dead end: Australia and they stayed there. And did not come out for 75,000 years. They still do not come out. Australian aborigines have no interest in the rest of the world. This book will return them the same courtesy. The main story of this book concerns the later waves of modern humans who ended up in the center of Asia. Exactly when we got to the center of Asia, and how long we stayed there before spreading out is unknown. Generally, the scientific consensus is that modern Humans began spreading out from around Lake Baikal in the center of Asia about 60-50,000 years ago. Except for the modern humans coming out of Africa who settled down along the way during the migration process... and those that never left Africa and the Australian aborigines; all the rest of us can trace our ethnic roots back to central Asia. These modern humans were nomadic, warlike, warring bands. For tens of thousands of years, they migrated out from central Asia. These autonomous bands grew in size. Their social structure changed. They became affiliated tribes, or clans. Their Hunter-gathering technology was based upon nomadic mobility; their cultures were based mostly upon the principles of regeneration and Nature worship.

But they all had on thing in common. They all developed home bases around some body of water. From which they explored their territory and expanded it. This was because they had already been living like this around Lake Baikal. They simply preserved and perpetuated how they lived after they left the waters of Lake Baikal. Once they found where the best food sources were, they developed seasonal nomadic routes in circular ring-paths: that covered the least amount of distance, and hit the richest areas... much like petals blossoming from the center of a water lily... and like the water lily, these home bases and circular-returning routes moved-floated: except they floated over the land instead of the water. Changing locations and home bases as the conditions of the land and eco-systems changed.

Finally twelve thousand years ago in three or four small locations... In the Tigris Valley, the Chin Valley, the Nile valley and the Indus Valley: a few nomadic ancestors stopped traveling, and settled down permanently in one area and began tilling the soil.

The new Agricultural societies were drastically different from the hunter-gatherers. Instead of regeneration, their survival tactics became mainly based upon accumulation. Their basic pyramidal awareness was more developed. Their basic focus shifted from Nature to themselves, from Natural forces to man-made forces, from the worship of Animal Spirits to the worship of Human Spirits. The first agricultural societies became Theocracies. Along with accumulating food: they accumulated Power, Status, Wealth and Knowledge. All early settled civilizations were deified their rulers in one form or another.

What they had invented: was the dynamic of one-sided Accumulation, as a way of living.

Every early civilization has left behind huge piles of Accumulated stone blocks. Literally: everything which was accumulated was worshipped and glorified and preserved. The pyramidal apex of every Accumulation was deified, or glorified, or revered, or respected and sanctified in many, many ways. Whether they did the accumulation themselves or not. Whether it was an artificial Accumulation or not. As long as it looked like one of their pyramidal piles of Accumulation... as long as it was bigger, taller, wider, longer than something else: it was worshipped and revered. Whether it was a tree that stood out in the middle of a clearing, or a peak that stood out from the other mountains, or an animal that was taller, or faster than other animals, or more dangerous than others.

Throughout the continent of Asia: these first civilized settlements emerged only in a few, small locations.

When these sedentary communities were created, they were not the rule: they were a rare exception to the rule. The greater, scattered, nomadic populations outnumbered them by a thousand-to-one. But the population of agricultural societies had an advantage: one-sided accumulation. Their population grew faster than the populations of the nomadic tribes whose lifestyle was based upon regeneration, instead of one-sided accumulation. Whatever they could find and use; they accumulated. Whatever the nomads had: they wanted. And traded for, and stole, and killed for. Until they could say to themselves that they were richer and the nomads were poorer. Until they could finally return the disdain and contempt all nomads had for them, and their lifestyle of one-sided accumulation.

Today, we call this dynamic of one-sided accumulation greed.

The envy and hate, which the settled societies had taught them, by robbing them and envying them their better nomadic lifestyles... and fearing the stronger, healthier nomads; was then returned by the nomads. They began envying the settlements for their riches, and raiding and robbing them. Until they also managed to corrupt the nomads into accumulating things merely for the sake of accumulation. For status. For power. For wealth, and ease. The nomads with the biggest herds became envied by those with smaller herds. They began warring amongst themselves. Out of envy, jealousy and greed. All the civilized vices, which they had once despised and hated, rubbed off on them. Because they kept on rubbing up against civilized settlements that were full of these vices.

This resulted in a major cultural split between settlements and nomadic tribes. The conflicts between the Accumulators and the non-Accumulators. The conflict between the haves and the have-nots: which has now been going on for 36,000 years... and shows no sign of ending. This is one basic stupidity of civilization which no intelligent civilized human has ever faced and analyzed logically. This book does.

This dynamic defined the entire history of the exponential explosion of the one-sided, Accumulating overpopulation of civilized settlement fighting nomadic tribes. And nomadic tribes fighting settled, agricultural societies. Settled civilizations began to grow and expand. Their rate of one-sided accumulation increased. Everything accelerated. Speeding up the growth of their populations, speeding up the rate of tool innovation, and gradually: corrupting, poisoning, and finally: extinguishing nomadic ways of life.

Since the invention of civilization: no other species on Earth has ever seriously threatened or challenged the ability of civilized humans to prosper and flourish by the dynamic of one-sided accumulation. The only serious threat civilized humans have ever faced to their increase in numbers; has been, and continues to be the ever- increasing accumulation and encroachment of their own numbers. As more and more people fought, over less and less available land: more and more conflicts ensued. This ongoing series of crises created by overpopulation alone caused the birth of war. It caused humans to evolve better and better tools to fight each other with.

All because of this dynamic: artificial one-sided accumulation.

Since then: throughout civilized history: the prime catalyst for tool-innovation is, and continues to be warfare, or the art of killing. Overpopulation and War forced us to use more tools. It forced us to innovate and invent better tools. It made human society become increasingly crisis-oriented.

The specialized use of tools split up of the basic communal unit of the band. The social structure of our species was further segmented by our ability to create different languages-cultures-realities-normalities... by the psychological and social effects of Accumulation: Power, Wealth, Fame, Status and Greed: turning us into a race of adversaries and competitors

As the domestication of plants and animals increased; our food supply increased: the birth rate went up, and the rate of population increase accelerated. Population density increased. These larger populations became breeding grounds for even more tool innovation. Permanent settlements and agriculture concentrated accumulating populations into denser areas called cities. Dwellings became linear in shape, pathways became straight lines, walls became straight and roads became straighter. Linear abstract lines took over human existence, human reality, human normality and human awareness in countless different ways. The linear line: coincides with linear tool-use. The more tools we invented that could create a linear line: the more different ways the linear line was used. The use of the plow, the invention of threaded garments, weaving, textiles, design and writing.

Straight line appears everywhere in civilized societies where none had existed before. Abstract Linear Reality evolved out of the linear effect of Tools on humans and the effect of human tool-brains using abstract linear concepts on tools. It was a dynamic of reflective positive feedback between tools and humans. The reflective dynamic of tool-use, and tool-making; changed human awareness and human values in countless ways. The dynamic of one-sided accumulation had another effect. The effect of the Pile. The Pyre, the Pyramid. Humans focused their attention and their energy on anything that was a pile, or in the shape of a pile. This Pyramidal focus shaped the awareness all of our early cultures.

For instance: the Wolf Spirit came to represent not one wolf: but all wolves. Or in other words; a symbolical, pyramidal representation of an Accumulated totality that is pyramidally focused-on, and worshipped. Animal spirits became replaced with whatever was prominent, whatever was piled higher, whatever was more powerful inside human cultures and societies: instead of outside them.

This was one of the most crucial changes of human awareness. It happened simply by the expansion of civilized settlements growing around them: gradually replacing the natural world. It was simply the difference between waking every day surrounded by Nature, and waking up every day surrounded by a village or a city instead of a forest, or a natural environment. Human culture merely reflects what is around it. Then it projects what it reflects and vice versa. The Reflection and Projection of human awareness is the same Dynamic. The only difference is that one is reflected in, and the other is projected out. Just as Diffraction and Refraction are the same dynamic. Only the direction is different. Gods are just Projected Reflections, and Reflected Projections of human awareness that are pyramidally focused upon as figures of invisible authority.

The cultural Reflection and Projection of human awareness is called: Normality and Reality. What is reflected inside your culture becomes culturally normal... it becomes an accepted, unquestioned norm that you take for granted. What is projected outside your culture becomes real to you, it becomes your outer cultural Reality... it is how you see the outer world.

As the Normality and Reality of human cultures became civilized: some Nature Gods managed to survive; most of them faded into obscurity and disappeared. New Gods took their place. As human cultures increasingly separated themselves from Nature: their Deities began to mirror civilized existence instead of Nature. Their Gods became mirrored pyramidal Projections and Reflections of their own civilized life and environment. Just as the Gods of hunter-gatherers had been mirrored pyramidal projections and reflections of nomadic life and their environment.

Each civilization, according to its first arbitrary creative attempt at anthropomorphism created a reflection of itself, tried to preserve its past, its traditions, ideas and values: in a human form instead of an animal form. This was the transition from Nature Worship: to Pyramidal Worship. The Hindu tradition resulted in a collage of ancient animal Gods that had human bodies but animal faces. In China: Nature worship became abstracted and codified into 'The Dao'... or; 'The Way Down', while co-existing with ancestor worship and spirit gods. Chinese Taoism was one of the first examples of human awareness becoming predominantly linear in nature. It was a confusing contradiction of half-assed natural dynamics, and an insane idea that there was only one way to live... There are no straight lines in Nature. Daoism tried to turn Life into a Linear Path so convoluted, nobody could understand it.

The Mid-Eastern Zarathustran tradition became pyramidalized into Fire-Worship on top of mountains.

The Steppe Nomads pyramidalized the sky as their main Deity. With the Incas: the mountains themselves were worshipped. How did the Jewish Semitic culture and religion develop in Egypt? As an ethnic tribe of slaves, building huge stone pyramids for their slave masters... for over 600 years; doomed to serve a, remote, cruel, unseen deified, ruler. Is it any surprise that their God became an impersonal, remote, cruel, unseen, deity? Is it any wonder that their God became an invisible taskmaster that gives commands from on high? Is it any wonder that their God demanded unquestioningly obedience regardless of their circumstances? Is it any wonder that their God gave them a complete, comprehensive code on how they should live? Is it any wonder that their God punished them horribly if they refuse to follow that code to the letter?

No matter which early Religion or Deity you examine: they all have completely understandable origins. In each case, you can see how the Universal Dynamic of Pyramidal Focus is at work. What was the biggest, most important thing around the Mongols? The sky. What was the biggest, most important thing around the Incas? The Mountains. What was the biggest, most important thing around the freezing cold Carpathian Mountains for the Zarathustrans? Lightning. Lightning. that created the high blazing fires in the mountains as a sign of their God's wrath and anger. What was the biggest, most important thing for the Chinese? The constant reverence of their Elders and the oldest possible teachings... why? Because as they gradually destroyed and domesticated the natural environment around them: their Nature Gods faded from importance to such an extent; that their Nature Gods were lost in the mists of Time, and civilized icons took their place in their cultural values. What was the biggest and most important thing around the Semites in Egypt? Their unseen owner, ruler, demi-god; and the huge pyramids they were forced to build for him. What was the biggest, most important thing around the Semite slaves in Egypt? A physical Pyramid along with a strict pyramidal hierarchy of Absolute Authority. Why did Moses have to climb a mountain to receive Commandments from on high? Before the Semites became a race of indentured slaves for the Egyptian Pharaohs, their mystical God gave them insights from ordinary places in Nature. They were visited by a burning bush in the desert that did not extinguish itself; a cultural token of the volcanoes of Africa where they had come from. They were visited in every imaginable place possible by their mystical God; but not on top of a mountain... simply because the environment they lived before they came to Egypt had no mountains and no huge pyramids of stone. But after 600 years of slavery in Egypt: all Godly visitations came from on high: from the apex, the top of something like a mountain, or a pyramid.

The Pyramidity of civilization, the pyramids of Egypt, all of the pyramidal ancient temples and structures, come from the historical legacy their ancestors, from the African volcanoes they once feared and worshipped; from 25 million years of living amongst volcanic eruptions, from our ancestors worshipping volcanoes for 25,000,000 years. The traumatic legacy of 25,000,000 years of volcanoes can be seen in the psychological imprint it has made upon the culture of our species. The shape of the pyramidal volcano is everywhere in human civilization, the dynamic of the volcano is everywhere in the human psyche. World leaders strutting around, having their big 'summit meetings': the sum of importance they get from being on top of a pyramid of apes, the entire idea of power as a pyramidal mountain: what is so fucking powerful about a mountain? Mountains don't have any power: they just sit there and do nothing. Volcanoes have power... volcanoes shaped in the form of a pyramid have power, volcanoes that re-erupt over and over for millions of years, and are recognized from afar and can be seen from afar; like the volcanic mountain of Kilimanjaro have power, smoking guns have power, smoking volcanoes ready to explode at any instant have power. The human obsession with destructive explosive power comes from worshipping volcanoes for millions of years. It is about fucking time we recognize this and admit the historical legacy of our ancestors. It is about time we recognize that we are a bunch of apes that came out of Africa. It is time we admit the fact that we were chased out of Africa by volcanoes. It is time we admit that we cover up our own past just like volcanoes cover up their past.

The Acceleration of Tool Innovation

There is a direct correlation between the explosion of tool-use and the explosion of human population. Stone tools took millions of years to become mostly obsolete. Copper-Bronze Age tools took only a few thousand years to become mostly obsolete. Iron-Age tools took less than century to become mostly obsolete. Steel-Age tools took only a few decades to become mostly obsolete. Today our modern tools are now made of many kinds of different alloys, polymers, plastics, and numerous other new materials. Which are changing almost every year, or every six years.

Since tools were first developed: their cycles of obsolescence have been constantly accelerating until today; perfectly good computers are being thrown away after less than four years of use because of obsolescence. These cycles do not recycle, or regenerate: they only accumulate on top of each other. The Iron Age plows of India pulled by draft animals mingle with steam engines, internal combustion engines and jet engines. Modern architectural firms have their offices inside ancient stone buildings. Houses are built with an entire span of technologies from the latest space-age materials, to lead glass windows. The end-result is a wide range of ancient and modern technologies as a mixed up accumulation of different kinds of tool-technologies.

Pyramidal Accumulation and Pyramidal Crumbling

Now: the basic structural flaw of civilization must be stated. Every civilization possesses this basic structural flaw. The basic flaw is: the Dynamic of one-sided accumulation. There are two basic dynamics of accumulation at work and they work in direct opposition to each other. In the natural world: for a pyramidal accumulation to be stable, the structural strength of its base must be at least as structurally resilient as what it supports rather than being weaker than what it supports. Moreover: the lowest strata must be the strongest because it must support everything that is piled on top of it. While the topmost layer does not need to be strong, since it is not supporting anything. The heavier the base, and the lighter the apex: the more structurally strong it is.

However: in civilization, the exact opposite is true. This is evident by its structural strength and weight: wealth, power, social status, knowledge... being reversed so that the highest concentration is at the top, not at the bottom. Today in the United States: 1% of its population holds 40% of its wealth, 4% of its population holds 90% of its wealth, while 5% of its population holds 95% of its wealth. This means that 95 % of the remaining population is forced to compete against each other as antagonists for the remaining 5% of the nation's wealth. The reverse Pyramidity of this accumulation is obvious and the same thing been going on for ten thousand years in every other civilization. It is still going on today. Every year around the world, in all nations, all countries: civilization creates more poor people, and fewer, richer, wealthier people...by percentage... every year the population of wealthy people is shrinking But... that shrinking population is getting wealthier and wealthier... Every year, the population of poor people is increasing. And... getting poorer and poorer.

One billion of the affluent population held 80% of the wealth in the world, while 5 billion of the 3rd world population held the remaining 20%. That was ten years ago... now it is getting even worse: now in 20006: Personal wealth is distributed so unevenly across the world that the richest two per cent of adults own more than 50 per cent of the world's assets while the poorest half hold only 1 per cent of wealth. So much of the world's wealth is concentrated in so few hands: that if all of the world's wealth were distributed evenly, each person would have $20,500 of assets to use. 1/5th ... twenty percent of the world's workforce today; earns less than two dollars a day... most of them earn less than one dollar a day. Most of poor of the world are not even counted in the labor pool. Most poor people cannot find any work at all in the first place. In the next decade; the 3rd World population will increase by 2 billion people, while the affluent nations will only add 500 million: a good part of which will come from 3rd world immigration into 1st world countries.

What is the basic difference between a 1st World Country, and a 3rd World Country? It is merely the slight relative difference of how much wealth is concentrated at the top and how much is left over for the rest... Haiti is a 3rd World country. It has a population of 7,000,000. Its wealth is concentrated into 150 families. Everyone else is poor and starving. While the wealth of the USA is concentrated into only .05 % of the population instead of .000002 % of the population. This is basically, the only fucking difference between Haiti and the United States of America. Does anyone want to understand the significance of this obvious fact? No. Why is that, eh?

All civilized societies accumulate four basic things: Wealth, Power, Knowledge, and Status... in one main direction. The resources of the masses are funneled and concentrated into an ever smaller, wealthier, more powerful, more privileged elite organizations. This reverse pyramidal accumulation continues, until the weight of this accumulation leaches-drains the structural stability and strength of the entire social system.

The top-heavy strain on the weakened base becomes untenable... until something fails. Then there is collapse-upheaval; a changing of the upper strata levels... landslides of the collapse spreading destruction throughout the system. Only for the now, more-or-less collapsed pile to begin accumulating all over again... as most of its wealth and power merely changes hands at the top... while the population base of this accumulation shifts, re-builds to go on being just barely able to support this top-heavy burden.

These opposing dynamics of pyramidal accumulation and crumbling of the accumulated pyramid has been going on for 10,000 years now, with the same results of growth and collapse; over and over again. This is the basic structural reason why human civilization is unstable. The history of civilization is merely an ongoing process of these two opposing-conflicting dynamics.

You can duplicate this effect by trying to pile sand as high as possible. Once the maximum pyramidal height is reached: all you get are continuing landslides of sand pouring off the summit without any gain in height... the top layers slightly shifting, while the bottom layers remain permanently crushed and buried under tons of more and more accumulated oppression, or pressure. Oppression is a pyramidal dynamic of pressure which comes from one-sided accumulation

If you want a closer approximation to the instability of civilization: gradually remove both the structural strength and weight of the lower strata of sand... and transfer that structural strength and weight to the highest levels. Sooner, or later: that pyramidal pile will collapse. Landslides from the uppermost layers will bury the lower strata even more heavily. A new stratum of elite will rise to the top. Things will seem to change incrementally, while all the basic dynamics remain unchanged.

What this has done; has been to turn almost every person living in a civilized society into dual, negative, destructive roles of acting as an oppressor... and being oppressed. Being either a victimizer, a victim: or both. No matter where you are in this huge pile... somebody is on top of you, and somebody else is underneath you.

As a result: this literally defines all of human social interactions into dominant or submissive roles. This endless struggle for financial dominance, relationship dominance, power dominance Status dominance. 'Who's on top... who's 2nd, 3rd, etc.' has poisoned all social functions and all social roles. Merely trying to keep in the same position without losing ground takes up nearly all your time and energy. Whether you like it or not, who you are and what you are is defined by your position in the hierarchical pyramidal pile of civilization.

How Change Is Corrupted

Throughout all history, in any process of change or upheaval, it is the lower classes that suffer the most and the upper classes that suffer the least. Moreover, nearly all change has always been instituted by the elite for their own advantage. This is true even of revolutions. The most successful ones were instigated and prosecuted by an educated elite who came from the very ruling class they sought to overthrow. Purely lower class uprisings that ever actually succeeded are rare. Revolutionary changes come when elements of these two classes get together. When a small handful of an educated elite joins forces with the lower class who are finally driven beyond endurance by their worsening situation; to fight back instinctively and blindly against a civilized system that is constantly trying to grind them down into complete dehumanized poverty and oppression.

All civilized societies hate, and fear any kind of social change. All the advantages of power, wealth, knowledge and status are based upon stability, upon things changing as little as possible. The rich and powerful never willingly or voluntarily change anything: neither do the middle-classes... except trying to continually garner more rights and privilege, more power, more wealth, more status, more knowledge for themselves. Otherwise, any changes beyond their control, they seek to stabilize. Meaning halt any further change from happening. Change is basically sought by the powerless to improve their lot in life and adamantly resisted by the powerful to preserve their own advantages. The dispossessed young seek it while the powerful elders resist it.

That is... unless a brilliant Emperor such as Napoleon Bonaparte: rips the entire legal fabric of his society apart; and rams his own changes down the throats of his subjects. When Napoleon single-handedly revamped France's legal system; he threatened the old status quo of all Europe. By arbitrarily and single-handedly changing the entire legal system of France: Napoleon threatened the entire Old European Social Order. By it; he destroyed the Right of Kings. He destroyed the Aristocracy, the Church... They were all up in arms against him because of it. Because of this, all of Europe joined against him in an unheard of alliance. Kingdoms that had once been enemies for centuries: suddenly became allies.

He was defeated not once, but twice. And the French Bourbon King was re-instated. Yet, in a very short time, the Bourbon King was ousted thanks to Bonaparte's new, more egalitarian legal system; and France finally became a Republic in name only... as it was the Emperor's own nephew that won the first election, and became the first legally elected President. This legal precedent: changing the name of a ruler from Emperor to President: was also a cultural precedent: The leader had to show his teeth to the people in a smile: He had to precede his public outings with his teeth showing first in a smile of legal equality. Pretending to his subjects that he was their friend not their enemy. Proceed, Precede, Present, president... dentures, teeth; get it? Press hands, Pres 'i'... Present your ego as a smile. Hide your ego behind a smile. This cultural and legal precedent changed the hierarchical system of France from a Nation of impoverished vassal peasants with a King who openly sneered at his subjects: into a Nation of independent, educated, affluent shopkeepers, who if they did not like their President, were not afraid to show it. But as long as the new legal precedent held power, as long as the President was liked for his teeth preceding him: the President held power because of the new precedent as the new head of a new government that could not be blamed for what the old government had done. Why did this happen? Because Napoleon had been liked for kicking out the old government. Not for what he did after. As long as Napoleon put teeth into his laws and enforced them he was respected. As long as a president enforced the laws he introduced he was respected. Alas: this did not happen.

A century earlier in England, a similar change-dynamic happened with Cromwell's severe religious Republicanism. As a result of this: England became a land of cottage-industry peasants: far better off than they had ever been before. This did not last long. The Industrial Revolution destroyed this affluent middle class and the nation went back to the old two-tier system of the rich elite and the starving poor.

This is not to say that Napoleon was any less of a mass murderer, or any less corrupt than any other Emperor who ever ruled. He merely took advantage of a lower class revolution that had become disgusted with the old aristocracy of Kingship; and reinstated an even older Imperial Roman form of dictatorship, absolute power, secret police, and even less liberty for the masses than the Kings of Europe ever tried to achieve. He did a very neat trick. Rather than give the masses any more liberty: he gave them a token, legal equivalence of Lawful Rights of Citizenship; without giving the masses any actual power at all.

If you study the history of the French Revolution without obsessively focusing on the leaders: you will find that it follows a Pendulum Dynamic. As long as France was the underdog: it triumphed over other Kingdoms. Once it became the overdog; it began losing. The more unfair the conflict: the greater France's armies became: the more it began losing. Until the final debacle of Napoleon invading Russia happened. The largest army ever assembled in human history was defeated not by another opposing army: but by the forces of Nature. As long as France was the underdog: it won. Once it became too powerful: it lost. France fought its Revolution on two fronts at the same time. It fought its own rotten aristocratic society on the inside, while fighting off rotten aristocratic armies trying to save the obsolete useless aristocracy of France. But once it had defeated the other European Aristocratic Kingdoms attacking it. Once it ate them up. Once it became too big for its own good. It became even weaker, more inefficient and more corrupt than the corrupt Royal regimes that still opposed it. Napoleon won all of his most brilliant victories against armies that were larger than his. He lost badly every time his armies were larger than the armies of his enemies. The French Revolution is an obvious illustration of the pendulum Dynamic. Push something too far: and it comes back twice as hard as you pushed it. Get too big: and you will topple. Become too powerful and you will fall.

What was in the beginning a weak experiment in equality and fraternity and the brotherhood of men: quickly became corrupted into an Imperial power that was so inhuman, so out of touch with reality, so corrupt: that the Imperial France did not last longer than a decade. What were once masses of poor peasants fighting for the new revolutionary idea of equality: became masses of cannon fodder, subservient marionettes: used by Napoleon to advance his own personal glory. What began as a social ideal of equality: became an Imperial oppression of pure centralized power. In the end: Napoleon's armies became the worst inhuman butchering armies on Earth. For example: a full 80% of Napoleon's Grande Armee retreating from Moscow; had a host of sexual diseases that were so virulent, and infected them so deeply: that their bones and skulls were deformed by it. 80% of all the men in his armies were rapists or whoremongers. 80% of all the men in Napoleon's armies raped women and frequented prostitutes so often... they had sexual intercourse with more than one girl so many times, they mingled their diseased penises so many times in the same vagina: that they became sexual predators, morally diseased monsters. They were sold the glories of war and being a soldier. They were duped as all humans are.

This means that with the exception of the new recruits who had not yet taken part in a raiding party, or frequented a whore yet: literally all of Napoleon's soldiers had sexual intercourse with diseased prostitutes and whores and raped women and children when they pillaged the villages they plundered. Everywhere his armies went: they spread a host of sexual diseases. Everywhere they went: they raped women and children. Instead of liberators and a culture of social equals: they had become a hated culture of killers and rapists. Just like Rome's armies had become Imperial machines of death and horror. By the 3rd year of their enlistment, literally all of his Napoleon's soldiers were infected with Syphilis, Gonorrhea, etc. They all developed open running sores disfiguring their faces and bodies... right down to their bones. The culture of his Imperial armies was a far cry from the peasant armies who had no leaders. It was a far cry from: 'Liberty, Fraternity and Equality'.

His subjects did not have any right to vote, or to uphold, or enforce the civil code he had written for them. He himself violated this civil code at his own leisure whenever he chose to. He put himself above his own Law, which he created only for others to follow and obey. This created the precedent for all presidents to be above the laws they enforced. Only after he was gone, did the original ideals of the Revolution slowly begin to re-surface as mere token ideas. And France was changed from a mass of Starving peasants and a handful of rich aristocrats living in the lap of luxury: into a homogeneous Nation of shop keepers and burghers: the result was a more equal physical standard of living that was higher than any other Nation had ever enjoyed up to that time

Napoleon enslaved all of Europe by his Napoleonic Code replacing the old traditional Common Law system. In this way, he neatly enslaved the masses of Europe and reduced their freedoms by a single, cunning reversal of interpreting what is legal and what is not. Before the Napoleonic code: anything that was not specifically stated as being illegal was allowed and not prosecuted. After his Napoleonic Code was enforced: anything that was not specifically stated as being legal: was automatically categorized as being illegal. In this way, by reversing the basis of all legality, the masses of Europeans had their freedoms, rights and privileges reduced from a thousand – to one... the one written. Before Napoleon's Civil Code: they were free to do one thousand things without being subject to arrest, fined, jailed and executed. After Napoleon's Code was enforced: they were free to do only one thing: the one thing that code allowed them to do and nothing else. Historians and history books cover up this fact. The fact is: Napoleon created a new legal system of controlling the masses that was one thousand times more restrictive than the old one. Not even Stalin or Mao Tse Tsung can boast of such a massive increase in the level and degree of legalized oppression of the masses by one ruler.

And what has happened since then? All of those Napoleonic edicts and Laws... his entire Civil Code; that was rammed down the throats of the European Nations he conquered... including all of the civil codes of the revolutionary English Parliamentary system... have since been modified: to bring back as much corruption, influence peddling, and power mongering as possible for the express advantage of the ruling elite in every single Nation. So much for equality.

Now; the new elite is comprised of such a complex, intertwined, constantly changing gang of stockbrokers, powerbrokers, elected and appointed officials, corporate bigwigs, Media personalities, owners, stockholders, property owners, etc. that it is literally impossible to identify who are pulling the strings, who has the real power, the most influence, the most wealth... Everything has been distilled down to the elitism of the bank account and the investment portfolio... wheelings and dealings behind closed doors... offshore holdings, dummy corporations... corporations that own and control other corporations; in a spider web of increasingly dynamic, writhing, changing, Greed, Power and Wealth. The pile has increased in size and complexity only: the basic dynamics have not changed one iota.

The rich and powerful fear any kind of change more than other people do... because they have more to lose by it. Any kind of instability could topple the privileged elite from their lofty heights. They manage to hoodwink the unprivileged by fear tactics; into believing that anything... any system of government other than the one which exists now... is dangerous, destructive, bad, evil... and will lead to chaos... and instability. The rich and powerful have always fought against anything changing. The only changes they support are increasing their own Power, Privileges, Status, Knowledge, and Wealth. One code word for this desired good is called: stability.

Unfortunately, the dynamic of civilized pyramidal accumulation... happens to be a dynamic that destabilizes itself. Whenever you hear the word stability, or instability spoken by anyone in power: you will see someone afraid of change. The rich and powerful fear any kind of change more than other people do... because they have more to lose by it. Any kind of instability could topple the privileged elite from their lofty heights. They manage to hoodwink the unprivileged by fear tactics; into believing that anything... any system of government other than the one which exists now... is dangerous, destructive, bad, evil... and will lead to chaos... and instability.

Chaos is another code-word used by politicians and people in power. I myself have never seen this imaginary Chaos, which everyone is supposed to be terrified of. The only chaos I have ever seen; has been in the strictest, most authoritarian nations and cultures. Wherever Authority and Power crush millions of people into starvation and poverty... there you have chaos. Where there are milder forms of authority and corruption you have less chaos. Where there are regimented armies run by strict Laws and Order... there you have pure chaos. If you hear anyone use that word as an excuse for refusing to listen to any new idea; it is just the politically correct code-word for saying: 'I am afraid of any kind of change.'

What people refuse to understand is that whatever they fear most; is precisely what they attract to themselves. Nations living in fear of chaos... inevitably become so bloated with the corruption from fear mongers who profit from ranting about chaos: that they end up with more chaos. What is actual anarchy? Capitalism gone rampant. Unfettered Greed. Hate gone insane. Fear gone psychotic. Recognize the actual dynamics of Anarchy. Fight the actual root sources of anarchy, and you will have no anarchy.

Civilized humans have never willingly changed their own basic cultural and religious beliefs: they only try to change other cultures and religions to conform to theirs. How can you expect any civilized person to voluntarily undergo any kind of fundamental change that might threaten their own position? Let one person challenge any normality, tradition, custom, or any socially-publicly accepted custom: and they are laughed at, vilified, denigrated, jailed, tarred and feathered, burned, ostracized, exiled, crucified, burned at the stake, shot, hung ... The enormous resistance to all new truths has never changed throughout civilized history. Changing civilized norms, knowns, traditions, or customs, has mainly been achieved slowly, painfully, and incrementally... by force, by necessity, and by their innovation of tools and their changing tool-environment forcing them to change

For instance: by seeking political stability or in terms of real politick; retaining their advantage of being the richest, most powerful Nation on Earth. The United States Government continues to support and fund countless corrupt, oppressive regimes and dictators around the world. This has resulted in a whole slew of destabilizing forces, destabilized governments, wars, insurrections, revolutions, failed revolutions, palace revolts, etc. The same self-destructive policies can be seen in the World's Banking Institutions. By seeking financial stability... or more accurately; being sure that the richest corporations can merge into even bigger, more powerful multi-national corporations; so more, and more money is sucked out of all the economies and into fewer, and fewer bank accounts: institutions like the World Bank, and NAFTA have supported, funded, and bailed out countless corrupt regimes, dictators, corporations, banks, and other financial institutions... simply because they consider it too risky and dangerous to let them fail. All in the holy name-cause of stability. Why? Because upsetting any authority whatsoever, no matter how sick, or evil or insane, or oppressing that authority may be: if it is successfully challenged and toppled: then every other authority in the world is threatened also.

And what has been the result of all this massive pouring of Trillions of dollars into the failed bank accounts of the rich and powerful? The dictator Mobuto absconding from the Belgium Congo with nearly all of his country's wealth in his pockets, to live in luxury on the French Riviera. Russian New-age gangster's becoming New-age warlords by embezzling the World Bank loans, and sticking the money into their private offshore accounts in the Caribbean. President Suharto of Indonesia being swept out of office amidst cries of scandal and corruption... but did anyone dare prosecute him? No. He kept his billions: only to usher in an even worse gang of thieves into office. The list goes on and on... from Mexico, to Japan, to the Philippines, to Brazil, to Korea: as banks try desperately to stabilize economies that are run by criminals who are oppressing and impoverishing the poor, ignorant powerless masses who can barely manage to make enough money to get by. While fancy analysts tut-tut about the worsening state of affairs and give their politically correct double-speak opinions of how to stabilize things... as each new crisis, war, market crash, economic failure, and scandal keeps on happening.

What keeps these supposedly intelligent people from changing our present civilized system? What? Create a dynamically alive unstable economy, where everything is constantly changing and in flux, and steadily getting better? Where everything is more fluid and more vibrant? And face the threat of losing your own comfortable niche? All the advantages and privileges, which you yourself have spent a lifetime working for, fighting for, competing for, saving for, hoarding and accumulating? Voluntarily change anything that might threaten your own well-being?

Are you crazy?

Voluntarily give up your own advantages? Give up your own high paying job so other people can earn more money and gave a better life? Nobody does that. The President of the World Bank has been going around the world talking about the problem of global inequity... that is threatening the stability of the status quo. That if the rich countries allow the poorer countries to get poorer: there will be catastrophic consequences in the near future.

The policies of all financial institutions such as the World Bank and NAFTA; lend money to 3rd world countries only if they buy more goods from the rich countries, only if they destroy their own domestic self-sufficient economies. So the biggest corporations of these rich countries can import more of their goods into these now poorer countries and make more profits. These loans are basically legalized bribes given to the elite in these poor countries. The money is pilfered and shunted by the massive corruption in the 3rd World Nations into a few corporate bank accounts. But the idea of making loans to a poor country; sells very well to an information-starved public that expects these loans to actually be helpful. These loans given to corrupt regimes exist only so rich countries can pay lip service to the idea that they are actually helping the 3rd World countries. The goal of all globalism is starkly clear: destroy all self-sufficiency and make the entire 7 billion humans of the earth subservient and dependent on a few rich bankers for not only their food and sustenance but literally everything: a nicely ordered world filled with human slaves, solely for the convenience of a few obscenely rich people. This politically correct double-speak is so rampant that the President of the U.S. gives speeches about the importance of spreading democracy to the very country he is going to war against in order to steal their resources and control their Oil production. And nobody notices that he is calling a military invasion and an armed occupation: 'spreading democracy'.

Rich countries help poor countries... are you insane? Help them develop economies that will compete with yours and put you out of business and make your country poor? If the 3rd world countries ever become able to manufacture their own cars, their own TV's... Who will the rich countries sell their manufactured goods to? If the poor countries ever get their own oil refineries, where will the rich countries buy their oil from... and at what astronomical cost? If the poor countries develop their own high-tech armies and nuclear reactors and missiles... what will happen to the military power of the rich countries? If the poor countries ever get a middle class and democratic governments that actually enforce policies in the interest of that country's people: then where will the rich countries get their cheap natural resources from? The second, any country gets any kind of self-rule that is even slightly enlightened: they develop their own resources instead of selling it cheaply to the rich countries.

This is one hypocrisy of American Foreign policy and American Capitalism. The U.S. Government has systematically undermined, sabotaged and aborted any socialist/democratic movement in poor countries who want to improve their lot; because they do not want those poor country's natural resources to be nationalized and used for the betterment of that country's population. Meaning; the U.S. Government has managed to sabotage nearly every democratic free election ever held in a 3rd world nation. The U.S. needs to keep these 3rd world countries as poor as possible. All rich countries need to keep poor countries as poor as possible. That is how they stay rich.

Does the U.S. or Europe sell their natural resources cheaply to other countries? Do they allow other country's companies to come in and take over their own hydroelectric power plants? Their own oil reserves? Their own oil refineries? Of course not. Why? Because they have national governments that actually try to keep the wealth of their natural resources for the benefit of their own businesses.

Most financial institutions of the world uphold corrupt oppressive regimes not only to keep the 3rd world countries poor: but to make them even poorer. While they regularly spout their hypocrisy of trying to get the rich countries to help the poor ones. The richest, most powerful countries in the world today have been systematically destroying all attempts at representative self-government in the poorest countries. While they regularly spout the hypocrisy of trying to establish democracy in these countries. How has America sought to spread democracy in the 3rd world? By invading and bombing Afghanistan and Iraq into rubble? By, destroying their infrastructures... reducing the entire population to beggards with no electrical power, no water supply, no hospitals, no schools, no bridges, and no paved roads... huh? Someone explain this to me

Another hypocrisy of Capitalism is that the strength of Capitalism is based upon conspicuous meaningless, useless, endless, ever-increasing consumption and production and waste. The healthiest National economies are supposed to be the ones that consume the most, spend the most and have the biggest-highest Gross National Product (the ones who produce the most crap). Yet the only economies that get rich from it are the Nations that save money, and produce almost nothing. The only ones who get rich from Capitalism are the ones who do not spend money. It is the filthy rich, the money hounds, the lovers of zeroes, the Scrooges, the people who sock away their savings for decades, who get rich from Capitalism.

Capitalism is a complete lie. 75% of the supposedly richest most affluent consumers in the world are in debt up to their asses, and living from paycheck-to-paycheck, because they are overspending all the time.

You mean the only way Capitalism can work... the only way all the people in the World can become affluent... is if 75% of the majority of affluent consumers... who make up only a small minority of the world population... remain in debt for the rest of their lives? While the remaining 4 billion starve? This is supposed to be the best system ever invented for the common good? Bullshit. Capitalism is the best system for the fewest people to become richer at the expense of everyone else.

The Effect of Reverse Pyramidality as a Social Dynamic of Accumulation

Human pyramidal focus is evident throughout all civilized history in an obvious fashion. Once humans developed cities, they also developed the pyramidal social dynamic of the arena. This dynamic can be seen everywhere large numbers of humans gather. This pyramidal dynamic can be easily described. Just take the pyramidal shape and invert it:

By building these inverted pyramidal shapes it became possible to accumulate more people into a smaller area than ever before. By building these inverted pyramidal shapes called arenas it becomes possible for a large mass of people to look at and hear the same thing: Mass propaganda; mass brainwashing, mass culture was born. In modern times, this has been developed into what is known as mass media.

What is crucial about this kind of socialization is what it does not do. This dynamic, of connectiveness is not based upon any one-on-one relationship. It is not based upon interpersonal integrated communal participation where connections and relationships overlap, forming a cohesive tightly knit system of cooperation. Rather: in order for any large population of humans to be able to function as a mass, the cohesive bonds of interpersonal relationships must be sacrificed in order to establish the pyramidal connectiveness of all people focusing upon the same thing. The demise of human community is an evolution of increasing accumulation. As civilization accumulates it also gets more specialized. The more social identities-connections there are, the less time to spend on any one of them. The more split-up these identities are the less inter-connections exist between any of them, the weaker they get, until it becomes impossible to sustain any overall integration whatsoever.

Today's human society is so vast that the choice of social inter-action has become totally segmented. No individual can ever fully participate in this huge splintered mass. How much time does one devote to one's family? Work? Neighbors? Neighborhood? Politically? Municipal? County? State? National? How many charities can one support? Which ones? Wildlife? Human rights? Gay rights?

The homeless? The environment? Will you spend your life saving whales or trees? Eagles or tigers? Which sports to participate in? Which social functions to attend, support? The arts? Youth organizations? School programs? Which issues to champion? What interests to pursue? The list is endless, arbitrary... and all are unconnected to each other. The result is an unmanageable, uncontrollable, purely reactive segmental pile; all struggling-fighting not to be buried under all the others, in a mad hierarchical scramble: all fighting for attention, to be noticed, for influence, power, resources, wealth. And inevitably, unavoidably: all fighting against each other for the increasingly limited resources, which are available.

The pyramidal greater good of the tribe, clan, nation, replaces the greater good of the weakened and secondary communal band. This pyramidal greater good is only interpreted pyramidally. It has never been the goal of any civilization to improve the underlying base upon which it is been built. The fortunes of kings and empires, their wars and conquests have always been engineered for the exclusive benefit of the elite. Throughout history, the one constant of human pyramidal perception has been that: it is only what, or who is on top that counts. Everything underneath the most recent piled-on triumph, or wealth, or power, or knowledge, is of little importance: even though it represents the vast majority of all human existence.

In fact human social evolution works by accumulated layers of added strata just as tool-evolution does. At the same time, the smaller, older familial units are further weakened and split up by existing at the bottom of the hierarchical social power structures of civilization. As the piled-up accumulation becomes more massive, the modular units required to sustain its integrity must become smaller. The communal bands split-up into extended families, the extended families split-up into nuclear families, the nuclear families split-up into alienated individuals. Also: throughout history, the inner splitting of the human psyche has progressed: giving us less integrated, more segmented identities, personalities, realities, world-views. But the geological dynamic of accumulated strata is a dead dynamic, designed for dead things. It is not designed to dynamically balance living social systems: it is designed to dynamically balance the slow formation and erosion of mountains, valleys, oceans and plains. The dynamic of one-sided accumulation forces humans to struggle against old, dead traditions, habits and customs. It forces us into unnecessary stress and conflict.

Even for entertainment, the inverted pyramidal arena becomes the basic form of inter-action. It becomes the functioning dynamic of all prestige, fame, power, knowledge and wealth. Its dynamic is the tool-dynamic of Separation: separating people from any small, cohesive social unit. Segmentation; using these separate individuals to accumulate into one inverted pyramidal mass so they can all focus upon one thing. Giving up their own personal-communal autonomy to preserve and perpetuate this amassed accumulation of given power in the form of a medicine man, a leader, a council, a ruling class, an army, a King, a senate, an elected body of representatives, an Emperor. Giving up their time and attention to a single gladiator, actor, etc... Giving up their wealth, giving up their social standing, giving up their knowledge, their attention to each other, to themselves. While all the time: knowledge, wealth, power and social standing is being hoarded by the upper classes. This process is a two-way street: the masses acquiescing, and the upper strata taking as much as they can get in any way they can. However gradual this process has been: the dynamic has remained essentially the same ever since civilization began. The pyramidal social dynamic of the city created the need for spectacle: where many people could all look at one thing. Human pyramidal focus created and determined how cities full of people live. The tool-dynamic of separation-segmentation-accumulation shaped the city and determined how people would live in it.

Glorification

For untold millennia: humans have looked up to the tops of mountains and glorified their apex. Humans have looked up at pyramidal piles of temples and worshipped the apex. Whatever is at the top: humans have glorified. Glorification is a form of pyramidal awareness. When you glorify something: you put it at the top of everything else. When you glorify something: you are assuming that the top, the peak, the summit, the apex, the highest point of anything: is assumed to be the most useful... the most valuable, the most important, the most powerful, the most worthy. You are also assuming that everything below an apex: is less useful, less important, less valued, less powerful.

This assumption is a lie.
The actual truth is the exact opposite.

The apex of a mountain is the most useless part of that mountain. It could not exist at all without the lower part of the mountain supporting it. It needs the existence of the lower part of the mountain to exist at all. BUT... the lower part does not need the apex to exist. The lower part of the mountain does not need the upper part to exist. It can exist just fine without the apex. It doesn't need the apex. The apex needs it.

The highest part of a tree needs all of the rest of the tree to exist. The lower parts of a tree do not need the higher part for them to exist at all. They can get along just fine without that higher part.

This is a universal truth.

The lower something is: the more useful, the more important, the more valuable and the more powerful it is.

The higher something is: the more useless, the less important, the less powerful, the less valuable it is.

For example: if all the animals on Earth disappeared: plants could still get along just fine without them. Why? Because they are lower in the ecological hierarchy.

If all plants disappeared from the Earth: microbes and bacteria would get along just fine without them. Why?

Because they are even lower in the hierarchy of Life than plants are.
But plants could not get along without bacteria. Animals could not get along without plants.

We depend on all of the lower orders of Life to exist at all.

The lower the order... the smaller the living organism is... the more important, the more useful, the more powerful it is.

Not the other way around.

Because humans are the most useless, the least important, the weakest animal on Earth. And because humans did not want to face this obvious fact: and still do not want to admit it. They invented human culture to justify their existence.

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

What is human culture?

It is the reversal of truths turned into lies, and lies turned into truths. It is human awareness reversing itself by pyramidal focus. Instead of being aware that the smallest living organisms are more important than the biggest living organisms: it reversed that truth into a lie.

Instead of being aware that the living Earth with all its teeming bacteria is more important than tall trees: it reversed that truth into a lie.

Basically: anything that needs to be justified: has no justification for its existence.

Bacteria do not need to justify their existence. They are useful to all larger forms of life.

Human culture sees bacteria as the least important, the least powerful, the least valuable living organisms on Earth. Not only that: human culture sees bacteria as the enemy of all other forms of Life. Human culture turns lies into truth, and truths into lies. The exact opposite is true. Bacteria are the friends of all larger living organisms. All larger organisms could not live without useful, valuable, important, powerful bacteria doing their jobs every day. Without any fanfare. Without any glorification. Without any need to justify their existence.

Human culture: is basically a brainwashing system that reverses lies into truth, and truth into lies. One basic way it does this is through Glorification.

The reason an international oil corporation puts TV ads on the air to glorify how environmentally conscientious they are: is to hide the fact that they are the complete opposite. In fact their main goal is to rape and despoil the natural environment as quickly and as horribly as possible.

The reason the government of the USSR glorified Stalin as a loving father of his country was because he was not the father of his country at all. In fact he hated his country, and he hated everybody in it, and devised as many ways of systematically impoverishing, terrorizing, killing, starving, and brainwashing his people as possible... while finding as many ways of raping and despoiling the land that he was supposed to have 'loved' so much. These are only two examples of glorification. There are trillions more. All human culture is a glorification composed of lies that are created to hide the actual truth.

The fucking fact is that whatever is glorified: is a complete reversal of the actual truth. The Canadian Anthem glorifies Canadians as standing on guard. Guarding the true North. The True North; which is supposed to be 'strong and free'.

That is a complete reversal of the actual truth. Canadians are not free. They are weakest of slaves to the American capitalist culture of greed and ease. They do not guard their North. They allow American corporations to come in, and rape and destroy their own Nation without raising one whimper about it.

Britain's National anthem glorifies how it rules the waves and how they 'never, never, never will be slaves'.

The actual fact is that England did not ever 'rule the waves'. King Canute tried to do it. He failed. The actual fact is that England is a land of the most slavish people on Earth. They have knuckled under to their masters and oppressors more slavishly than any other Western country on earth.

The American anthem glorifies how America is the 'land of the brave and the home of the free'. They could not glorify how brave or free the people were or are: because that lie was too far a stretch. The actual truth is the exact opposite. America is the land of the worst cowards on Earth, and the home of the most enslaved people on Earth. Enslaved by ease and wealth and corruption.

Every television commercial, every cultural dance, every cultural song, every ethnic, cultural, religious, governmental glorification of anything is a complete reversal of the actual truth.

Estonians singing of their love for their fatherland: how they love their fatherland so much; was, and still is a complete reversal of the actual truth. The actual truth was and still is that they do not give a shit about the land they live on. They never fought for their land. They ran away and abandoned their fatherland at the drop of a hat. They allowed foreign conquerors to come in, and invade them and oppress them without lifting one finger against them for one thousand years. Why? Because they were so busy hating and killing each other, they had no time to hate and kill the people who came in and ruled them. Because they had become so servile to their masters their entire culture had become non-violent. They were a culture of slaves, serfs serving foreign masters for over 1,000 years. The same facts are true for almost every ethnic people who were ever conquered and invaded. They were too busy hating and fighting amongst themselves.

The actual truth is very simple.

Whatever is glorified: is a lie.

Whatever humans glorify: is a complete fucking lie.

Every single thing you were ever brainwashed to believe in: is a complete fucking lie.

So what is true? Where can you find truth?

Simple.

All glorifications are lies.

Anything that is not glorified: is not a lie.

Anything that is not touted, publicized, advertised, declaimed, justified, rationalized, ... what is not taught, not told, not claimed... is the truth:

The actual truth has no need to glorify itself. The actual truth never publicizes itself. It never blares itself out on TV screens. It does not have marching bands, or horns blaring out its message. People who are actually honest are never glorified. People who are actually brave are never praised. People who are actually kind and generous are never given public recognition. Only killers need to justify themselves in public. Only evil people need to justify themselves. They do it by glorifying their own evil. They do it by reversing truth into lies, and lies into truths.

Only evil needs to justify itself. GOOD never has to justify itself. Only evil glorifies itself. GOOD never glorifies itself.

The Five Basic Aspects of Civilized Accumulation

The four basic aspects of civilized human accumulation come from one root dynamic of accumulation: the one-sided accumulation of human populations on earth.

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

In other words: SEX... LUST... Sexual lust.

Sexual lust is the root of all human evil, and of all human corruption. Before we ever lusted for gold, or fame, or knowledge or power: we lusted for the opposite sex. The evil of lust is greed. The evil of greed is lust. The motivation is the same. Out of the root of sexual lust: came all the others dynamics of one-sided accumulation. The growth of human evil is an organic history. It grew out of the sexual organs of humans. It grew the size of their societies until they became too numerous. It grew the power of their societies until they became too powerful. It grew the wealth of their societies until they had more than they needed. It grew their knowledge until they knew too much. It grew everything that is evil. It grew war. It grew racism. It grew cultural xenophobia. It grew oppression. It fostered cruelty. It created inhumanity.

In the Bible: the God of the Semites: Yahweh: cast out Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden because they had eaten the forbidden fruit of carnal knowledge. Once they had sinned: they became ashamed of their nakedness. They became ashamed of their nakedness because they had wallowed in the pleasures of SEXUAL LUST, and after wallowing in it: they felt their entire bodies to be dirty and shameful. Not because their naked bodies were ugly or that nakedness is sinful: but because they had desecrated, defiled, and contaminated the sacred purity of their own bodies. By their sin: they created the first shameful act. They created shame in an innocent world where no shame had existed before. From this first shame, and first sin: came all the other sins of mankind. Carnal knowledge. Eve tempting Adam with her apples, Adam falling for her apples: her breasts and buttocks: round and smooth like beautiful juicy delicious apples... Mmmm!

It is interesting to note that before the God of the Semites was ever called by the name of Yahweh: he had been known as the God of gods: the great god: BAAA!! Or Baal: because he was screaming at his children that they were BAAAD children. Until he became so enraged at them: he just shouted at them: YA! Trying to scare them out of their senses and make them stop their sinning, Yahweh YA! We? Are you yelling at us? Well: the bible tells that the God called Yahweh was an angry god, and a god of revenge and punishment. The Hebrews took the name of the God of the volcano on top of Mount Sinai: because it was always erupting in anger at their sins. The God Yahweh was the last God of the Volcano that humans worshipped directly as he most powerful of all their gods. He was angry at the overpopulation by this species of apes. He was angry at their seminal fluids exploding out of their volcanic penises. He was angry at these monkeys aping his behaviour.

He was angry at the speed which they increased their numbers: faster than he could stamp them out: they multiplied and left the areas where he could destroy them. The Mount of Sin: Mount Sinai: is the sin of an 'I' the separate 'I', the blind ego, the eye of the blind volcano erupting destruction upon the earth. The blind eye of the human penis: erupting semen into a female's vagina. It is the sin of the ego: the 'I' that is completely selfish and only wants to gratify its appetite for lust and destruction. Be it an appetite for sex, or an appetite for overeating, or overpopulation, or over-accumulating food, or accumulating wealth or knowledge: the original sin of Adam and Eve was the sin of carnal knowledge, accumulating knowledge. All other human sins grew out of this one root sin organically

Because the dynamic of this first root sin is a projection, because it is an eruption, an explosion: the dynamics of all human sin and human evil go outwards. Away from the sinner. Leaving the sinner untouched, unharmed, unpunished: leaving them free to sin even more, and sin even worse, and sin even more often. This is the human Dynamic of projection and denial to this day: everything which is wrong and evil in every human being is projected out as a tactic to avoid self-examination and introspection and Inner Honesty.

What were we doing committing all these sins? We just aped the volcanoes that we had been worshipping for millions of years... What's so wrong about that? What's so bad about it? What is bad about it: is that we are not volcanoes: we are monkeys. We are walking apes. We are organic living creatures. We are not inorganic volcanoes. We are aping something that is inorganic: we are organic. A volcano is not a mammal.

That was why even the volcanoes we worshipped were angry at us. That was why the gods we worshipped were furious with us. They were furious with us because we started trying to act as if we were gods also. The hubris, the arrogance of this sin was punished. Over and over. But... we living humans outnumbered our Gods. They could not keep up with all the new sins we were inventing and committing. They could not punish all of us. The root sin of sexual lust: created a species of walking apes who now have overpopulated this planet to the tune of 7 billion humans. There is no sign of us stopping from this mad rush into extinction either. We refuse to even try to control our sexual lust.

The root Dynamic of one-sided human accumulation resulted in:

The Outward Expansion of Human Overpopulation

Outer Knowledge	}	This arises from our observer-awareness residing predominantly in the outer layer of the brain. That part of the brain that is reflectively conscious outwards : not subconsciously aware inwards , or instinctively aware of itself as an integrated totality.
Outer Power
Outer Social Standing
Outer Wealth

If you study History of civilization; you will find that it deals almost exclusively with these four aspects of Accumulation. History almost never deals with the lives of ordinary people, or the conditions of their existence. Because ordinary people have not accumulated enough Power, Status, Wealth, or Knowledge, to be worth noticing. History only deals with the apex of these four aspects of accumulation. Only people who have accumulated the most wealth, people who have accumulated the most power, people who have accumulated the most social stature, or standing, or status, and people who have accumulated the most exclusive, specialized, secret knowledge, are mentioned. Before civilized settlements were invented: humans had already been accumulating many kinds of things. Such as Animals, power, status, territory, knowledge, tools. In these earlier cultures: social stature was a way to gain power. By accumulating knowledge-experience-expertise, they became medicine men, shamans, leaders, tribal chieftains.

In all human societies: these four basic aspects of accumulation tend to lump together. If a person happens to have some special knowledge or expertise, they tend to also have a higher social standing, more wealth, influence and power than others. If a person happens to be wealthier, they tend to have a higher social standing and be regarded as having some kind of special knowledge or expertise and also become more powerful and influential. If a person has more power, they tend to also have more wealth, a higher social standing and be regarded as having some special kind of knowledge or expertise.

If you study the History of civilization; you will find that it deals almost exclusively with these four aspects of accumulation. History almost never deals with the lives of ordinary people, or the conditions of their existence. Because ordinary people have not accumulated enough Power, Status, Wealth, or Knowledge, to be worth noticing. History only deals with the apex of these four aspects of accumulation. Only people who have accumulated the most wealth, people who have accumulated the most power, people who have accumulated the most social stature, or standing, or status, and people who have accumulated the most exclusive, specialized, secret knowledge, are mentioned.

The Accumulation of Knowledge

Where did the accumulation of knowledge come from? Secrecy. Selfishness. Advantage. Leverage. Motives to gain, accumulate, preserve and increase ones power, influence, social standing, etc. What kind of knowledge was it? Lies, hoaxes, swindles, deceptions, delusions, myths, superstitions; anything that could fool people into believing you knew something they didn't. If a tribal medicine man claims to have accumulated special knowledge and if his knowledge is indeed true and not based upon superstition, then why should he keep that knowledge secret? Why not share it with everyone? Unless his knowledge is a hoax and he is afraid his bullshit will be exposed as bullshit. The only possible motivation to keep knowledge secret is to gain some kind of advantage from it. The fact is that the entire dynamic of accumulating knowledge was corrupted from the beginning. This is still true today.

Once civilization was developed, the accumulation of knowledge forced humans to develop specialized, unconnected, conflicting interests. Once the human psyche was split up into conflicting motives, it created anti-social competition. This kind of conflict simply did not exist in the co-operative sharing of small bands where everybody did mostly the same things. Whereas in a larger group, with specialized skills, tasks and needs: what is good for you may not be good for somebody else. Before the accumulation and splitting up of human communities, before the accumulation of knowledge and the splitting up of the human psyche, competition could not have existed because the conditions needed for its existence did not exist.

What good is knowledge if it is not shared and connected together and integrated? As long as knowledge is kept secret, it will inevitably be used to gain some kind of advantage. Knowledge is basically a tool of the tool-brain. Its effect is determined by how it is used. The effect of all secret knowledge is one of corruption. If all people have access to the same knowledge equally then it cannot be used to create inequality. The bottom line is that socially: any use of knowledge for personal advantage is corrupt. This is why all worldly success is evil. When you train a person to succeed you are training them to become corrupt. That training will forever limit and cripple their ability to give of themselves to others. Without the sharing of knowledge: we humans would be extinct. Civilization corrupts this dynamic of cooperation and the sharing of knowledge by overriding it with the need to accumulate that knowledge, hoard it, in order to gain some kind of advantage from it.

As a result most knowledge is kept secret. All of the tons and reams of beneficial knowledge, all of the pertinent facts and reservoirs of experience and wisdom and expertise is corrupted by most of it being kept secret in order to make a profit, or gain wealth or some kind of power or status. The idea of sharing knowledge-experience-expertise-wisdom freely does not exist in any human forum or culture. Unless you buy a book, pay money for a seminar, or spend years in college learning isolated, uncollated, unchallenged, and uncomparing pieces of information. Whereas if all people who had something useful to contribute came together and openly shared everything they knew, then people for once would be able to winnow out all of the misleading, specialized, useless information from this data base and be able to use that newly integrated knowledge effectively. The segmentation and specialization of all knowledge produces redundant duplication: it also prevents any systematic integration or examination of that knowledge; it prevents any sound, comparative examination of its validity, usefulness, or truth.

A perfect example is the internet where endless articles, services, remedies, and products exist for every known interest, need, or ailment. However they all exist as segments that are unconnected to each other. They all exist as isolated, secret, unconnected, expensive, mostly useless pieces of data. There is no openness to it. It is all enclosed; cut off, by the need to protect one's copyrights, patents, or expertise from being stolen.

How can you compare anything; when you must spend inordinate amounts of money just to access one piece of information? It is a haphazard affair with the only rule being: 'let the buyer beware'. Of all the information or knowledge that Capitalism tries to sell you: how much of it does any good? How much of it is useless? How much of it is misleading or false? How much of it is actually bad? What kind of knowledge is being accumulated? How much of that knowledge is actually useful or pertinent? All knowledge today; has become a hopeless mishmash of unconnected, uncollated, unintegrated, pieces of information hidden away in countless specialized niches; that are hard to find, expensive to obtain, and with no cross-referenced data that could put any of it into any sane, balanced context.

For example: every contractor who ever built a house develops their own techniques, tricks, shortcuts, and methods over long years of experience... finding out over years of trial and error what works best. Do any of them share their knowledge, their experience, their expertise with anyone else? Hell no! Share hard-earned knowledge and experience with competitors who might put you out of business; by using your own hard-earned secrets against you? Each specialized technique that is valuable is jealously guarded and goes to the grave with them. To be later put into museums. And centuries later...marveled at... as examples of lost artisanship, lost knowledge and lost expertise. Because dumb imbeciles were selfishly trying to get a personal advantage by keeping secrets because of the stupidity of adversarial competition and pyramidal overpopulation.

Take the color red. Each glassmaker has their own secret formula for it because it is extremely difficult to find the exact right mixture of ingredients, and the right temperature and technique. There is the glassmaker Blenko's famous reply when asked about his formula for making red glass. 'Son, if I told you, why then I'd have to kill you.'

How many thousands of man-hours, and human life-Energy; have been lost... by thousands of glass blowers, trying to find their own formula for the color red in glass? How many glass factories went out of business because they never found it? What is this but killing and destroying your competitor's ability to make a living by hoarding useful knowledge? What is the hoarding of secret knowledge but forcing future generations to suffer from ignorance because that knowledge was selfishly hoarded and buried and kept secret and lost and never passed on?

Consequently: because all this knowledge, experience, expertise, wisdom, is lost... because of competition. Every new generation goes about repeatedly making the same mistakes ... simply because valuable knowledge is almost never shared. What is the hoarding of secret knowledge used for today? The creation of technologies to create better guns, better fleets, better planes, better bombs, better armies... just so one Nation can become more powerful than other Nations... so one company, one corporation can become more successful than other companies. So one person can become richer than another person. By keeping trade secrets, by hoarding special knowledge. By sharing nothing. By being selfish assholes.

All businesses have secrets about how and why they are successful. No scientific study is ever allowed to be systematically done to expose the real reasons for why and how businesses make money. Studies are only done to improve on whatever seems to work... without looking at the actual reasons for their success. Even though these successful businesses regularly go out of business. None of this tool-knowledge deals with human feelings, human problems or human concerns.

Business does not allow Science to enter its domain of profit: period. Science is not allowed to study Business. Business is not allowed to study Science. Business is not allowed to become scientific. Science is not allowed to become a Business. Science is not allowed to make a large profit. Each institution keeps its actual practices and policies and methods and rationales secret... and gives the Public a whitewashed, simplistic set of lies... carefully deleting their own corruptions so people have the mistaken impression that all of these institutions are legal, above-board, ethical, moral, etc... All because knowledge is not shared, because it is kept secret. All because of the adversarial systems of civilization. Competition. While behind closed doors, these two power groups hold secret meetings and form secret cabals that are as corrupt and wicked as any other criminal conspiracy as they plot to enrich themselves and increase their power and status and prestige, all at the expense of the gullible public which they manipulate to their benefit.

Now take the entire dynamic of 10,000 years of accumulated, over-specialized, redundant, hidden, secret, privileged Knowledge and reverse this process by reversing its root motivations. If instead of trying to get an advantage over anyone, you try to help another person... without even looking to get any benefit from helping anyone else...

What if everyone lived like this...? Then the entire process of knowledge would become reversed also... then people would find better and better ways of doing something... ways of doing things that are faster, simpler, easier, cheaper, and more fun. Everybody would be telling everybody else about what works better than something else... all knowledge would become simpler, easier to learn, better, smaller in volume... and less of an accumulated pile of useless information...

All knowledge would be reduced to simpler and simpler essences. People would need less and less time learning it, reading it, studying it, and applying it... They could spend more time learning even better ways, more insightful wisdoms...and become even more creative, have more fun, work less hours, spend more time with other people, have more time for themselves, more freedom to do what they want... and live more happily, be healthier.

Why would this happen? Because the more positive Energy you give to the world, to other people, to yourself... the more positive energy can enter your life and body and mind and soul. Happiness comes from being useful, and sharing, and having fun and helping others. But... in what context? In the context of being a useful machine? A useful worker? A useful father? How useful are you? What kind of usefulness makes you happy? The usefulness of functioning mechanically or the usefulness of living your life as a human being?

If you examine what interests people focus on in any industrialized society: you find that most of it is meaningless or trivial. The more affluent people are; the more meaningless and trivial their interests and activities become. For instance in 1999, most of the top 500 search engines used on the Internet were about either pornography, or Britney Spears. Why? Because the computer is an expensive toy designed for mostly trivial interests and personal self-gratification. By making trivial interests the greatest common denominator; this lowers the lowest level of human intelligence even further, and reduces human communication to the most trivial, meaningless level possible.

Apparently nobody is bothered by self-gratification becoming the dominant market force in all human civilization. Self-gratification is a product of the ego; it is a product of segmentation and the separation of the self from others. In short: self-gratification evolved out of tool-use by developing tool-brain functions that effectively cut off our inner awareness from our outer awareness. Once we became primarily tool-using animals, we sought to primarily gratify our tool-needs, not our human needs. The insatiable greed for knowledge has no beneficial effect whatsoever because it is based upon the unconnected, segmentation of tools; i.e. one-sided accumulation.

A small handful of interrelated-connected facts are far more beneficial than a billion unconnected ones. The information overload of our modern technology is just as much a pollutant as the smog produced from our cars, or the constant bombardment of radio, television, and other frequencies that fill the air. Any knowledge a person cannot actually use is a waste of time, energy, and memory. The knowledge needed to solve human problems already exists many times over. But since it is not collected, collated, connected, disseminated, applied, or used comprehensively... it remains segmented and unconnected, it becomes a wasteful, pointless accumulation.

Today, information has become so completely disconnected, segmented, and meaningless that it is considered normal to amass useless information known as trivia. Human existence and human meaning is trivialized. Simply by the over-accumulation of useless tool knowledge, humans have become corrupted. The history of that corruption is lost in the past: beginning with the first specialized tool that required a specialized expertise that needed time and training to master. The more specialized tool-use became the less relevance each task was to one's everyday life. What happened with all new tool innovations was that it separated our tool-knowledge from everyday life. Everyday human concerns and interests became set apart from tool-use. The more we used tools, tools began to use us. Tool-use became what we call today: work. The knowledge needed to perform any work became more specialized: it became tool-knowledge. That knowledge followed the same dynamic of all tool-use. It accumulated. It came to take up more and more people's lives. More and more time was spent accumulating that tool-knowledge. Until people had to go to separate institutions merely to acquire this accumulation of knowledge. Until they ended up spending a large part of their lives just accumulating it. But none of this tool-knowledge deals with human feelings, human problems, or human concerns. Humans became better at using and making machines and tools. However, they did not acquire any more wisdom or integrated knowledge on how to live their lives humanly, how to become more honest, more courageous, or how to develop their Sense of Wonder. They did not learn how to better develop their intrinsic creative potential. They did not learn how to further develop their own humanity.

During the tool-progress of civilization, the same blind prejudices, vices, and crimes of inhumanity have been steadily repeated for at least 10,000 years. Simply because we have spent nearly all of our energy and time learning how to use better tools, how to be better tools; not better humans. The most sophisticated, most modern tool-technology has not found a way to change this. In fact it does the opposite; it turns humans into inhuman robots who are emotionally dead and have no feelings and do not know what love is.

In 10,000 years of civilization, no civilized society has ever asked the most pertinent question of human existence as it relates to everyday life for every person on this planet. And that question is: Do you want to learn how to become a successful tool?

Or do you want to learn how to become a successful human?
Which is more important? Which path should you choose?

Only if you install a completely new perspective of human life, and evaluate everything based on these two categories; can the complexity of human life be simplified into something that people can manage successfully, so they can actually gain control over their own lives and how they wish to live.

Do you feel-think-act as a tool?

Or as a human?

Which aspects of these two categories blend into the other?

How are they separated? What are the effects of the separation?

How much are these two integrated?

If you study, history: you will find a truth that is revealed repeatedly in the lives of people, in hard, painful life-lessons. And that truth is: anything that is not learned by both the heart and the mind is not worth learning. In fact I will go even further than that: for any knowledge to be completely digested, understood, and realized, you must learn it in a completely integrated fashion; so your mind, body, and heart, learns-feels-senses-realizes-understands what you learned as an integrated totality.

The history of civilized specialization and disconnection is the history of all one-sided separation into unconnected segments, special-interests and conflicts. It is the history of all human knowledge splitting off from the heart, and becoming a cold-dead accumulation of facts. Until it became so cold, so dead, and so inhuman: that it became 'Science'. It became pure tool knowledge, without one ounce, one atom of humanity. This is the situation we have today: tons of facts, an overload of technological information... but no learning of the heart.

In the final analysis: all heartless one-sided learning is evil, because it does not help people become more loving, kinder, gentler, wiser, more patient, or more honest. It only keeps people immersed in machine knowledge, machine actions, machine interests: not in human interests feelings, or actions. As tools evolved, they split the human psyche into deeper, more separate aspects. Until the split between feeling and thought became a cultural norm. Until logic, knowledge, and Science became completely divorced from emotion. Science has disconnected itself from all emotions, and all human feelings. It has become basically useless for ordinary people because it is not emotionally wise or useful. Science is emotionally unconnected knowledge. It is the intelligence of dead machines. The only useable and practical knowledge or wisdom that is humanly of any benefit to people is when scientific knowledge is emotionally, intellectually, and physically integrated, understood, and realized. Only the integration of emotional-intellectual-physical experience can give you knowledge; only Life and living can give you true learning, true understanding and true wisdom.

How can the use of tools and all tool-knowledge become humanized rather than mechanized? How can you make tool-use more humane? How do you humanize tools without mechanizing humans? What or where is the proper balance between these two basic factors? In using any tool, you end up being only partially human because you are only using a very small, specialized part of all your intrinsic abilities. That small fact has escaped the notice of the human race ever since the first fascination with its own tools began. Nobody becomes more humanly wise, or humanly loving, or humanly brave, or humanly honest by using more tools. You may reveal certain small aspects of wisdom or love through tool-use, but that partial revelation does not allow you to express or develop yourself fully as a human being. Nor does it allow you to affect another person fully. True wisdom is only imparted humanly, by one-on-one human contact: not through tool-use. You can go through as many checkout lines as you wish; but you will not gain any wisdom from the tellers who tally your purchases and take your money. Love is imparted humanly not through tool-use. Not even through writing letters. Writing a letter to your loved one, no matter how eloquent, is not the same as being with them and loving them.

Neither Wisdom, nor Love, nor Courage, nor Honesty, can be imparted or communicated by the use of mere tools. You cannot learn how to be human by using tools. The effect of your humanity is drastically reduced once you try to do it using any kind of tool. There are levels of Wisdom, Love, Honesty, Courage, and especially Wonder that can never be communicated through the use of tools: even using the tool of language cannot do it.

Given the general understanding of the limited usefulness of tools: how can we find a proper balance, a proper context, for the use of any tools? When should people use tools and when shouldn't they? How should tools be used? When should you say: 'I love you.'? And when should you hug or kiss? Or do anything for that matter?... anything that is purely human. Not using a tool... even language is a tool. When is touching more loving, more human than talking? When should people touch and when should they talk?

The question of tool-use in human existence opens up a vista of possibility-potential-experimentation-creativity that is limitless. It is a root-issue, a root-question that asks: how should we live? In what way? Using what guidelines? What principles? What ideas? Once you begin to explore your own life on any root-level: you will find that it opens up unlimited opportunities to be more creative. Ultimately: the exploration of your own life is an exploration of how to be creative with it. Living should be creative: not an enslaved drudgery chained to the tools you use.

One root imbalance of accumulated tool-knowledge is that the accumulation is one-sided. No book of knowledge ever bothers to outline and detail what is not known. No set of answers or explanations ever bothers to outline and detail what is not answered and what is not explained. No body of finite learning and knowledge ever wants to admit the infinite vastness of its own ignorance. All knowledge is presented only in a one-sided manner. Only what is supposedly known is presented: never what is unknown to give it any balance. This one-sided focus comes from the root-fear that all humans have of the unknown, of uncertainty, of the Outer Universe, of their Inner Universe. The result is a huge assorted accumulation of distorted area of knowledge: while pretending the greater area of unknown knowledge does not even exist.

What we as humans can sense: even with the expanded range of perception afforded by tools, is entirely selective and spotty. Whatever we can sense, there is an infinite range beyond our limits that we cannot sense. Then there is the infinite range of energies in-between the perceptions we do have, which we can never access... plus the range of energies that we can sense but only slightly. Anybody seriously intent on increasing their knowledge about anything experiences this. The more they come to know something, the less they know: because the context of knowledge always expands more than the knowledge itself. The unknown always increases more than the known. This demonstrates the difference between human finiteness and the actual infinity of the Universe. But you cannot become aware of this without first possessing a Sense of Wonder. The basic fallacy of the accumulation of knowledge is the same as the basic fallacy of the first tools ever used by human apes. All accumulation of human knowledge has been achieved by separation and segmentation and specialization.... Segmented facts, disconnected from the organic totality of human experience increases the accumulation of tool-knowledge, while at the same time destroying its human usefulness. Separation does not increase human wisdom: it destroys it. Separation of knowledge into disconnected facts does not make them humanly useful: it destroys their human usefulness. Humanly useful knowledge comes from connection: not separation.

The only useful knowledge that comes from separation is tool-knowledge: not human knowledge. Separation only improves the making and using of dead tools: not the birthing of, and living of humans. The basic principles of Connection and Separation are Universal. The dynamic of Separation causes Death. The Dynamic of Connection creates LIFE. Separated knowledge causes inhumanity. Connected knowledge creates human wisdom and humanness. The more you separate knowledge: the bigger the accumulation of useless disconnected facts. The more you connect knowledge: the smaller and more integrated, the more useful all your accumulated facts become... There are no exceptions to this basic Dynamic Principle. All human Separation is bad. All human Connection is GOOD. All separation is good for tools and bad for humans. All connection is bad for tools and GOOD for humans.

Humans became better at using and making machines and tools by separating: not by connecting. In doing this, they did not acquire any more wisdom or integrated knowledge on how to live their lives humanly, how to become more honest, more courageous or how to develop their Sense of Wonder. They did not learn how to better develop their intrinsic creative potential. They did not learn how to further develop their own humanity because none of this tool-knowledge deals with human feelings, human problems or human concerns.

The history of civilization is the history of civilized specialization and disconnection. It is the history of all one-sided separation into unconnected segments, special-interests and conflicts. It is the history of all human knowledge splitting off from the heart, and becoming a cold-dead accumulation of facts. Until it became so cold, so dead and so inhuman: that it became 'Science'. It became pure tool knowledge, without one ounce, one atom of humanity. This is the situation we have today: tons of facts, an overload of technological information... but no learning of the heart. In the final analysis: all heartless, one-sided learning is evil because it does not help people become more loving, kinder, gentler, wiser, more patient, or more honest. It only keeps people immersed in machine knowledge, machine actions, machine interests: not in human interests feelings, or actions. As tools evolved, they split the human psyche into deeper, more separate aspects. Until the split between feeling and thought became a cultural norm. Until logic, knowledge, and Science became completely divorced from emotion.

One imbalance of accumulated tool-knowledge is that it is one-sided. No book of knowledge ever bothers to outline and detail what is not known. No set of answers or explanations ever bothers to outline and detail what is not answered and what is not explained. No body of learning and knowledge ever focuses on the vastness of its own ignorance. Knowledge is presented only in a one-sided manner of selfish accumulation. Only what people think they know is presented: never what they don't know. Only what is accumulated is important. If it can't be accumulated, it isn't important

The basic fallacy of the accumulation of knowledge is the same as the basic fallacy of the first tools ever used by human apes. All accumulation of human knowledge has been achieved by separation and segmentation and specialization.... Segmented facts, disconnected from the organic totality of human experience, increases the accumulation of tool-knowledge while at the same time destroying its human usefulness. Separation does not increase human wisdom: it destroys it. Separation of knowledge into disconnected facts does not make them humanly useful: it destroys their human usefulness. Humanly useful knowledge comes from connection: not separation. The basic principles of Connection and Separation are Universal. The more you connect knowledge: the smaller, the more compact and more integrated the more useful all your accumulated facts become... There are no exceptions to this basic Dynamic Principle. All human Separation is bad. All human Connection is GOOD. All separation is good for tools and bad for humans. All connection is bad for tools and GOOD for humans.

The Accumulation of Wealth

The rewards of wealth are numerous: power, comfort, luxury, beauty, fame, safety, insularity, security, prestige, freedom, independence, autonomy, material possessions, ego gratification, fame and public validation... to name just a few. To survive in a pyramidally structured hierarchical society, people must compete amongst themselves. As a result: wealth becomes necessary for survival. To be without wealth is to become a victim of all those who do possess it. Wealth, ego and self-esteem are inextricably intertwined factors. Just as the development of an ego is necessary for survival in civilized society, wealth is used as a measure of one's worth; it is also a protective safety net.

But what yardstick do you use as a measure of your own worth? Inner worth or Outer worth? The ego's definition of self-esteem is based upon outer worth and one basic evidence of outer worth is wealth. However: a major factor that determines one's outer worth is the degree of one's inner worth. Outer worth is mostly a reflection of inner worth. That depends on how much you were valued as a child, and how you were valued. Were you given attention only if you accomplished something mechanically? Or were you loved all the time; regardless of any physical accomplishment? Were you valued as a tool or as a human? The level and kind of that self-worth is stored in your subconscious: and your subconscious level of inner worth and self-esteem determines what level of worth you feel comfortable with as an adult. If you were loved only as a useful tool, then you will seek to gain approval that way. If you were loved as a human, then you will seek that kind of attention as an adult. If your human needs were never met, then you will constantly try to fill that unfilled emptiness with the only things you have been trained to do: by working as a tool, and being valued, validated, and rewarded for it. If you were raised to feel worthless as a human, then you will seek out a lifestyle that will reflect this subconscious program you were imprinted with during your formative years. If your self-esteem happens to be high: you feel you deserve good things. But, how do you separate your human self-esteem from your tool self-esteem... from greed or ego? The root of both greed and ego is fear. It becomes difficult, if not impossible to separate the fear-based ego from any self-esteem based on love. People's inner worth and outer worth are mixed up with the abstract value systems of civilization. You get a mixture of ego, greed, fear, self-esteem and love.

But what kind of love? Selfless love or selfish love? The most dispensable human element within civilization is selfless love. It is the first casualty in any competitive system as far as values go. A person's inner worth becomes a reflection of not only their inner and outer worth, but of the value system that they exist in: it becomes the normality they exist in, the culture they exist in, the role they are taught to play in their society, their family, their community. So where you were born, what kind of parenting you received, which community you live in, what social class or strata you were born into, what kind of education you had, what peer group you associate with, what occupation you choose or are forced to take, which nation you live in, the color of your skin, which culture, which religion you were raised in, what level of wealth or poverty you grew up in... all goes to determine what kind and what level of self-esteem and self-worth you develop: and vice versa. Your own self-worth is inextricably combined with the tool-value systems of civilization. If your culture teaches you that outer worth equals inner worth, if you focus most of your energy upon developing your outer worth: then your inner worth will suffer, your outer and inner worth will become imbalanced. What values you use to base your self-worth upon will also determine how humane or inhumane that worth is. And the two conflicting value-systems of worth are the tool-value system of money-wealth-power-fame, and the human value system of love-generosity-kindness-empathy-cooperation.

Intrinsically: wealth or poverty; has nothing to do with one's humanity. Yet, both can, and do effectively destroy your humanity in different ways. Hungry, starving people do not have the luxury of developing their humanity. Freedom from want is necessary for anyone to develop one's humanity effectively. Moreover: wealth earned at the cost of oppressing others or impoverishing others is only earned at the cost of fear, guilt, arrogance, indifference, and insularity from others.

If you are an oppressor: your cruelty towards those beneath you destroys your own humanity.

If you are oppressed: your being brutalized and degraded by those above you destroys your humanity. The only social dynamic that develops humane humanity is equality. Both poverty and wealth; prevent people from fully developing their human potential. Both conditions damage the human psyche in countless intangible, subtle ways. Depending upon what you identify with: fear and greed, or love and generosity... the love of accumulating dead possessions, or the love of living people... depending on the priority of your values: whether they are tool-oriented or life-oriented, will determine the degree of your Humanity. The detrimental balance of wealth is this: the degree to which you identify with money or material possessions, is also the degree to which these accumulations own you.

Wealth and poverty are only relative trade-offs, relative imbalances. When you look at the human species collectively as a whole: both wealth and poverty is seen to be intrinsically evil as an imbalance. It is only when you examine the entire flow of wealth in civilization that you can perceive the harm it does merely because it is an imbalanced energy-flow. Wealth is a form of tool-worth, not human-worth. Having more wealth or less wealth does not make you more human: it only makes you imbalanced humanly speaking. To become richer or more fortunate than somebody else is merely a condition of inequity-imbalance: just as poverty is a form of inequity-imbalance. How that imbalance affects you and others in any larger context is almost never examined or explored. As long as you have people who are more fortunate than others are: envy, hatred, and fear will continue to flourish throughout all cultures and societies of civilization.

The unequal distribution of wealth produces poverty. Without wealth, there cannot be any poverty. It is that simple. If there was no unequal distribution of wealth: then all people would be both equally wealthy and equally poor... then neither wealth, nor poverty would exist: then the words: "wealth" and "poverty" would no longer have any meaning. The two are actually a single polarized Duality. Each defines the other. Richer than who? Poorer than who? You cannot end poverty without also ending wealth. That is a fact that no civilized person is willing to face, or discuss seriously,

There is a very good reason why many people who are wealthy are genuinely nice in person. Their wealth gives them the luxury of being able to afford artificial superficial niceness. At the same time: that wealth steals this luxury from others who must fight and scrape just in order to survive: and in the process, they become dehumanized. The possession of wealth itself is the intrinsic evil: not necessarily the character or the personality of the person who is wealthy. The nicest wealthy person in the world cannot make up for the ruined lives of those who must live in misery and destitution. The dynamic of this imbalance is so universally corrupt that it transcends all personality. The mere existence of wealth is intrinsically evil simply because its inevitable social consequence is the poverty and suffering of billions of people on this Earth.

Civilization is structured and designed to reward people who are better at accumulating, or saving. People who are not good accumulators stay poor: those who are good at it get richer. All personal wealth is based upon this dynamic. Due to the structure and dynamic of civilization, the mindset of security is so fundamental a basic need that the human psyche becomes imprinted, trained and defined from birth as an accumulator and a collector. The only way to acquire wealth is by saving more than you spend: the driving force behind most civilized motives is the pure, raw, urge to accumulate. But this training has little to do with developing your humanness. Becoming financially wealthy does not make you a better person. That is the root corruption of pyramidalized societies: they develop tool traits, not human traits. Basically if you want to survive inside human civilization: you have to become greedy, whether you want to or not. This is why human civilization is evil.

The Accumulation of Power

In terms of human awareness; power is the opposite of sensitivity, it is the opposite of Wonder. You cannot sensitize your awareness, or develop a sense of Wonder by the use of power; you can only desensitize it, or narrow it down to a specialized form of unaware blindness. Rather than developing our own senses to become more sensitive, we have only developed machines to become more sensitive. And since machines operate by power, their power distorts our perceptions. If you only treat yourself as a machine, living and functioning by the crudest mechanical values, you will remain unaware of your own intrinsic human potential, creativity and humanity. Whereas if you do not use power, if you do not use powerful machines, if you do not treat yourself as a machine; you can sensitize your awareness. The same truth applies socially: when you are not in a position of power, you can be more sensitive towards other people.

There is no such thing as a non-corrupt imbalance. You cannot be more powerful without in some way victimizing others. You cannot be wealthier without in some way impoverishing others. A person cannot have a higher social standing without in some way devaluing others. You cannot possess any kind of specialized knowledge or expertise without in some way taking advantage of others by profiting from that knowledge. The corrupting effect of all power is arrogance-blindness-ignorance. The more powerful a person is, the more arrogant they become. The more arrogant they become the blinder they become. The blinder they are, the more ignorant they become. The accumulation of knowledge, wealth, and fame give the exact same result-dynamic. The effect of power upon humans is universal. Mechanical power equals desensitized human awareness. All power desensitizes awareness. If you are powerful, you do not have to be sensitive to your surroundings, or the needs of others, or your environment. You do not have to develop your human traits. It is the power-context of our environment that determines how sensitized human awareness can be. You cannot hear birds singing or crickets chirping while driving a car. You do not have to be aware of every sound and smell around you if you live in a city that supplies you with all your needs and wants. If you are powerful, you do not have to cooperate with others. Cooperation, kindness, empathy, love, connectedness, sensitivity, can only exist when there is no great imbalance of power and powerlessness.

Power comes from using tools and thinking mechanically, or linearly. All linear logic is a product of our tool brains being used in some specialized function. The use of our tool-brains comes from any selective intent to manipulate, control, change, master, or dominate something. Any selective intent can be developed to have disastrous consequences simply because it is not balanced and interconnected to a larger context.

Parents can have the best of intentions to give their children what they never had. But the very selective nature of this intent; fails to give children what they actually need. Simply because the parents original intent, is usually selectively focused on what they lacked in their own childhood, and not on the actual needs of their own children. The power to give your children what you always wanted, and never had; blinds you to what they actually need. It also makes you unable to select wisely between what you should give them, and what you should not. The power of consumers to buy anything they wish; blinds them to being critically aware of whether what they buy is good for them, or bad for them. This is magnified a hundred times more by what they spend on their children, and what they let their children buy.

All power comes from the selective use of force. All destructive effects of power originate from selective intentions that are not connected to a larger understanding. The only form of human awareness that is nondestructive, non-selective, non-forceful, non-manipulating, non-controlling and non-harmful is the sense of Pure Wonder. The most loving and humane ways of raising children are without any use of force or power. The use of blind, unwise force or power destroys the human Sense of Wonder. The feeling of power, or control; distorts awareness and inflates the ego. All sense of power, all sense of ego, destroys the Sense of Wonder. The only mature use of Power is when it is used to balance imbalances. To right wrongs. To help those who need it most. Not to help those who need it least. Anything else is an infantile, irresponsible, misuse of it. The fantasy of infantile invulnerability, infantile omniscience. The need for an Authority figure... the infantile idea that if you are powerful and bigger than others you are a mature adult. And that the more powerful you are... the wiser and more mature you must be.... So automatically: the most powerful people magically come to be regarded as the wisest of the wise. This infantile charade has been repeatedly played out ever since humans first chose leaders.

However: what drives the desire behind invulnerability? The Fear of being vulnerable. The fear of being hurt. Cowardice. And it delivers what it promises in this temporal World. How many crimes committed by people in power have ever been properly punished? When is the last time you ever heard of a corrupt politician actually going to jail? What is the worst punishment we mete out to the worst, most corrupt Politicians? We just don't let them have all that Power again. Some of them... very few of the worst are ever given the most painful punishment an infant can endure... the horrible realization that they are no longer All-Powerful. However, they still get to be invulnerable. After serving their corrupt terms in Office, it is illegal to prosecute them for whatever crimes they committed during that time. Why? Because if Politician were ever held legally responsible for their actions during their terms in office: then they would be hung without any trials or hearings by their voters after discovering only one thousandth of what they were guilty of. The profession is a criminal's paradise. How to get rich, and powerful, and break all kinds of Laws ordinary citizens could not even dream of breaking... and not only getting away scot-free with their crimes, not only remaining invulnerable from most laws for the rest of their lives simply because they once held some public office... but being idolized and revered and kowtowed-to and sucked-up to for the rest of their lives also: And on top of it all...gaining the incredible ego-boost of a laudatory reputation... being admired simply because they were once a politician...? Regardless of what crimes they did, or did not commit during their term in office. Somebody please explain this to me... I don't understand.

The addiction to power is not reserved for presidents or dictators. It is not a vice of only the rich. Every parent is corrupted by their power over a helpless infant whom they can do as they wish to, without any fear of repercussion or punishment. The power to do as you wish: to act as a god is what every person who raises a child from birth is given. Power is also a seduction of ease. If you are addicted to ease, then you are automatically addicted to power, just as a president like George Bush Jr. is addicted to power, to ease, to the power of being able to command armies to go to war on his behalf. Power and ease are two sides of the same coin. If you are too lazy to walk to a store and would rather drive a car; then you are just as addicted to the power of your car, just as a president is addicted to his power. If you would rather throw your clothes into a washing machine than wash them manually; then you are just as addicted to the power of that washing machine, as any military general is addicted to giving orders to his men. If you would rather buy a TV, or go to a movie rather than entertain yourself; then you are just as addicted to the buying power of that money, as any multimillionaire is addicted to the advantages that his money gives him. Money-ease-power-status-fame-corruption; are all merely different aspects of the same basic dynamic of accumulation. How much they are used and their effects; is merely a relative question of degree and relative context.

The Accumulation of Social standing

How was status earned 100,000 years ago by the first hunter-gatherers? By hunting and gathering? By learned and earned expertise, experience, and wisdom? By the experience, wisdom and expertise that could help heal a broken bone or an ailing psyche? By leadership? By charisma, or charm, or personality? By prowess with tools? By a built-up knowledge of herbal medicine that could appear magical... and kept secret, so that the medicine man could claim to possess supernatural powers? By cunning, power-hungry individuals preying upon the fears and superstitions of their fellow community members? But then again... this is how status is still gained today.

However, one factor inevitably over-rode all of the others. That factor is the ability to kill. In almost every anthropological analysis of pre-historic human remains, the head of each society was also the head-hunters, the head killer, the fastest, strongest, most vicious, cunning, brutal, insensitive, killing man-ape. This has not changed. To this day: the most famous historical figures in each culture are its biggest killers, murderers, outlaws, robbers, and thieves. The biggest chieftains, kings, queens, and emperors; with the biggest armies, the greatest navies; who killed the most enemies, conquered, the most people, and plundered the most wealth. History pays almost exclusive attention to the most powerful dictators, rulers, heads-of-state... in short; those people who possessed and used the best, the latest weapons of mass destruction, and killed more people with them than anybody else.

The hunger and greed for attention-prestige-fame comes from living in a pyramidally structured society. The lowest strata always get the least attention: i.e. Children. If this original lacking is not healed-experienced, then this need for validation-attention remains insatiable for the rest of their lives. The lucky few who find an ersatz replacement for this never get enough it; and so the lure of fame becomes a corrupting addiction.

And no wonder: since along with it comes both power and wealth. What is the reward of being the center of attention? Ego gratification. The need for attention originates from a lack of self-esteem and an imbalanced psyche. A person secure within himself has nothing to prove. His own attention is all that he needs. Basically, the only kind of social standing-esteem-prestige-respect-attention, worth having is from equals. The only way you can garner the respect of an equal is by earning it, through hard work, commitment, closeness, cooperation, caring, and love. Any other kind of social status and esteem is unearned, imbalanced, and fake.

The value, importance of social standing as an indicator of what class you belong to only exists in a social structure that is hierarchically pyramidalized. The only time this happens is when human society overpopulates itself into groups larger than 12-24-36 individuals. The larger the overpopulation of people: the greater the population, the higher the ant pile of civilization; the more importance is placed upon how high or low your position in the shitpile happens to be. Social standing: class status is defined by the culture and size of the overpopulated society you exist in. Without overpopulation there would be no accumulation of social status. When you take away the context of an overpopulated human society: the factor of social standing vanishes because it only exists in the context of a pyramidally structured accumulation of overpopulated human society where people are fighting each other to get to the top of the shitpile. If you take the shitpile away there is nothing left to fight about.

The Accumulation of Ownership

Ownership is based on the concept of privacy. Privacy is based on secrecy. Private ownership is based upon the concept of selective ownership. Each private person jealously guards their selected piece of property. All forms of private selective ownership are continually preserved, perpetuated, sanctified and sought to be made as inviolable and sacrosanct as possible by the passage of time. However you look at it: no pyramidal arrangement of selective ownership can be logically justified. Because of this, any questioning of selective ownership evokes fear, insecurity, outrage, guilt and hate. Rather than try to justify it: people refuse to even consider the question: in fear that their rights will be assailed, that their rights of ownership will be threatened. The result is a blind non-questioning worship of the idea of selective ownership itself. The idea of selectivity as an unquestioned right. The only rationale given is the same one all winners give losers: a fait accompli. Once you selectively own something: nothing and nobody is supposed to have the right to divest you of your selected owned holdings. In order to survive inside civilization, people must become fear-ridden, greed-driven packrats... Continually trying to increase the pile of selected things which they privately hoard and own.

This literally forces people into a siege mentality of me against everyone else. Us against Them. It forces people to insulate themselves from others in order to keep what they selectively own from being stolen. It forces them to make crucial disconnections from other people because of fear, hate, mistrust and envy: which only produces more fear, hate, mistrust and envy. Until human life-energy stops flowing between people and begins to accumulate into dead things.

This literally forces people into a siege mentality of me against everyone else. Us against Them. It forces people to insulate themselves from others in order to keep what they selectively own from being stolen. It forces them to make crucial disconnections from other people because of fear, hate, mistrust, and envy: which only produces more fear, hate, mistrust, and envy. Until human life-energy stops flowing between people and begins to accumulate into dead things.

The concept of ownership alone guarantees that all individual and collective human value-systems are unconnected, irrational and in a state of conflict. Different people value different things, different cultures value different ideas. As long as what you own is important... As long as you spend most of your life-energy trying to acquire these things and own them: you will have a society whose members are in conflict with each other.

Today, the evolution of the abstract concept of ownership has gone far beyond the idea of holding onto a piece of land. This can be seen in the race to patent, own, and monopolize information such as the human genome and the genome of the rice plant. Since this genetic knowledge at present is virtually useless because it is not yet contextually connected and not usable: why the race to own it? The answer is the hope advantage-greed in the future: the ability to develop this at-present useless information, and find some way of profiting from it at a later date. For the most part, knowledge itself has never been prized: it is only the advantage that can be gotten from it which makes it valuable. This blind drive of ownership-greed can be seen in corporations putting individual stickers upon each fruit which they sell: as if they were solely responsible for its creation. As if they; not Nature grew it... as if they had manufactured it, as if they made it from scratch. Instead of just picking what Mother Nature created and grew and then calling it their own... as if they owned the ability to create and make an apple, as if they had the ability to create a living thing. The arrogance of this stinking corporate greed is only one indicator of how insanely stupid, selfish and greedy the culture and concept of ownership has become.

The motivation of human greed now seeks to own not only all physical property and all intellectual property but LIFE itself. In the future: literally every human genome will be owned by some commercial institution. The very DNA codes of the plants that we eat will be patented and owned and monopolized so that nobody can grow their own food without paying money to corporations who own the DNA rights to the seeds that you get out of your own garden... Even if you never bought the plants from that corporation... even if you live in Tahiti and the plant you are raising is a native-grown plant on that island. Even if that plant has existed there for thousands of years before that corporation was ever created.

The effect of all ownership is corrupting. It gives people an imaginary abstract power over things which they abuse for their own selfish benefit. When knowledge is only used for some kind of personal advantage or profit; it becomes expensive, hard to obtain, less accessible, less useable. By creating the concept of intellectual property: the dissemination and sharing of knowledge has become strictly limited. When information is used only for short-term, short-sighted goals: you have the disappearance of any perspective or wisdom. The slow erosion of public wealth and public property by the encroachment of patenting intellectual property is also the slow erosion of the concept of public rights, or any common good. History plainly shows that the march of civilization across the world has been one long, greedy, grabbing frenzy of trying to lay claim-to and own literally everything that isn't nailed down or owned by others. The entire history of civilization is nothing but an endless fighting over these possessions based on the idea of ownership.

The craziness of ownership can be demonstrated by what we choose to throw away. The instant any person does not want to own something anymore, for whatever reason: they throw it away. That property suddenly stops being their property anymore and is magically transformed into a piece of junk. How can the sacred right of human ownership disappear so easily? It disappears the instant it is not wanted. If a person wants to smoke a cigarette: they go to the store and buy a pack of cigarettes. That package is officially and legally considered to be their property. If anyone tried to take that package of cigarettes from them: they could be put into jail for it. But the instant that person finishes smoking that cigarette: the butt of that cigarette suddenly... is no longer their property anymore. Magically, it becomes a piece of useless junk. To be thrown away without thought, without thinking. The instant it is expedient and convenient not to own any property: humans easily and instantly absolve themselves of that ownership and throw away that property as useless, valueless waste. The instant Brazilian ranchers cannot use a piece of cleared rainforest anymore to raise their cattle on: leaving the previously owned land behind; devastated, and destroyed... as a waste product of their ranching lifestyle. Then they move on and magically own another piece of rainforest and repeat this insanity over and over. They do this just as unthinkingly as other people throw away cigarette butts. When is something junk, and when is it owned? One second you own it... and the next... by pure magic, suddenly you don't own it anymore. This exposes just how intangible the concept of ownership actually is. Literally every human on this planet does the same thing that cigarette smokers do. They own things, and then suddenly they don't own it anymore and throw what they used to own out into garbage cans.

Until a peer example is given and proven that you can actually live happily without any kind of abstract insanity called 'ownership'; you will never be able to destroy the root of the problem; the abstract imaginary concept of personal ownership. Moreover until a definite majority hops on board, you will never develop enough power to sway and swing the system the other way. That is unless a single person uses their superior moral authority to galvanize a large enough majority to become actively outraged at the evils and pure irrational craziness of personal ownership, and throw away all their personal possessions and create a new way of life without greed, without money, without the concept of ownership, without the jealousy and possessiveness which the imaginary concept of ownership creates. Jesus tried to do it. It didn't catch on.

The question of how long you should own something is never asked. How long should your ownership of anything last? Why are some things like paper bags owned for only as long as it takes to get home... and some things like land; is passed on even after you die to your children? How long should human ownership last? 10 minutes? 10 days? 100 years? Forever? It merely depends on how long a person wants to own something. All human ownership is based purely upon what people want to own. All human ownership is purely an expedient convenience of the imagination. It is a completely fickle, transitory, imaginary construct created inside our brains... by deciding that we want to have-possess, or control-manipulate something.

If a child sees a toy in a store window: they suddenly want to own it. Before the child sees the toy, it does not want it because it does not know it exists. But the instant that toy breaks; they throw it away, and no longer want it. That is how ownership works. European explorers traveled to other continents and planted flags of their rulers in the soil. And by reading certain official sacred texts before a small handful of European witnesses, they suddenly instantly 'owned' land that other humans had been living on for thousands of years before they ever arrived on the scene. This abstract declaration somehow made their Monarch these Europeans were in thrall to, the personal owner of an entire unknown unexplored land. Why? Because that monarch was greedy, and wanted to own as much property as possible, so they could become more wealthy and powerful. Colonizing America was easy because the native people living there hadn't yet developed the concept of abstract ownership to the same insane abstract degree as Europeans had. The concept of ownership is based upon Pure Greed.

Today, there are court cases pending on who will own the moon, if we ever colonize it. There are court cases challenging the right to claim parts of the Moon where astronauts landed as legal property of the nations who landed there. Now the latest development is that the USA has declared that it owns the moon! And plans to settle it on a permanent basis! Unfortunately it has not yet specified exactly how it will do this, or how much it will cost the taxpayer.

If humans could travel to other planets and live there: we could conceivably own the entire Universe. We could own asteroid belts, Moons, Stars, Galaxies: on an individual basis! This is a theme of Science Fiction. One noted example is Isaac Asimov's Foundation series: where humanity populates the Milky Way Galaxy... and a single Emperor owns the entire lot. Think of it. If you were the only person left alive, you could easily own the entire Earth by saying to yourself:

'I ---- own all the lands, all the mountains, all the rivers, all the valleys, all the lakes, all the mineral rights, all the clouds, all the air, all the oceans of this planet.'

What if you could not absolve yourself of the responsibilities of ownership, or any responsibility which that ownership entails? What if you could not select what you want to own?... What if every cigarette you own; you must keep forever as yours? What if everything you owned... whether it was convenient or not, expedient or not to own it; is still yours... forever? What if you could never throw away what you owned? What would happen if you had to keep everything you owned forever? Then the mass pollution of the earth by industries and people arbitrarily revoking their claims of imaginary abstract ownership would not be possible. Then mass production itself would not be possible: then everything you create and use and possess: you would have to own forever. Then every responsibility you have you would have to own up to forever.

Then... ownership would become a loathsome burden that people would avoid like the plague. Then, the last thing anyone would want to do, would be to own anything. Because it would mean that they would be saddled with all of the time-consuming responsibilities and duties and chores needed to maintain, look after, repair, clean, dust, preserve, fix, what they owned... forever. Not to mention finding room for it, housing it, protecting it from the elements, caring for it, and spending ones whole life looking after it.

In effect: that is precisely what civilization has done to humans. It has brainwashed people by programming them with the idea that selective personal ownership as a personal choice which does not entail any responsibility. Humans have enslaved themselves through irresponsible selective ownership. The more things you selectively own, the more time and energy, caring, and love you have to waste upon your selectively owned possessions. The less time you have for yourself and other humans. The less freedom you have to do what you really want to do.

Why is it that personal ownership takes priority over everything else? Civilized communities punish all kinds of owner-violations like property damage and theft much more harshly than they punish human violations like rape and murder. Civilized societies value and protect owned property more than they value and protect living creatures and living people.

The Law of Dynamic Balance is Universal and simple, and can be applied to everything without exception: whatever you own: owns you to the same degree that you own it. Being owned by a dead, non-living thing is not fun, it is not enjoyable. Dead things do not return your love and caring... they do not love you back... they do not waste their dead-Energy preserving and maintaining your life Energy. They could not care less if you polish your 'beloved' grandfather's oak table lovingly for twenty fucking years. Once you die, that table will not care one speck about all the hours you wasted polishing it. This is the one-sided, imbalanced insanity of living things trying not only to own dead things... but also to take care of them... to love them and preserve them as if they were alive. The corruption of the human soul begins with the loving of dead things and dead ideas over and above living things and Life.

It becomes even more insane when a living human tries to selectively own another living thing. Then you get slavery. All one-sided ownership is imbalanced. If something owns you to the same extent that you own it, then in effect: there is no ownership. There is only a balanced relationship. But you cannot find balance in a relationship between a dead and a living thing unless you have a sense of Pure Wonder. If you have a balanced relationship between living things... where people own each other equally without anyone having more Power, Status, Wealth, or Knowledge than anyone else... then you have in effect completely destroyed the civilized concept of one-sided ownership. If the land humans live on owns them as much as they own the land, then they become just another animal that adapts itself genetically to the needs of whatever ecosystem they live in. Once you balance ownership dynamically; you find to your surprise that this dynamic is the same dynamic that all living animals live by... it is the same dynamic of Evolution, the same dynamic as the Evolution of Galaxies or Stars, or Planets, or ecosystems, or animals, or relationships, or Atoms, or Molecules, etc...

What if every act, every feeling, every word, every thought, people had to own forever? What if humans had to be responsible and own up to everything they ever did or said? What if nobody was allowed to lie and say: 'I did not say that'. Or; 'I did not do that.' What if every human had to own up to everything they said and did? What if humans were forced to be completely honest and responsible in all matters of their selective ownership?

All western civilized legal systems are based upon the concept of the ownership of property. Not on the concept of responsibility. No civilized human fully owns up to the responsibility of their actions or their words. No civilized human owns up to the responsibilities of their rights of ownership. That is one example of the insanity of ownership: it is completely abstract, imaginary, expedient and arbitrary. It is sacred, unquestioned, unspoken religious dogma.

The last major innovation intensifying the insane greed of selective ownership was the creation of the legality of modern patents. Now humans do not just want to selectively own the entire planet and everything on it... piecemeal. Bit by bit. Buying up bits of land. They actually want to own their own abstract ideas so nobody else can use their new or creative idea... piecemeal. Bits of ideas... Talk about guaranteeing the death of creativity. Talk about destroying all dissemination of new ideas everywhere. Talk about trying to monopolize ideas, and not let anybody else use them. Talk about greedy selfishness becoming the norm of all human culture. If only the person who had invented the wheel could have put a permanent patent on it, his offspring would be the richest people in the world today. Everybody who uses a wheel, or anything round would have to pay a fee to use it. What happened when Thomas Edison patented his ideas? He died a pauper because of all the legal battles over the ownership of his patents. And what has happened since? No new major breakthroughs; because after that: all the fun of inventing things was destroyed by greed. Once inventiveness and creativity is not only wedded to greed, but also locked down solid by the insane idea of selectively owning an idea. As if someone else who later has the same idea has no right to even have had that idea because somebody else had it before. The entire history of modern media, its monopolization, its corruption for corporate profits and self-interests... became a history of Robber Barons stealing patents from creative inventors who were legally robbed of their inventions.

Today there are no individuals who invent anything new anymore. Because even if they do, no corporation will allow them to even get their products on the market. Now the only way you can create something new is by selling it to a corporation. But corporations are the most non-creative entities on earth. They hate change and fear new ideas like the Devil itself, and manage to poison or sabotage every new idea ever sold to them. Their main legal defence is to buy up patents cheaply and then never use them so nobody else can use these new ideas. The invention of creating a legal system where you can own ideas based upon who was supposed to have thought of it first; has not only opened the floodgates for lawyers to cheat everyone and complicate the system so applying for any patent becomes more expensive than the idea is worth. But it has created a force of selfishness, a dog-in-the-manger stupidity that has killed and destroyed the seeds of creativity in human society so no new idea ever gets to be even tried out. They all go into locked boxes, and die, and rot. Because the only creative impetus that is allowed to exist inside modern human civilization is pure greed. This kind of rotten creativity is not creative at all. It is anti-creative. The energy of creativity is based upon radiation. The only time any creativity becomes powerful, is when anyone can use it freely without anyone trying to own it. Once a new technique in painting was developed... other painters took it, stole it, and used it to innovate even better techniques of painting. The best creators were the ones who stole other people's ideas honestly. And admitted to stealing them... and improved upon them. Because these techniques and ideas were not personally owned by anyone. Because the idea of owning these techniques had not yet been invented. The entire dynamic of creativity and invention, and experimentation has been destroyed and killed dead for over two hundred years by the invention of legal patents trying to own something called 'intellectual property'. You might have a brilliant idea. But if someone gets to the patent office before you do; then you are not allowed to use your own idea. If a corporation hires lawyers and brings you to court even though your new idea is valid and original. They can bankrupt you, and keep you in court until you die... simply because they have the deep pockets to pay teams of lawyers to obfuscate the legal proceedings, and delay the matter, and bribe the court clerks, and judges easily.

The patent history of automobiles is an example of how all inventors of better, more efficient, cheaper, better quality, smarter designs and ideas: were bought-off, killed, poisoned, cheated, harassed, intimidated, squelched, threatened, sabotaged, and all of their inventions have disappeared by the hundreds... destroyed, bought up and their records coincidentally burnt or lost. All because of the insane idea of the ownership of abstract thoughts. Because giant corporations cannot afford to be threatened by actual competition. Because the internal combustion engine has become normal. Because nothing better is allowed to be built, manufactured, sold, distributed, and used. Because anything better than the internal combustion engine threatens the dominance of the Oil Industry. Because anything better would destroy the Status Quo. Because the Oil monopoly Power Broker cartels which rely upon modern Capitalist wealthy Nations retaining their power advantages and trade advantages will do anything and everything to retain and increase their power and wealth..

If ever a cheaper, less polluting form of power was found and developed and sold to the masses, the culture of civilization as we know it today would change so drastically that Capitalism would cease to exist. Wealthy Robber Barons would cease to exist. Wealthy Nations would cease to exist. There are far too many rich powerful people in the world who depend on keeping what they 'own' by keeping things the way they are now: to ever allow the masses to get better by a cheaper, non-polluting source of energy being available to them. The result of the concept of imaginary abstract personal ownership is the logical slide into everyone trying to own everything, all fighting and bickering over who-owns-what, and who-owns-who.

Inventions that are too good are never developed because the only ones who can develop them and sell them are the corporations who have a life-stake in not putting themselves out of business by doing something so suicidal as making themselves obsolete. But this is all hidden by the Capitalistic corruption of the patenting process, the marketing process, the development process, and the research process. Which is designed to produce only? Mediocrity and shit that is even more complicated than the crap that is sold now. You will never see Capitalism produce anything that is simpler, cheaper, longer lasting and of better quality. That would cut into too many profits of too many billions of greedy people.

The creativity of the music industry has been destroyed by patents also. All music should be free. If you are playing music only to make money then you deserve to starve to death. If you play music because you love playing music you should be allowed to do it without poisoning it with greed and snobbery and status.

Imagine if someone had been able to patent the idea of personal freedom. Then only one person in the world would have the legal right to be free. And everybody else would have to pay through the nose for his idea. What if someone patented the idea of breathing? Then every living thing that took a breath would have to pay him before they could take another breath of air. Then all living things would have to hold in their breath, hold in their freedom, hold in their thoughts... until the patent office gave them the legal right to use the patent for breathing, democracy and freedom. Of course every living thing would be dead before the patent office ever got around to officially granting these rights. And the entire world would be dead, except for the one patent holder who must be gleefully happy that he was the only one to have these legal patented rights. This is one example of how stupid and obscene the idea of the legal ownership of ideas and patents are. Owning a dead idea is useless unless you let the idea breathe and circulate freely around the world and let it live: it will rot and die and shrivel. Creativity blossoms only if it is free. If it is owned it dies. Life can only exist if it is free. If it is owned it dies. .

The question of how long you should own something is never asked. How long should your ownership of anything last? Why are some things like paper bags owned for only as long as it takes to get home... and some things like land; is passed on even after you die to your children? How long should human ownership last? 10 minutes? 10 days? 100 years? Forever? It merely depends on how long a person wants to own something. All human ownership is based purely upon what people want to own. All human ownership is purely an expedient convenience of the imagination. It is a completely fickle, transitory, imaginary construct created inside our brains... by deciding that we want to have-possess, or control-manipulate something.

If humans could travel to other planets and live there: we could conceivably own the entire Universe. We could own asteroid belts, Moons, Stars, Galaxies: on an individual basis! This is a theme of Science Fiction. One noted example is Isaac Asimov's Foundation series: where humanity populates the Milky Way Galaxy... and a single Emperor owns the entire lot. Think of it. Nature does not own anything... but it also is not responsible for anything also... Nature abandons what it creates because it does not own what it creates. Every year: trees let go of their leaves and abandon them to die and rot on the ground without owning them. Humans have taken the worst of both: the concept of ownership and lack of ownership and glued them together in the most foul ways possible: huge industries refusing to own up to the pollution they cause, dumping poisons which they created into the water and air and earth... while owning only the profits they make from selling their mass manufactured products to people and giving up all responsibility for what they manufactured and created; so people can own these dead objects, and then later throw them away and pretend they do not own them and are not responsible for what they once owned. And the industries that created these mass produced goods get away scot free: because they passed on the idea of ownership to consumers who paid them money to own these things. The idea of passing ownership of something in exchange for paper money. The idea of selling of slaves. Ownership comes from slavery. All the empires and great kingdoms of the ancient world were based upon the selling and use of human slaves for profit. The concept of ownership is an evil which needs to be cleansed from human society.

The Accumulation of Authority

Another name for authority is power. Another name for the perception of authority is pyramidal focus. People who have not fully matured, retain their child-view of the world where they still need someone or something to look up to. Giving up any self-autonomy is an abdication of your own power-authority. But when you were never allowed to have any power and never given the chance assert your own authority: you're not aware of what you have been robbed of. For instance: Giving up one's control of one's own critical faculties by allowing others to supply you with answers. Giving up emotional authority by allowing others to tell you what you should feel. And the most obvious abdication of all: physical authority, giving up physical control of your own life. Inside the pyramidal structure of civilization, such relinquishment is literally unavoidable and exists everywhere in all people in different degrees.

If you develop mastery over your own critical faculties, then even the idea of anybody telling you what is right or wrong is an insult to your own self-respect as a thinking person. If you develop mastery over your own emotions, anybody even hinting how you should feel is an insult. If you have mastery over your own spiritual life, anybody attempting to impose any kind of spiritual authority over you is an insult. A fully mature, balanced person laughs at such ideas because they do not have any need for anyone telling them what to do or what to think or what to feel. It is only a lack of maturity, a lack of development: emptiness-weakness, which lets all kinds of other influences fill up this inner vacuum.

When individuals and society are in a harmonious balance, there is no authority or fear: only participation, respect, love, fun and laughter. The abdication of your own authority and power, the existence of fear-pain within you; all inhibit the development of your human potential. To fear any authority figure: be it a God or a policeman, is merely a symptom of the condition of reflective fear that humans exist in, and the ignorance of your own undeveloped, unrealized power. When you have total authority and control over yourself you also have nothing to fear. Then you have total freedom to grow. A person existing in a state of Pure Wonder is always willing to learn-change-grow. They do not hand over their self-autonomy to others. A person existing in a state of fear-ego-pride is never willing to learn-grow. They are not in control of their lives. Instead: their ego-pride-fear controls them. That is the difference between true self-autonomy: developed from an open awareness that comes from Pure Wonder: and the obsessive need for control and power which originates from Fear.

In all civilizations: the logical consequence of blind obedience to authority; is hierarchal power on all levels in all kinds of ways. In any pyramidalized power structures: the dynamic and the effect is still the same regardless of the degree of this imbalance. This follows the same basic truth; that you become a victim of whatever you take for granted. As long as people do not question authority: they become victims of it. Any reduction of inequity and injustice is only brought about by questioning and challenging authority. But no hierarchical society can survive, if all of its members challenge the authority of the powerful elite who runs things. The questioning and challenging of authority is brutally suppressed in all authoritarian regimes. As long as you have authority, you will have social conflict.

It is not only ludicrous, but also impossible for any human to be responsible for any other human or take over their responsibilities. Yet that is exactly what having authority over anyone in any way presupposes. Taking authority means taking over both power and responsibility. How can any person exercise not only their own power, but also other people's power, and do it without a conflict of interest? How can you exercise any power beyond your own and not mishandle it? Outer Authority and Responsibility should go hand in hand; but they never do, and they never can... because no person can never, ever know how to act responsibly for anyone except themselves. Once you start trying to act for others you become irresponsible because you will never be able to act as they wish, or would have, or wanted to. No human can fully ascertain the needs, wishes or desires of another person. No human can properly act for another. Any given, or abdicated, or wrested, or accumulated power will always be mismanaged, misused, and create all kinds of conflict, suffering, inequity, and imbalances.

The only accumulated power that works without conflict; is the collective power of willing cooperation... and only if everyone included works for a common goal as equals. That in itself limits the size of any integrated, efficient, collective effort. Once you go beyond a certain size, then you get the tribal structure of hierarchy setting in. Then you get clans, chieftains, councils; and from there, you end up with all of the structural problems of accumulation; greed, power, corruption, etc... or in other words: civilization.

How is human authority supposed to work? By power. The power of a parent over their infant, their children. There are two aspects of Parental authority: reward and punishment. Parental authority supposed to be love based, and motivated only by what is good for the child. It is supposed to be positive. Based upon love, courage, honesty, understanding, and maturity. You are supposed to love your child, feed them, clothe them, care for them...reward them, nurture them... and if they are unruly, then lovingly discipline them also. How much parental authority should be used to only punish children? 1%? 5%? 20%? 100%? Does it make sense to spend all of your time and energy and authority; beating and punishing and brutalizing your child?

How is most parental authority mostly used? How is all civilized, authority systems mostly used? Negatively. No love. No understanding. No nurturing. No reward. Do anything wrong, and you are punished for it. Do anything right, and you are merely not punished. Giving no help, no encouragement and no love. Nothing positive. Is that what you call a justice system that is fair and balanced? Armed soldiers, armed police, armed thugs using fear and brutality to enforce all social authority? Using only the negative energy of fear to insure obedience?

You don't believe this? Count how many times a parent says no to a child, and count how many times a parent says yes to a child. You will end up with a statistical record of how negative and how positive they are... but only on a very superficial level. Never mind what a child is not allowed to ever ask or express... or feel, or think, or do. What is the accumulative effect? The end result?

Nothing Positive

What are all the old religions composed of? A lot of rules and no mercy. What are all governments composed of? A lot of rules and no mercy. The same sick thing. Only punishment, punishment, punishment... and more punishment. Hate and more hate. Fear and more fear.

Is that a sane way of using authority? Using punishment to control the children of a family, and also using punishment to control everybody else outside the family. So once you go outside your family group into the larger social group; that larger group treats you as a stranger, an outsider. And instead of protecting and rewarding you... it either ignores and neglects you if you conform... or it punishes you for the sin of not conforming. Teaching you to live in fear of all larger authority systems? Teaching you to never think for yourself. Teaching you never to learn independence, or responsibility. What do parents do? They teach their children to be afraid of everything. These stinking brainwashers teach nothing but fear to their children. They smother them with 'no's' and rules and limits and control; 'No!

No! Don't do that! You can't do that! No! Don't cross the street you might be killed! Huh? The child already crossed the street and was not killed. Everything a child does the parent reacts with fear. Every time the child finds the courage to do something difficult or dangerous or challenging the parent reacts with fear. The child is not afraid: it is the parent that is sick and obsessed about controlling the child. The paranoia of everyone having to be 100% 'safe' for children all the time not only teaches fear; it teaches boredom, it destroys all fun, all happiness. Using parental authority only for the benefit of the parent, teaching the child to be even more paranoid and filled with irrational fear than the parent. Teaching the child to be as helpless as possible, as lazy as possible, as stupid as possible, as spoiled as possible.

So the reward of authority is not in helping and giving and loving the child but reacting only negatively. All dominance and adversarial dynamics in human societies are a result of how Civilization is structured. Most Pyramidal structures are a result of the dynamics of one-sided, destructive accumulation. Accumulation creates hierarchal relationships. All adversarial relationships come from the hierarchical structure of civilization. Humans are constantly fighting over who is on top and who is on the bottom, who has the advantage and who has a disadvantage, who is richer and who is poorer, who more powerful and who is less powerful, who is the winner and who is the loser, which is the winning side and which is the losing side, who are famous and who are not, who has status and who does not, who is important and who is not important, who is valued and who is not valued, what is valued and what is not valued, etc, etc, etc ad nausea. By creating pyramidal cults of authority: the structure itself defines the value system. The point is: that the entire struggle of hierarchy, the entire idea of it, the entire waste of energy on it: does not prove anything. It does not do anything. It is artificial. The structure defines the dynamic. The dynamic defines civilized existence. Humans are defined by

The structures of accumulation which they create. Humans do not realize that it is the structure of civilization which defines and controls them. They do not control the structure, they do not control civilization. Civilization controls them. If you simply change the structure of civilization so it is non-pyramidal: then all of these pointless obsessions would disappear also. But because this dynamic is so all-pervasive in civilized life: the poisons of dominance and adversarial antagonism seeps into every aspect of our lives... the effect is a destruction of ALL happiness. You cannot be happy if you are worrying about who is on top. You cannot be a lover if you have to be fight all the time... How can you be happy fighting against the ones you love? Why? Because somebody has to be in control... somebody has to be on top? That is only one effect of civilized authority on people.

Authority was created so someone more powerful than you could tell you what to do, and you blindly obeying that more powerful person; without him having to beat you, or force you to do what they say... every time they try to tell you what to do. It was created to develop a reflexive habit of obedience to anyone who happens to be an authority, an authority figure, or an authority on something.

False Authority was invented so people in power do not have to answer questions. False Authority was invented to prevent people in power from being questioned or challenged. If you want to find out if a person has any true authority: ask them questions. If they refuse to answer your questions: that in itself exposes their false authority. All false authority is based up on one-sided lies and hypocrisy. All false authority figures cannot afford to be questioned about their authority, because they know that if they are questioned in public, or even in private: their authority will be exposed as the sham and fake that it actually is. All False authority fears questions.

All people who have true authority; are never afraid of being asked questions. All teachers who are true teachers are not afraid of their students questioning them, or challenging them. If you ask a teacher a question: and they refuse to answer it: then leave, and never come back. You have already proven to your own satisfaction that this person is not a true teacher. A true teacher is someone who has a sense of wonder, and never stops questioning. Any person who stops questioning, stops being a teacher also. The difference between asking questions and not asking questions is simple.

Evil people are afraid of questions. Evil people hate questions. Liars hate being questioned. Dishonest people avoid answering questions. Evil people hate the truth. Evil people fear Truth. All evil fears and hates Honesty. All evil fears and hates the Courage to ask Questions.

If they are afraid of questions. They are cowards. If their answers do not make logical sense. They are liars. If their answers are illogical. They are lying. If their answers are self-serving rationalizing bullshit: they are dishonest. If they refuse to be questioned. They are filthy cowards. If they refuse to answer your question. They are cowards. If you cannot ask someone a question. Then they are hiding from the truth. They are hiding the truth from you and from themselves.

The Accumulation of Leadership and Ruthlessness.

The first thing to wear away and settle at the bottom of any geological deposit or accumulation is the softest, weakest substances. The hardest substances end up on top. Civilized accumulations are no different. The softest, kindest, most loving, end up at the bottom while the most ruthless, the hardest end up on top. You cannot be on top and not be ruthless. The second any leader or powerful person is perceived to lose the hard edge of authority and ruthlessness: (that is: the willingness to use their power ruthlessly) they are instantly challenged and attacked by those more ruthless than they are.

In civilization: the compression that comes from accumulation forces all people to develop a hard outer shell called an ego. In the lowest strata of civilized societies, people are forced to be ruthless merely in order to survive their brutalized condition. It has been painstakingly documented that the survivors of Nazi death camps were all more ruthless than the ones who didn't survive. The kinder, more loving, more giving, more generous prisoners perished, while the more ruthless managed to survive.

What is more structurally important in any pyramidal accumulation: the apex or the base? Can the base survive without the apex? Yes. Can the apex survive without the base? No. Structurally, and physically the base of civilization... its lowest, its poorest are more important for its survival than all the richest, smartest, mightiest, most powerful elite... Yet, civilization values the apex more than the base. Can construction workers survive without lawyers? Yes. Disputes would simply be resolved in some other fashion... probably better, and with more equity. Can lawyers survive without construction workers? No. If there were no construction workers: then there would be no houses, no homes, no buildings, no cities, and no highways. Yet lawyers are paid more than construction workers. Why? Because they are not a staple necessity needed by everyone. They are a luxury service for the affluent and powerful that deal in elitist legal matters. It makes no sense to value a luxury staple service over a necessary staple service. In civilization: the more superfluous, the more unnecessary something is, the more it is valued. The rarer it is, the more it is valued. The apex is always valued more than the base. Regardless of what social strata you examine; ruthlessness is always valued more than the ability to be kind, gentle, or loving. This is one basic, dehumanizing effect civilization has upon humans.

The Dynamic of Degradation and Rot and pressure due to Accumulation

Civilization suffers from three universal conditions due to Accumulation: Pressure, Rot, Degradation

First there is the Pressure of accumulation

Accumulating Gravity Pressure
Accumulating. Social Pressure
Accumulating. Peer Pressure
Accumulating. Cultural Pressure
Accumulating Religious pressure. .

To avoid change.

Which in turn creates;

Rotting power structures
Rotting Cultural structures
Rotting Gravity structures
Rotting Social structures
Rotting Peer structures
Rotting Religious structures

That are too rotten, too corrupt, too weak and only change by continuing to rot.

These two universal Conditions of Accumulation over time; creates Conditions of Universal Degradation. On all levels. In all ways.

By the Accumulation of Pressure. And by the general Rotting of Accumulated things. This creates Incremental Change. Change created by Universal Degradation inside an Accumulation; is the worst kind of change possible. Universal Degradation does not allow new change to happen. It allows only old accumulated things to rot. And keep on rotting. All Incremental Change due to Accumulating Pressure, Accumulating Rot and Accumulating Degradation is sick, evil, filthy and obscene.

Why?

Because everything Small, Growing, New, Young, Healthy, Vibrant, Creative, Positive, and Good inside the Accumulation called Civilization: is systematically poisoned, crushed, twisted, stunted, destroyed, killed, butchered, tortured, hated, feared, and attacked.

What does that mean?

It means that out of all the possible combinations, and permutations. Every event that ever happened inside human civilization had the worst possible outcome. In other words, everything that happened was the worst thing that could have possibly happened. Every civilized event that ever happened was not the best thing that could have happened. It was the worst.

Critically minded people are aware of this. They are aware of things becoming steadily worse. They are aware of it happening. But they do not have a perspective on the basic dynamics of why it happens. They do not have a historical perspective on how it happens. They just know it happens.

Throughout the Ages: religious fanatics, leaders, writers, people in all walks of life have noticed this worsening of affairs, and fought it, preached against it, and hated it. Samuel Clemens: better known as Mark Twain, knew it. Twain ranted about how the America he knew was going to Hell in a hand basket. He, together with many other famous people, noticed how things never got better: they always got worse.

They did not understand it because they did not draw back far enough to get a proper perspective. They did not develop a critical awareness of Civilization itself. They did not expand their awareness enough. They did not inspect and evaluate civilization comparatively. They did not put their own Civilization under the microscope of scientific comparison and evaluation. They did not look a Civilization with a Sense of Pure Wonder.

If you live long enough: you yourself will notice this general dynamic in countless different ways. As a vague trend, as many causal factors affecting each other, as a general direction, as the difference between what once was and what is now.

You can point fingers of blame everywhere for this general, universal dynamic. You can blame everything for the general corruption due to Accumulating Pressure, Accumulating Rot, and Accumulating Degradation... You can complain about how the quality of life has been degraded. You can point to how the quality of drinking water has been degraded. You can point to how even the milk of human mothers has been degraded and poisoned by toxic residues and chemicals that came from how they were raised and what they ate and drank. But you will not understand it unless you understand the Root Dynamics of Civilization. These Root Dynamics are also the Root Causes for this process of Universal Degradation inside all civilizations.

What does this mean?

That is: as long as human society is based upon a Dynamic of One-Sided Accumulation.

Every major choice that was made: was the worst possible one.

What does this mean? It means that nothing inside civilization never ever gets any better. It means that things only get worse. It means that all the brainwashing bullshit called: Optimism, and Hope and Progress: is a pure, fucking lie. That is: as long as human society is based upon a Dynamic of One-Sided Accumulation. It means that the only time things will ever get better... the only way things will not get worse... is if we stop accumulating. Period. There is no way around this. No incremental change in the basic Universal Dynamics of: Accumulation, Rot, Pressure, and Degradation can stop 7 billion humans from accumulating into 15 Billion humans. No incremental change in Accumulation, Rot, Pressure, and Degradation; can stop the accumulated overpopulation Pressure of Billions of more Humans from the Degradation of the Earth, and the Degradation of their own lives. No incremental change of Billions more humans being born can stop the Rotting of Billions of more tons of Accumulated Garbage. No Incremental Change can stop this Accumulation of garbage from creating More Disease and Sickness. Etc. Etc.

Almost every major choice that was ever made by civilized humans was the worst possible one.

For example... After the 2nd World War: President Truman had a choice of how to use the industrialized power of all the war factories that had made the profiteering Robber Baron fat-cats of America even richer than they were before, because of the war. Manufacture Factory-built houses. Or factory built cars.

It was an easy choice. They could have done both with ease: but that would have destroyed the robber barons. That would have helped the common man too much. The building industry was comprised of small-time contractors. The car industry was already a monopolized oligarchy of three huge corporations. What is the result today? Expensive housing. The epidemic of poor people unable to afford any kind of housing. Workers spending most of their paychecks on blatantly overpriced rented apartments. Buying blatantly expensive overpriced cars. With almost no money left after these two major expenses. The epidemic of homeless people in America.

What would have happened if Truman had organized all of the thousands of industrial war factories after the war to build cheap, well-built, steel houses? Hundreds of millions of Americans would have had their own cheap, well-built homes which would have lasted for over 100 years without any need of repair and costly maintenance. There would have been no rich developers. People would have stayed in their own communities to work. They could have afforded even better cars. There would have been no poverty left in America; period. But they couldn't have that now.... could they? The Robber Barons controlled the Government and robber barons are only happy when everyone else is poor and starving and miserable. They decided to build cars instead of houses... as if an American who was not affluent enough to own a house was rich enough to buy a car? There was no sense to their choice. The more houses people could afford to own, the more cars they would end up buying. Truman was their obedient corrupt corporate-owned lapdog. He came out of the worst politically corrupt machine since Tammany Hall. He did not fight the Corporatizing of the USA after the war. Nor did he fight the Pentagon's takeover of the federal budget. Eisenhower warned the nation about it in his farewell speech. Americans ignored the corporate takeover of power in Washington and bought the crappy cars and crappy houses and thought they were getting a good deal for their money. They were totally wrong. So... the Luxor Corporation. The only company that tried to do it... and almost did do it. And in fact did do it... built the first modern mass-production plant that could turn out cheap, mass produced, modular steel houses. Modular pieces that could be transported easily to a site, taking only 3 days to assemble. Have your own custom chosen bungalow set up at the location of your choosing in a week for only 3,000 dollars! Transportation of the units, installation and setting up and assembly included in the price! They were enameled for God's sake, at the factory, under thousands of degrees of heat... enamel so hard and durable; they could and did last almost forever... In fact the few that were assembled are still standing today. The few Luxor houses assembled are still standing today after over 90 years of exposure to the elements: and they are still rust-free.

Luxor was sabotaged by the robber barons and Washington, and shut down. Because civilization cannot abide anything to be improved or better. Whatever civilization creates or invents or manufactures it always without exception must be worse than what existed before. Anything better is instantly taken away and sabotaged. Just like the Tucker Car Company was sabotaged and shut down because it was a threat to the big three major American car corporations at the same time that the Luxor Corporation was sabotaged and shut down. Because it was too good a car. It was too safe. It was too well-built. It was too modern. It was too affordable. It had too much room inside. The engine was too good. It had add-on features that could be installed at extra cost called accessories. So the consumer could custom order the features they wanted on their car. Making each model a custom car... Oops. The big three stole that idea: but only after they shut down the company that was making better cars than they ever did.

And the result today? Shoddy cars that cost a fortune to buy and another fortune to repair. An elite monopoly of the car industry-oil industry cartels; controlling the American Capitalist machine. Even the choice of which corporations survived and which went extinct were the worst choices possible.

Universal Principles of Human Accumulation:
The larger the organization the more impersonal it is.
The Larger the organization the more inhuman it is
The larger the organization: the more inefficient it is.
The larger the organization: the more destructive it is
The larger the organization: the more insane it is.
The larger the organization the more ruthless it is

This is why WW1 and WW2 happened. This is why Red China went into an insane state of mass hysteria for decades.

The Concept of Accumulation

All centralization, all one-sided accumulation: is sick and imbalanced. You will not find the Dynamic of accumulation... which results in a permanent form of centralization... anywhere else in Nature, or anywhere else in the World, or anywhere else in the Universe.

Stars that accumulate too much mass: explode and destroy themselves. Galaxies that accumulate too much matter, have black holes in their centers that suck this excess matter into a gravitational hell that destroys it, and spews this excess energy out as high-level radiation. Nothing in the Universe stays permanently centralized. Not Time, not Space, not Energy. Even Black holes are not centralized centers of permanently accumulated energy. They are continually spewing out old energy from their two polar ends while continually sucking in new energy. Not even a Black Hole can save or amass Energy indefinitely through a Dynamic of One-Sided Accumulation. Even a glacier is only a temporary accumulation of snow and ice. Glaciers flow like rivers: only in a larger context than a river, over a longer period of Time. Stars are temporary accumulations of mass and Energy. No star centralizes Energy forever through a Dynamic of one-Sided Accumulation. They have living, breathing life-cycles just as Galaxies do. When any Star, or Galaxy, or planet accumulates too much... when it becomes too big: it is destroyed. It destroys itself.

One sickness of human civilization is the One-Sided Dynamic of Destructive Accumulation called: Centralization. The term: centralization is only a code word to hide its true dynamic, and what it actually is. All Centralization is One-Sided Accumulation. If we replaced the word: 'to centralize', with its true semantic meaning: 'to Accumulate'... then we would have a more difficult time of hiding this from ourselves; that this is what it is we actually do. It would be more difficult to avoid asking why we are constantly Accumulating everything we can. We have so many code words that mean Accumulation: we have so many words we use... only as terms of accumulation. For instance:

Collecting, Gathering, Taking, Acquiring, Saving, Amassing, Building, Piling Up, Concentrating, Compiling, Harvesting, Stocking Up, Depositing, Recruiting, Warehousing, Caching, Storing, Banking, Stacking, Garnering, Gaining, Dictionary, Encyclopaedia, Assembling, Levying, Mustering, Increasing, Augmenting, Adding, Inflating, Gaining, Accretion, Aggrandizement, Developing, Waxing, Researching, freezing, drying, salting, fattening, enlargement, expanding, growing, rising, lengthening, etc. If you look at this list of different kinds of Accumulation: you may realize that this is what civilized humans do most of the time; with most of our energy; for most of our lives. Human Civilization can be generally defined as: One-sided concepts-assumptions-terms-functions-forms-kinds of Accumulation

We civilized humans are so insane: we even think of Time as an Accumulation instead of as a flow.

Has anyone ever found an Accumulated pile of Time anywhere in the Universe? Is there any way you can Accumulate Time? Can you save up your Time, while you are alive, and use it after you die? No. You cannot. Time is a flow. It is not an accumulation. It does not work as an accumulation. You cannot freeze Time, or save it, or salt it away, or pile it up... or accumulate it. But Science is so insane that it actually tries to do this. Not only that: it tries to segment it. Science tries to segment Time and accumulate it.

Can you split up Time? If Time was a finite material object: then you could split it up into separate segments. But Time is not finite. It is Infinite. It is not tangible. It is intangible. It is an invisible flow. Yet human scientists treat Time as though it was a finite piece of firewood that can be chopped up! And because of this: we civilized humans treat Time as a One-Sided Accumulation.

The idea that you can chop up pieces of Time into absolutely separated segments called seconds is so stupid, so illogical, so absurd: it is even stupider than the idea of chopping up all the oceans of the world into separate ounces of liquid. At least the oceans of the world are finite. At least they are material and tangible. Yet scientific measurement is all based upon the idea that you can chop up Time into absolutely separated, tangible segments. Simply because the bullshit illogic called Science is merely another rationalization of the human tool-process of separation, segmentation, and accumulation. And because of this: we civilized humans treat Time as a One-Sided Accumulation.

If something is dead for a long time... we value it more because it has somehow 'Accumulated' more Time while being dead. We value adults more than children because they have somehow accumulated more years of life. We count Time every day as an Accumulation of hours-minutes-seconds. We measure history by counting how many Accumulated years have passed. We measure work by how many hours of Time we have Accumulated. People pay wage-slaves for how many hours of Accumulated Time they spend working for them.

Time is money. Time is valuable... but only as a non-existent, imaginary Accumulation. Only in terms of an Accumulation. We treat not only Time as an Accumulation: we treat almost everything around us and ourselves as an Accumulation, or as something that has to be Accumulated. Even our awareness. Even our intelligence.

Human Awareness is: an Accumulating Normalized perception.
Human Perception is: a Normalized Awareness of Accumulation
Human awareness is a perception of accumulation
Human perception is an awareness of accumulation.

Accumulating is considered to be normal. We take Accumulating for granted. We take the idea of Accumulation for granted. We humans think in terms of accumulation. We act in terms of Accumulation.

Science uses Time only as a Concept of Accumulation.

How?

By measuring things.

How does Science measure things?

By using mathematics to measure things.

What is mathematics?

Mathematics is based upon the insane, irrational, imaginary idea of absolute separation. Mathematics is based upon absolute segmentations which do not exist in Nature and do not exist in the Universe. .

A mathematician counts things. They count leaves, people, blades of grass. They ignore the fact that the leaves are connected to a tree. They ignore that people are connected to families. They ignore the fact that blades of grass have roots that connect them to the living Earth. Mathematics is insane because it ignores all actual connections, and invents imaginary separations where none actually exist. By using a measuring stick. A measuring stick is an abstraction. Even though the stick is a single unbroken piece of wood: the stick is separated into absolute separations. It is marked with abstract imaginary separations where no actual ones exist. Each imaginary 'inch' or 'centimeter'... is marked by an imaginary abstract line. Each 'inch' represents an imaginary segment that is absolutely separated from all the other 'inches' and its only characteristic is that it 'accumulates'..

Mathematics is so insane: it has an assumed unspoken assumption of absolute identity. It assumes that every imaginary absolutely separated segment called a 'mile' is absolutely identical to every other absolutely separated segment called a 'mile'.

Why?

Because when you write a mathematical number like the number 1... It looks almost identical to every other abstract line drawn to represent the number 1. The first clay tablets used for barter had insertions denoting each sold item. Once people started using the same tool to make these insertions into the wet clay to mark how many animals or pans or loads of goods were bought or sold: they began thinking that the clay tablets represented what was sold and bought. After the transaction was done, and the animals were taken away: the dead clay tablets were still there. They were still there years later. All the clay tablets for hundreds of years had almost identical insertions made by the same tool. This is where the insane idea of mathematical numbers being absolutely separated segments that are absolutely identical to each other came from. This where the insane abstraction known as mathematics came from. From using tools. By segmenting things into dead pieces and then poring over the dead segments.

By trying to find something that never changes.

By finding something it thinks never changes, and assuming it is a 'Constant'.

What has Science found today that is not supposed to ever change?

Three things they call 'The rate of Time', the 'Speed of Light'... and the Weight, or Inertia, or Gravity of 'Mass'. Apart from these three things: everything else in the Universe changes. These three things are supposed to be exceptions to the rule. These are the only three things in the Universe that Science assumes, never change.

There is one small problem however... no Scientist in the World, has the slightest clue of just what 'the Rate of 'Time', or the 'Speed of Light', or the 'Weight', or 'Inertia', or 'Gravity', of 'Mass'... actually is. They use these three things: 'the speed of light', 'Mass', and 'Time' and call them 'CONSTANTS'.

Not having the slightest clue of what they actually are... Then they use these very things, which they do not have the slightest clue as to what they actually are... to Measure other things with.

But only in terms of accumulation.

They do not use these three imaginary constants in any other way.

So... What is Measurement?

It is merely a way of finding out how much something has been accumulated. Or how fast it Accumulates or how slow it Accumulates, or at what rate it Accumulates.

What is a 'rate' anyways? How slow, or how fast it exists? How slow or fast it is? How heavy it is?... How slow or fast it moves?...

A 'rate' is a fractional comparison. Taking two things out of context...and trying to compare them; by using a slanted imaginary line to separate these two imaginary values... or ideas, or concepts, or assumptions, or numbers. Like Miles-per-Hour... Or MPH or M/H.

Only... there's a problem with that. If you try to use fractional comparisons to compare two things that are different from each other... it doesn't work.

Trying comparing apple to oranges... because they are both round, and around the same size. So... if you have 5 apples; and someone else has 3 oranges... Then you have two more than the other person... Which is bullshit.

More of what? An apple is not an orange. An orange is not an apple. How can you have three more apples when the other person has no apples to begin with? The only thing you have more-of... is round objects. The only thing you have more of is numbers.

Oh... I forgot. Scientists consider all numbers to absolutely identical to each other. So 5 eggs is equal to 5 apples. Try baking a cake by replacing 5 eggs with 5 apples and see if the result is identical. The concept, the idea of identity comes from mathematical numbers. Mathematicians assume that all numbers are identical to each other. They assume that every number 1 is absolutely identical to every other number 1. They assume that every number 5 is absolutely identical to every other number 5. This is semantically insane because the mathematical number itself does not exist in the Universe: except as an abstraction that represents something that actual exists. If you count chairs by numbers: 5 chairs... are not absolutely identical to another 5 chair just because they are the same number of chairs. All 10 chairs are different from each other. But mathematics ignores this. Reducing everything to mathematical numbers is one of the most inhuman, insane, irrational things you can do.

Then by using the magic of mathematical formulas: it tries to balance and equalize these unconnected objects, or values, or ideas... by putting some stuff on one side of an equation, and putting other stuff on the other side. It is a common scientific use of abstractive comparison that is basically meaningless and insane. If one person has three stones and someone else has three eggs: they are supposed to balance out equally. Both have three objects that are oval, round, solid objects about the same size. So; three round rocks, equals three round eggs. Which is crazy. In a German Concentration camp: the difference between having three eggs as opposed to three round rocks was the difference between Life and death. But in a mathematical equation: they balance out. Not only do they balance out! This mathematical balancing hocus-pocus is supposed to prove that they are to be absolutely equal to each other! I know this sounds crazy but that is precisely how Science uses fractional comparison and evaluation.

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

Instead of fractionally comparing or evaluating apples to apple, or oranges to oranges. Science compares, or evaluates Time to Distance... or Miles-per-Hour... or M/H, or... MPH... or Miles

Meaning that Miles and Hours are supposed to have something in common with each other... So you can compare them fractionally. Like comparing apples to oranges because they are both round, and roughly the same size:  $\frac{3 \text{ apples}}{5 \text{ oranges}}$

Which gives you the solution... or an answer of 3/5th's

Of what?....

It is merely a fractional proportion, comparing the difference between two things.

But if the two things you are comparing are not the same. Then what the fuck are you comparing?

If you compare apples to apples: then the fractional proportion of  $\frac{3 \text{ apples}}{5 \text{ apples}}$

Then the proportional difference between these two Accumulations of apples makes a little sense. But the second you start comparing apples to oranges; you can't make any sense at all...

For example: Science does not make any sense in comparing Miles to Hours.

What does Time have to do with Distance? Are they the same things? Are they even remotely similar? Do they have anything at all to do with each other?

Can you have Time without Distance? Can you have Distance without Time?

Linear Distance has nothing to do with Time directly. Time is not mono-Linear! Time happens everywhere to everything at the same time! There is no fucking direct connection that can be found between Linear Distance and Linear Time. Because neither one of them exists except in the human imagination. This makes any direct fractional comparison between Linear Time and Linear Distance: illogical, insane, stupid, absurd; and completely meaningless.

If you move only three Miles an Hour linearly: you are measuring how slow you move in terms of how much Linear Distance you can Linearly Accumulate in one Linear Hour.

In other words: all Linear Distance is a Linear Accumulation.

Then you can turn around, point to your starting place three miles away: and claim that your movement is a Linear Accumulation...

Huh? Movement is a form of Linear Accumulation? HUH!?? An accumulation of what?...

What do any of them have to do with the others? Except... they are all defined linearly. Except that the existence of an imaginary line only exists in your damn head. Look back after you have traveled three miles: do you see any line marking your past travel? Do you see any line marking that past Time?

What if you had meandered around and come back to where you started from? Where is your accumulation of distance?

You can sit on your ass all your life and you will not accumulate any linear distance.
You can sit on your ass all your life and you will not accumulate any Linear Time.

You can sit on your ass all your life: And the distance between the Sun and the Earth will still be the same. And it will not be Linear.

You can run 20,000 times around the Earth until you drop dead; and the non-linear distance between the Sun and the Earth will still be the same. Since when does Distance have anything to do with Time? Since when do these two concepts have anything to do with accumulation? Unless you think you can accumulate it. The trouble is: you can't. You can only believe you did.

It is an imaginary equivalence. Invented by Science. It is pure bullshit. Even in terms of only accumulation: it still is pure crap. Only when you add the imaginary line to all of this does it work. Only when you confine your entire awareness to a linear awareness does it seem to make sense.

What if you can accumulate Time with no Distance? What if you can accumulate Distance with no Time? If you can do either of these things. Then why stick them together, and say you cannot have one without the other? It has been scientifically proven that the speed of our thoughts is instantaneous... that they take no Time whatsoever to reach other parts of our brains... So even that assumption is pure scientific bullshit.

Science assumes that all Movement of Energy is an Accumulation of Time, and an accumulation of Distance. Because Science only uses these values in terms of accumulation.

But.

Time is not an accumulation.
Distance is not an accumulation.

Science believes that all travel is a rate of the Accumulation of Distance... over an Accumulated period of Time. You can turn back and proudly say that you have Accumulated three miles of Distance over one Hour of Accumulated Time. If you had not moved: you would still be back there: three miles back where you began an Hour ago. You are measuring two imaginary points using imaginary abstract human concepts of Time and Distance. You are measuring an Accumulated Distance by two imaginary abstract values of Accumulated Time. You are measuring an Accumulation of Time by two imaginary abstract values of measured Accumulated Distance. You are measuring your Movement by measuring where you are... to where you once were... You are comparing and evaluating your movement. Using Time and Distance. You are using the idea of the Past and the Present to accumulate something. However: you cannot accumulate the Past. Once the Past is gone: it is gone. You can believe you have accumulated it. But that is only your imaginary belief.

Now if you learn something... if you learn from your experience, which takes some time... then you do accumulate something. But what you accumulate cannot be measured. And if you do not learn anything from your experiences, then not only have you not accumulated anything, but trying to measure what you have not accumulated is absurd and meaningless... What is the point in measuring time/experience if you have not accumulated any learning or wisdom from it? Do you want to measure the amount of enjoyment you have? Or the amount of suffering you are going through? What for? Why?

By thinking of Time only in terms of an Accumulation. By thinking of Distance only in terms of Accumulation. Science tries to accumulate things. Science uses fractional comparisons only in terms of Accumulation.

What if you didn't have any reason to move? What if you were happy where you are? Then; seeing someone walk three miles in an hour would seem pointless and meaningless to you. Then if that person tried to tell you he was proud of the fact that he moved an accumulated distance of three miles in an accumulated period of one hour; you would look at him as if he was nuts. Because he would have had to walk back an extra three miles just to tell you this. So he actually walked six miles. Just to tell you he was proud of accumulating three miles of distance. But since he walked three miles back to tell you how proud he was of accumulating three miles of distance. He will have lost all the accumulated distance he was so proud of. But he will proudly tell you he just walked six miles. Why? To keep fit? He could have jogged in one spot and kept fit without accumulating any distance at all. You: on the other hand, during that time: may have been practicing Yoga and become fitter than him without walking at all or accumulating any distance.

What is the human concept of measured Time?

The Human concept of Time is: The degradation of Energy. Slowly getting older, less healthy, and weaker until we die.

What if we did not die? What if we lived forever?

Then we could not measure Time. Then the idea of measuring time as a finite thing would not exist. The only reason we humans invented the concept of measured Time in the first place is our Fear of Death and Dying. What if you love running ten miles an hour every morning? And saw some fat, out-of-shape person barely jogging three miles an hour? Who was proud of the fact that he moved three accumulated miles an hour? When you yourself, never bothered to measure how many miles you ran, or how fast you went or how far you went; because you enjoy running for the sake of running; and not how much you can accumulate? You would look at that person as if he were an idiot. Because the difference between a person who enjoys what they do, and someone who measures what they do is obvious. Is it intelligent to measure everything you do; instead of enjoying what you do? The only people who measure what they do are people who don't know how to enjoy what they do. People who go to work from 9 to 5. People who are so detached from their bodies; they have no enjoyment in being physically active.

How can you scientifically compare a person who stays in one place for an hour, to a person who jogs three miles in one hour, to a person who runs ten miles in one hour? Only in terms of accumulation or non-accumulation. Does this make any damn sense? No.... But it's Scientific as hell.

What if you do not try to accumulate at all? What if you did not want to accumulate an Hour? What if you did not need to accumulate Distance? What if you did not care what time it is? What if you did not care how far away, or how close something is? Then all scientific measurement becomes meaningless. What if you only enjoyed living so much; you didn't even notice Time passing? What if you enjoyed the land you pass through so much; you didn't notice the distance you covered? What use would scientific measurement be to you then? What if you do not try to accumulate at all? What if you did not want to accumulate an Hour? What if you did not need to accumulate Distance? What if you did not care what time it is? What if you did not care how far away, or how close something is?

What if those three people did not feel like doing anything? How do you scientifically compare three people who do not move for one hour? You can't.

Why?

Because they didn't accumulate anything that you could measure abstractively, or linearly. But even worse: the two things Science compares fractionally; are both imaginary and abstract. Not only that. Science uses these fractional rates to compare only two things. Not three or four. To find a solution. To find a third unknown. To find an answer. To find an absolute, imaginary answer to absolute, imaginary problems.

What is a solution? It is an absolute. What is an answer? It is an absolute. Why are all scientific answers and solutions answers absolute? Because the questions are posed in absolute, imaginary terms. Absolute-in... absolute out. Or as the saying goes: garbage-in... garbage out.

Because Science uses the language of abstract mathematics to create abstract formulas, using Imaginary Numbers only in terms of one-sided accumulations. What is an Imaginary number? An imaginary number is an absolute.

So what is Science after all...?

It is the imaginary, abstract measurement of absolutes: using fractional equivalents turned into decimal fractions, comparing apples to oranges: in terms of accumulation. That's all it is. Nothing else.

Gaaaah, what does that mean?

It uses Time as a concept to describe accumulated light... By how many light-years it took to get here. Who gives a shit how many light-years it took to get here? It either gets here, or it doesn't. We either see the light, or we don't!

Since when the fuck does light accumulate Distance? Light is the same regardless of how much distance it 'accumulates' going through Space. Light does not try to accumulate Distance. Then why the fuck does Science define Light by how much Distance it supposedly has 'accumulated'? What kind of bullshit is this? Science uses both Time and Light as a 'Constant'... so it can measure things... Only in terms of accumulation.

Science also uses imaginary abstract 'Constants' in mathematics... to measure things with...

Only in terms of accumulation.

Science also uses imaginary abstract 'Constants' in mathematics... to measure things with...

.....Only in terms of accumulation.....

Science does not use Light, or Time in any other way. It uses them as imaginary Constants to measure things with; so they can imagine that something has been 'accumulated'... This is how Scientists think. That is mostly how we all think... in abstract terms of accumulation...

How did mathematics come about? By counting how many apples you had. By counting how many fingers you have. Mathematics was born out of Accumulation. Mathematics is not logical. It is merely an abstract language of accumulation that compares imaginary accumulated apples to imaginary accumulated oranges, and gives imaginary bullshit absolute answers, as a solution to its imaginary problems of comparing accumulations that are different from each other and are completely unconnected to each other. Why was mathematics invented? Why did people start trying to count how many apples one person had; compared to how many oranges another person had?

Greed. Envy. Scarcity. Starvation. The fear of starving to death. The fear of death.

That is not logic. That is insanity. That is Fear. That is the fear of dying. The only logic mathematics understands is the insanity of one-sided Accumulation. It is the logic of Pure Greed. Nothing else. Mathematics is not sane. It is not logical.

Why?

Because it does not connect anything sanely, because it only connects dead things. Not living things. Because it connects things that are out of context and not connected to each other.

The only time you can be logical is if you connect things sanely. An apple connected to an apple tree; is sane. An orange connected to an apple tree; is insane. A living apple connected to a living orange tree is not logical. A living orange connected to a living apple tree is not logical. It does not exist.

There is no sane connection between an abstract symbol; and what it actually represents... unless you represent actuality as it actually is, and how it actually works and why it actually works. Our Universe does not function by a One-Sided Principle of Accumulation called Greed. Mathematics does. The Universe does not work by the principles of addition and subtraction. Mathematics does. The Universe does not grow living apples on living orange trees and living oranges on living apple trees. It does not arbitrarily switch living pears, and living apples and living oranges from tree-to-tree and expect them to grow. Mathematics does. In the Universe: a pear is not the same as an apple, and an apple is not the same as an orange. You cannot take a living pear and make it grow on a living apple tree... and then since you think that apples are also similar to oranges: take that living pear from the living apple tree and switch it again to an orange tree and expect it to grow. Just because pears, apples, and oranges are all fruits that grow on fruit trees does not mean you can switch them around merely because they are roughly, generally similar to each other. That is what mathematics does. Mathematics uses the idea of identity. It uses symbols and ideas as 'equivalents'. By assuming something is generally equal to something else when they are not equal at all. In fact: mathematical equivalents have nothing to do with each other. The only sane thing mathematics does with equations and equivalents is balance them. But since all mathematical equivalents are one-sided accumulations. The only thing a mathematics equation can balance... is an accumulation. Nothing else! That is one reason it is so useless.

For instance: you can use a mathematical equation representing how many cubic feet of water flow past any given point in a river.... But only as an accumulation. You cannot use mathematical equations to represent how the water in the river dynamically balances itself as it flows down the river. You cannot use mathematical equations showing how every eddy, and swirl of every fluid once of that water interacts and connects itself to all the other fluid ounces of flowing water... is continually balancing itself dynamically while it runs down the river, and out to the sea.

But.... If you build a Dam across that river...

Then you can use mathematical equations to figure out how much water will accumulate behind the dam. Because that Accumulation is not a dynamic flow of Life Energy. It is a dead, abstract, imaginary one-sided addition or subtraction.

In other words: If you let the river live: you can't measure it. But if you kill the river: you can measure it. Science can only measure dead things. Science cannot measure living things. Science cannot measure Life. The only time you can use mathematics is if you accumulate something, or if you subtract something that has already been accumulated. You cannot use mathematics to represent your life, or your thoughts, or your feelings. Mathematics is an inhuman, insane, measurement of one-sided accumulation.

The only time you can use mathematics is if you accumulate something, or if you subtract something that has already been accumulated. You cannot use mathematics to represent your life, or your thoughts, or your feelings. Mathematics is an inhuman, insane, measurement of one-sided accumulation. Addition and subtraction are both one-sided. If you subtract from something that has accumulated... it is merely a one-sided form of backwards accumulation. You can never use mathematics in any equation to balance anything dynamically: simply because you can never simultaneously add and subtract at the same time. You need separate equations to describe what happens at the same time.

Hell... you would need hundreds of thousands of equations just to describe what happens in ten seconds: to ten feet of flowing water in a small stream. And you would still only be describing it not in terms of a flow... but in terms of a one-sided accumulation. Which does not make any sense whatsoever. Which is why mathematics is basically meaningless and useless for anything except one-sided accumulations. One-sided accumulation is not logical. It has nothing to do with logic.

Write on a chalkboard:  $1 + 1 = 2$ ....  $2 + 1 = 3$

That is not logic.

That is pure, one-sided accumulation.

Logic is connection: not Accumulation.

Addition is not Connection.

Neither is subtraction, or division, or multiplication or any of the other crap mathematics is used for.

Adding an orange to an apple does not automatically connect them to each other. Adding one gold piece to another gold piece does not connect them to each other.

Adding people together into a mass; does not connect them together to each other. It does the exact opposite. It separates them and isolates them and alienates them even more from each other. You can only get accumulation from segmentation, and separation: not connection. Separation and segmentation is not logic. Separating and segmenting is not being logical.

The Path of Splitness
Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

What do we humans actually do? We take a living bush or plant... and chop it up into thousands of pieces.... And then add them up, counting with our fingers up to ten. Making thousands of beads, and then adding them up. That is not logical.

But that is what we humans actually do.

Then we go on our hands and knees, and try to find one piece of that chopped-up plant on the floor that fits another chopped-up piece of that destroyed plant. After spending enough hours searching, we might find one chopped piece matching another separated, segmented, chopped-up piece.

That is not logical.

What we do is find one thing that connects to another, and ignore all the other pieces of chopped up things that we have destroyed ... and go:

“Look... See! Here is a connection. Look!... This dead segment fits this other dead segment. Oh... all those other millions of chopped up dead segments?... that were created when I chopped up this living plant? Oh... LET'S not look at that... Lets brush all of those other chopped up pieces under the carpet, and pretend they don't exist...

Let's only look at this one dead connection I found. See? I added one thing to something else, isn't that marvelous? Aren't I brilliant?... Now... how can I make a profit out of it... I know... I can add up all of my discoveries. I can add up all of my advantages. See! One piece of chopped up plant! Two pieces! See! I am Logical!

That is not logic.

Adding unconnected segments together, just to accumulate them: does not connect them. It just creates a pile of accumulated, unconnected segments. It comes from the basic dynamic of the first tools we used that produced: Separation. Segmentation. Accumulation. What about all of the other pieces of chopped-up segments you are hiding under the carpet?... eh? Can you connect them back together again? Can you glue the pieces of the plants you killed back together again, and re-connect all of the separations you created, and make that plant live again?.... No?

Then why did you kill the plant in the first place?

Just so you can add up some of the dead pieces? Just so you can accumulate some of the dead pieces?

What is logical about that?

Killing something, chopping it up... hiding most of the chopped-up pieces... and accumulating only some of the dead pieces by adding them up and accumulating them?...

That is not logic

That is pointless, mindless, destruction. That is going against the Dynamics of your own living bodies. That is a living thing; creating death instead of life.

What Is Logic?...

Logic is a connected totality. Logic is the living connected totality of a living plant. Logic is the connected Totality of a living eco-system. Logic is the connected Totality of the Living Eco-sphere of our Earth. Logic is how the Universe emerged from a single connected Totality, by creating a connection for every separation it created. You cannot separate any of these Totalities from the others logically. They are all connected. Yet Science separates them easily by using the abstract straight line as an imaginary separation. Without creating the necessary imaginary connection for every imaginary separation it creates.

You want to be logical? Create connections. Then Make a connection: before you make a fucking separation. Create a new connection without creating a new separation. Can you do that? If you cannot do that...

Then you cannot be logical.

Create a new connection without creating a separation. Start with a Totality. Then connect it to another Totality. In context. In the proper context. In the proper relative context. Not by some imaginary abstract bullshit. Not by selectively ignoring all the other connecting factors. Not by ignoring all the other connections, and only looking at one connection. If you can do that: you are being logical. If you cannot do that. You cannot understand a fucking thing logically. Then you can only understand things illogically, irrationally, and insanely. Then none of your rationalized, insane, illogical understanding will make any sense. Then there is no universal logical understanding. Then every rationalized, illogical understanding conflicts with every other rationalized, illogical understanding. Then you have a pile of civilized knowledge that is a rotting mass of pure accumulated shit. Then you can have experts arguing with each other until they are blue in the face, and not come to any agreement. Then it becomes impossible for anyone to completely agree with anyone else.

Science has created the insane detachment of the calculating mind. The human brain used as a calculating machine to add up things so they accumulate: the human brain used as a dead tool to segment, preserve and accumulate numbers and facts. The human brain becoming an inhuman piece of dead stinking stupid unaware, useless shit. The highest form of civilized human intelligence is supposed to be the detached calculating mind; actually it is the stupidest form of intelligence and the worst evil on Earth.

In other words: the only way we think is in terms of calculation. We only think in terms of one-sided accumulation. We have become incapable of calculating more than one side of anything. And that has made us so incredibly stupid: that every human with any common sense despises all of the policies and ideas and propaganda that are sold to them by the elite powerful rich. Who claim to know how to run business, government, and their own families: while they publicly screw up all of their calculated plans and theories, and screw up their marriages and children and themselves. Screw up their marriages and children and themselves.

Science is the most insane, the most poisonous symptom of the insanity called the calculating mind. None of their calculations work: except mechanically. Science is pure poison for a living human. It destroys your mind, your body, your soul, and your heart. It turns you into an insane mechanical calculating machine. And other humans are stupid enough to respect, worship and revere these cold, calculating assholes. Science cannot exist without the imaginary Linear Line. Without this imaginary Linear Line it becomes insane crap. Human abstraction cannot exist without the Imaginary Linear Line.

Take away the Imaginary Linear Line from human awareness: and abstract civilization crumbles, disappears, and vanishes before your eyes.

The Dynamic of Accumulation

The entire history of human civilization is driven by the insatiable desire for more knowledge, more power, more wealth, more fame-glory-social status. But whatever you cannot get enough of: is addictive, and ultimately corrupting. The greed for Wealth, Power, Status and Knowledge all originates from the tool-based dynamic of Accumulation. Each of these desires is blind because they exist regardless of what context they are found in. Humans have no control over their own tool-use, tool-evolution, tool-innovation. Because in civilization the tool is more powerful than the human. The tool uses and shapes each human generation according to its needs, not according to the needs of humans. While humans glorify the same exact desires, which create their own misery and suffering. Humans glorify civilization as an unquestioned, unexamined, pyramidal accumulation of knowledge, power, wealth and fame.

These four aspects of accumulation are all examples of imbalance, inequity and unequalness. They are also the four basic motivations of all civilized humans. They are the carrot, the reward for climbing higher in the accumulative pile of civilization. They are also the four basic evils, the four basic corrupting influences of human souls. Special knowledge or experience can only be achieved through the accumulation of specialization-segmentation of knowledge. Its level of corruption depends on the value placed upon it by civilization. All specialized knowledge is a source of imbalance. All forms of human inequality are corrupt. Simply the fact of not allowing any special knowledge to be freely taught to everybody makes the holder of it corrupt. This accumulation of specialized knowledge became inevitable with the onset of civilization. Every area of specialized expertise can be shown to be corrupt because they all lead to the same process, the same dynamic: they are all used to gain power, wealth and social standing. Each calling or profession is basically a racket designed to benefit the holders of that expertise at the expense of the exploited and excluded majority. As these forms of expertise splintered-segmented-accumulated, those at the top of the pile became more powerful-more wealthy-more famous-more corrupt.

But knowledge-power-wealth-fame does not produce happiness-fulfillment-peace-love-connectiveness: it produces the exact opposite. With today's modern technology there are more poor and starving people in the world than ever before. But people ignore the billions of human souls being crushed by civilization. Instead they only focus upon the apex of that pyramidal accumulation and worship it, glorify it... pyramidally, segmentally, out of context: simply by not putting all the segments of that totality together. You cannot sanely value anything you cannot understand. Only if you experience-evaluate-compare-and put into perspective all of human civilization can you gain an understanding of it as a single basic social structure.

None of these aspects of civilization need be corrupt: if they are dynamically balanced. If a person who is wealthy works so that this wealth is equally spread throughout society; then it is not corrupt. If a person with a certain expertise works so that all people gain his expertise; then that knowledge is not corrupt. If a person who is powerful works so that his power is disseminated equally to all others; then his power is not corrupt.

But this never happens. Once civilization emerged; its structure alone dictated the imbalance of these four aspects regardless of circumstances. As this accumulation grew, the levels of corruption were only determined by how unequal any aspect happened to become in relation to other aspects. Once the accumulation of knowledge grew so that no single person could master all of it, once people's roles forced them to specialize in some kind of expertise: then, unavoidably, knowledge became a corrupting dynamic within human society. The corrupting effect of any form of greed is universal for all humans: whether it is the greed for knowledge, power, wealth, or fame. The universal effect of greed on a human soul, what it does to people: how it cuts them off from other people so they are unable to share anything of themselves with others, how it insulates them from the suffering of others, how it insulates them from any awareness of their own spiritual corruption, so that they are capable of rationalizing their own actions as being moral-just-right-good, how the culture of greed is evidenced in justifying the oppression of all those below you, how being trained all their lives in taking, people never learn how to give, how this invisible, intangible, secret rotting and shrinkage of the human soul begins from birth, slowly destroying all innocence and wonder. I have no desire to detail or follow the convolutions of these imbalances as they are evidenced in each human soul: except to say that all forms of greed and the sense of Pure Wonder are mutually exclusive.

One Basic Effect of Accumulation: Antagonism and Competition

The dynamic of accumulation forced humans to become adversaries... antagonists, competitors: and the consequences of this have all been universally adverse... Within the pressures of civilization, people had no choice but to adopt adversarial roles. Whatever the inequality, inequity: if somebody has it, somebody else wants it. Success-advantage-competition became more valued and developed than any form of cooperation. Until you get pyramidal events such as the Olympics: which is mostly about humans competing mechanically physically between each other.

Originally, the Olympic Games were an international-political-cultural-religious-sporting event. At that time, these aspects of civilization had not split off from each other as they are today. But even back then, it served mainly as a way to channel the armed conflict of warfare into a less destructive form of conflict, while glorifying only how humans functioned physically-mechanically. The glorification of all sports: focuses purely upon the ability of humans to function only mechanically: worshipping it above other human abilities. What are The Olympics: but a Worship of Physical measurement. Someone being .0014 seconds faster than someone else. Or Gail Deevers becoming Olympic Champion, because the other runners were flat-chested, and she actually had breasts that swelled-out, literally winning by a nipple... So all the other runners will be forgotten, but she will be remembered as a world-famous Gold Medal Winner... because her nipples stuck out more than the other women. What does that have to do with human life? What does that have to do with living? Have a Gold Medal for the best nipples in the World. Go around measuring how much faster, or higher or farther humans live. Have a Gold medal for the fastest lover.

Physical measurement is meaningless. It does not mean anything. It has no context, or relevancy to human existence. Billions of humans worship measurement not only in the Olympics: but in thousands of other ways also. Spectatorship became worshipped because of pure accumulation. What one person watches is not important. But what millions of humans watch suddenly becomes the most important thing in the world. Regardless of what they watch. It does matter what they watch... it only matters how many of them watch.

If millions of people loved watching turds coming out of a rectum: the Media would have shit-cams. It would become entirely normal to come home, turn on the television, and watch people taking a shit. And anyone who objected to it would be either derided as being crazy, laughed-at, or completely ignored as a nutcase... because they are only one person... they are not the majority. And whatever the majority likes is supposed to be good, not bad. Thousands of Romans liked watching people kill each other for hundreds of years. Did any of them listen to the few who puked their guts out seeing this shit? No. Just as billions of people today think watching the Olympics is perfectly good and normal.

That is the danger, and sickness of everything humans call normal... Once enough humans start doing something, or thinking something, or acting some way, or feeling, or being some way... then no matter how stupid it is... no matter how insane it is...no matter how sick it is... no matter how revolting and filthy it is... It is okay... it is accepted unquestioningly... it is not challenged, it is not changed. It becomes normal. Then whatever this normal shit is... if it keeps on going, it becomes habitual, then it becomes customary, then it becomes traditional... Until it becomes sanctified, holy, sacred, honored, revered, worshipped, set in stone, frozen, rigid, unquestioned, etc.

Human-hominid trained focus:

The creation of the spectator was invented by the dynamic of artificial man-made fire. Once an artificial fire took over the living center of each community. Then our ancestors just sat and mindlessly watched that artificial fire.... Being distracted by its flames... being entertained and distracted by listening to others, while staring at a fire.

Then this inverted pyramidal focuses of attention was magnified by the accumulation of more people gathering around to mindlessly be distracted by something. The central cell of the community was enlarged to include more than 20-30 people until they used amphitheatres. Then the arena was born... as the only way an individual could compete for attention against all of the hundreds-thousands of voices-people in that overpopulated communal cell: so the spectators could be mindlessly distracted by watching something socially... with other people beside them doing the same thing.

This dynamic could never happen if there are only 20-30 people without a fire in the center of your community... Not even to show-off any physical prowess. If you reach the top of a hill before everyone else and want to crow in triumph and feel more powerful and better than all the others of your group... who is there to witness your accomplishment? You must wait for the others... and if you are hungry and thirsty, you must wait for those who are carrying food and water to bring it to you. Since the only reason you were there first was because the others were carrying what you did not carry, and was far more important to the survival of your group than any individual showing of egoistic prowess. You are forced to wait alone... with no spectators to massage and puff up your ego... In fact: if you get to the top too fast, it becomes a lonely, unwanted, unrewarding accomplishment.

The earliest amphitheatres were egg-shaped, or half-eggs. They were not round. They were only mimicking the half-cell of the original two-cell bands of 12 each that made up the smallest single grouping which was the original group-size of our ancestors.

In this earlier context; winning, or being at the top of anything, was a negative feedback situation which was avoided at all costs. Because it not only created imbalances in each half-cell and double-cell community... but it also threatened to split-up these cells into smaller units; that were not as safe, or as good for the survival of the members, or the group as a whole. In those earlier times: splitting up a double-cell only happened when there were enough people to create an entirely new double-cell. This splitting was never designed to polarize people into winners and losers except in the winning and losing of being able to survive in Nature, against natural hardships, and against the other bands they encountered. Consequently: the dynamic of center-focus. The competition for attention. The creation of the passive observer-spectator. The dynamic of trying to penetrate an egg-cell... the dynamic of competitive survival. The creation and accumulation of the ego... is all a product of the over-intensive use of tools over millions of years of tool-evolution... by walking apes who were blindly trying to do something with dead tools that instead; they should have been trying to do with their living selves. This produced a tiny minority of winners and a majority of losers... and an even larger population of Non-participating spectators.

To split and polarize people into winners and losers is not a balance: it is a disconnecting imbalance. The difference between fun and competition in sports is that it stops being fun when winning becomes the primary goal. Once you get serious about any kind of play-activity it stops being fun. To base the concept of happiness or fulfillment upon winning also means that you cannot be happy or fulfilled unless somebody else is losing: i.e. Unhappy. Even if competitive antagonism is done on a perfectly level and fair playing field, with the contest being only between two people... for there to be any winners: fully half of the world's population would have to lose. But if you compete pyramidally: then for every winner, there must be hundreds, even millions of losers. If in order for you to be happy requires that many other people be unhappy: then your happiness in winning is morally corrupt. The idea of replacing fun with ego gratification makes no sense whatsoever. But it makes perfect sense if you wish to pit the human species against itself and train it into becoming competitive antagonists and enemies

All of the inward-looking sport spectacles. All of the arenas, all of the sports competitions, all of the adversarial sports combats that human huddle around to watch: looking inwards instead of outwards: all of the insular perimeter inward-dynamic of spectator sports; designed to block out all awareness of the outer world, the earth, Nature, the perennial beauty of Nature and the vastness of the world humans live in compared to their puny little social interests; all this structured non-awareness of the world all around you and outside you, is the imbalanced, one-sided, one-way focus and perspective that man-made fire created by destroying the natural balanced Sense of Pure Wonder which every infant and child is born with. Human civilization completely ignores and blocks out from its awareness everything outside the artificial shell which the use of fire created as a social dynamic of one-sided unawareness

Sports

As long as people have competitive egos, they cannot be happy unless they can look down upon somebody else, unless they spend their whole lives trying to prove they are better than others. The need to win transcends all other considerations, thereby corrupting ones humanity. All hierarchical power struggles, all antagonistic competition turns people into enemies: making any love or even cooperation impossible. The competitive weaning process that only rewards the lucky few in all competitive sports insures that the majority of humans do not even get a chance to develop their potential in any field of endeavour; be it professional sports or the job market. The general effect of all unloving, antagonistic competition that is based upon the id, the super-ego, the 'Me first and screw everyone else.' attitude towards life and living. This basic attitude towards others results in unhappiness, frustration, and misery.

The only reason there is any fun at all in playing tennis is because one of the rules is that you can only keep on playing as long as you keep the ball inside the lines of the court. If that rule did not exist, then nobody would play tennis to 'win' or play anything competitively.

What if half the people in the world actually refused to compete with the other half... What if you went to a tennis court and nobody wanted to play to win at all... What if all they wanted to do was keep the ball in play as long as possible... Then who would play tennis at all? Yet... the best way to learn any ball sport is to keep the ball in play as long as possible. Unfortunately all the fun of doing so is automatically poisoned at the start by people trying to learn how to play competitively instead of just having fun with it.

Firstly: if you try to learn any sport competitively... you won't even be able to learn it. If you have never hit a tennis ball with a tennis racquet in your life, and you go onto the court trying to win instead of practicing first, you will end up spraying the ball in all directions because you have not even learned yet how to develop any hand-eye coordination skills good enough for your partner to hit the ball back to you. As a result, most fledgling tennis players get disgusted at not having a chance even to touch the ball and will quit playing at all. Then you will never ever play tennis again; because you will be convinced that it is not fun... except for the few gifted experts who waste all their lives mastering this one difficult ability and can control the ball with their racquets enough to beat other players who have wasted most of their lives trying to win...

Competitive organized sports are horrible destroyers of a child's ability to have fun. Instead of giving children the freedom to play their own games as they like; adults interfere and take over their child's play: turning it into work... into practice... into competition, into a fight for status. The obsession with perfecting some athletic feat is everywhere in mass culture. Surfers, basketball players, skate boarders and roller-bladers waste years of their life trying to perfect challenging tricks which take only a few seconds to perform. Athletics has become the exclusive arena of show-offs. They practice endlessly. They do not laugh, they do not have fun, they do not enjoy what they do. Their specialized athletic trick is their only claim to fame. It is the only way they can be noticed by other people. The only way they can develop their ego, their self esteem.

If you took away any competitive concept in tennis and only made it a game where two people try to hit the ball to each other as playfully and with as much fun as possible, then there is no longer any need for these imaginary lines. You can play any game of pitch-and toss with any ball or bat or racquet... only when people stop doing it creatively... when it becomes a mechanical boring repetitive game that is too easy because the two players do not push each other's limits playfully and happily... then it stops being fun. The only reason these lines were created is because people did not play the game cooperatively enough and got tired of chasing down balls hit too far away to even hope hitting back. Because their partners were not cooperative enough to hit the ball back at them so it was not easy to get, but also not impossible either. This way both players stretch their abilities, improves their game faster, and become better players while cooperating at the same time. One reason sports are boring is because it is being done with tools; mechanical aids, abstract lines and rules. One reason it stays interesting is because most sports use a round ball that nobody knows exactly which way it will bounce. It is the unpredictability of what you are playing with that makes it fun.

Repeating a stroke or action over and over again without the unpredictability of the actual world interacting with you is not fun. Yet: all ball players are forced to do this for years... cooperatively. It's called training. In fact all sports are based upon this ignored cooperation: without this cooperative training there would be no athletes at all, no super-trained athletes, no super-trained skills, no super-developed abilities. Not all, but a lot of it is boring and repetitious because they are all striving insanely to become the best in the world instead of just having fun with whoever happens to want to play. That is why sports are not played by most people. Most people do not like it when other people become obsessed with only winning. That is precisely what has ruined and is ruining all sports: the idea that in order to have fun, you also have to win.

Sports are based upon imaginary lines. They are based upon creating certain imaginary lines: and then recreating them endlessly... without changing them at all. Changing or taking away one imaginary line in sports is unthinkable, inconceivable... but then that is what all civilization is based upon also. Even slightly altering any of the imaginary lines is a huge revolutionary change in any sport. Change the number of downs in football from four to three and suddenly you have an entirely different game... suddenly you have Canadian football, instead of American football. Let the American NFL players get 10 yards on 3 downs instead of 4, and see how lousy they are compared to the Canadians who do it regularly... Meaning the Canadians get 10 downs regularly only using two downs for gaining yards instead of three downs. If the Americans were ever forced to play by Canadian rules in a truly international competition: the Canadians would beat the pants off the Americans... and if the Americans played the Canadians using their four-down rules, the Canadians would still beat the pants off them.

Another thing about the effect of imaginary lines used in any sport. Like in tennis. What all imaginary lines do is completely change the dynamic of the game. What if no imaginary lines are used...? Then no hit ball could be considered unplayable. When you play with imaginary lines... especially in tennis: where most of the balls go out of bounds, and most players instantly give up on trying to reach them... so most of the time instead of trying to have fun, what they end up doing is trying not to have fun... trying not to make a mistake... suddenly the entire game becomes negatively polarized... then the players no longer like playing because they make too many mistakes. Then they try to play perfectly within certain imaginary boundaries by making no mistakes at all. The trouble is, making mistakes is the one of the main ways you learn to become better at whatever you do.

The entire dynamic of human learning has never been properly studied. But if you bother to search your own experiences, you will find that you only became able to play or do something according to the imaginary rules of your society by first making mistakes. Learning comes from making mistakes. Using imaginary lines and imaginary rules as absolutes that are supposed to be sacred and never changed is a major reason why people do not play sports. Because whatever absolutes and imaginary lines are used; it does not let them play the way they want to. If you take away all absolute imaginary lines and rules from any sport: then it becomes impossible to win or lose. Then the idea of winning or losing becomes so unimportant that people can easily have fun without being competitive. Playing a sport creatively instead of by rules makes it more fun. This is done everywhere in sports, but only incrementally. Nobody dares to throw away the entire rulebook: nobody dares throw away the basic concepts of the absolute and the abstract imaginary line. If we did that then all people: young and old, could play sports the way they want to and have more fun doing it.

One example of what happens when you relax some rules in sports is Broomball. It is an offshoot of professional hockey. Begun by overweight hockey fanatics who never learned how to skate. They decided to play hockey their way. Without a hockey puck, without uniforms, without hockey sticks, without skates, without having to spend years learning how to dribble the puck and learn how to skate, without even a goalie to guard the net. They just took a bunch of sawed-off brooms and a huge rubber ball that anyone can whack at... and ran out onto the ice and horsed around... sliding and slipping all over the place, yelling and joking and having fun. Pretending to be the best hockey players in the world; so nobody else dared to make fun of them on or off the rink. This way they managed to keep other people from finding out how much fun it actually is. Otherwise every person with an ice rink would have thrown away their skates, and started professional broomball teams and ruined hockey.

Even so, they nearly always draw an envious crowd of onlookers who wish they could go out there and play. But Broomballers are just as exclusive as all other sports nuts. You can only join, if you are overweight and have a beard... or a moustache, or sideburns, or some ugly facial hair. Talk about sports discrimination. Only allowed to have fun if you are out-of shape and wear a beard or sideburns... They still play by the general ideas of hockey. They still play on an ice rink, and have a goal net and try to score and win against each other. This is only one proven example of what can be done creatively if you get enough people together who would rather have fun than the follow rules and try to win.

Take professional football and professional baseball: two of the most specialized sports in the world. Where one football player only kicks one kind of kick during the entire game... and if that kick is not needed then he does not play at all... or the designated runner or hitter in baseball... where any player can be replaced with a certain extra player at any time during the game... In football: the entire idea of being a team is destroyed by specialized roles. There is no coordinated teamwork at all. There is no team. Only specialized specialists doing their specialized things. With nobody knowing what the hell is happening: because there is not enough cooperation.

Even the plays are sent in by playbook specialists. How much intelligence does it take to play professional football? How much intelligence does it take to function only as a robot... ordered to do a certain specialized tasks on command? How boring is it? How dehumanizing is it? That is not teamwork. That is being trained to feel like a machine, function like a machine, and being proud of being a stupid, brainless robot machine: just so you can work at playing a meaningless game and be paid big money because other jobs are less fun, and less well-paid, and even more dehumanizing.

What if both games: football and baseball were games where the players are rotated through every position. If every hike of the football had a different quarterback, a different linebacker, a different pass receiver, a different tackler, a different kicker, etc... Then the team with the best all-round athletes would win. Not the most specialized. What if each team had to play both sides of the ball: Offense, and Defense. Believe it or not, that was how the game was originally designed to be played... that is until too much money corrupted it. Then there would be no one-skill specialized athletes. What if baseball was done on a rotation basis also? So every at-bat had a different pitcher, a different catcher, a different first baseman, etc... Then there would no pure hitters, or specialized relief pitchers. And no players sitting on their asses for hours bored out of their minds.

If you want to make football even more fun... have the game set up with 24 players on each side. And 12 footballs being hiked at the same time. Twelve hikers hike the ball on one side to twelve carriers, and go after and try to tackle the other twelve ball carriers on the other side... while their ball carriers try to avoid the other twelve hikers. If a hiker successfully tackles his man trying to tackle his quarter back, he can then get up...run and catch a pass from his ball carrier... Then ball carrier he tackles has to get up and suddenly become a pass defender.

But. What if it is a running play? Then the tackled attacker has to get up and chase down the quarter-half-fullback, or else he will score a touchdown easily... because he has then only one man to beat. Man-to man football. One-on-one macho toughness and speed and agility. Then you will see ferocity, and intensity that will make your hair stand on end. You will see runners doing things never dreamed of. You will see tackling rise to such a high art, that it will surpass ballet in its pure poetic beauty. You will see foot races, tumbles... all without any injuries. They will throw away those cowardly pads and helmets as slowing them down too much. It will become personal... mental, psychological...

The hiker and ball carrier alternate their roles-positions, and the team with the most touchdowns wins. This way, in only two downs, every player gets to be a quarterback, a hiker, a linesman, a tackle, a pass receiver and a pass defender. Is that enough of an athletic challenge for the macho superstar specialized football stars who can only do one fucking thing? Or will they all wilt and cringe and whine that this kind of football is: 'Too hard, man'. If they whine, then let them shut up and let real men play the sport who do excel in all aspects of the game as it was originally intended.

Then there would be so much fun, so much chaos, that it would not matter how skilled anyone was. There would be 12 balls in play every down. There would not be one single person on the field that did not have an assignment and a challenge... There would not be one single person on the field who was not in on a play... There would be much more team involvement; because there would not be one single player sitting idle on the bench: except extras to fill-in for injured players. Also there would be less injuries... because there will be no specialized bone breakers to get up a 20-yard head of steam, and no 400-lb monsters to fall on top of somebody.

Talk about complexity. How do you coordinate twelve passing or running plays? What happens when three footballs are thrown to one receiver? Does he catch all three and score three touchdowns? When you have them strung all the way from sideline to sideline, then any superior speed would be nullified; there would be no long end-rounds. Just mano-a-mano football to the umpteenth power... Then, there would also be less huge pile-ups of bodies, less injuries, and more skill required. Oops. But if one quarter-half-fullback on one edge of the field decides to run the entire width of the field to outrun his tackler... there would be every form of running play ever imagined. Who tackles who? Who isn't tackled? Who slips through? Tacklers will be going nuts trying to decide which quarter-half-fullback to tackle.

After you are personally tested against both of the other side's two players, then the opposing hikers slide down after two plays... until you play against every single player on the other side... The result is; the better players will shine like stars. Then everyone on that field will know how good they really are... personally matched against each of the other teams players. This means that each two-man team has to play four downs against the other side's two-man team before they slide down to play the next team. And see how they match up against 24 players who have 24 different ways of playing the game, thinking the game, 24 different quarterback decisions, tactics, ideas, etc...

Imagine a huge linebacker picking up a quarter back who was trying to tackle him... in his arms... and carrying both the ball and the protesting would-be tackler all the way to the other end zone... and then giving him the ball, and a wet kiss on the forehead to boot on top of it? What if instead of trying to avoid being tackled...the person with the ball starts hunting the tackler, so he can carry him to the other end zone, or knock him down and run over him? What if the person with the ball does not run away from the tackler? But only waits for him to be foolish enough to try and tackle him... because the instant the tackler gets close enough... he will be grabbed, and carried.... Along with the ball... Suddenly... there might be ball carriers chasing tacklers... who run away, yelling at the &^^&$% to get away from them... because they do not want the humiliation of being carried to their own #$$%^ end-zone and given the &#$$^ ball... and kissed on top of everything... As the most utter possible humiliation of a tackler ... who will never live down that humiliation, and have people laughing about it for years...?

‘Remember when ----- carried you to your own end-zone?... Now THAT was some er, tackle! You were on his BACK!! You were all over him! For almost, er... 40 yards! That was the best 40 yard backward tackle we EVER saw!...’

If you can pick up the tackler... his days as a tackle are over. The best he can hope for is either knocking the ball loose while you carry him, or struggling free of your hug, er tackle, er... Then... tackling becomes a very, very iffy proposition. Then tacklers suddenly have to be careful of not being caught and carried. Then it becomes a dance of two men... one with a ball, and one without a ball... kind of like wrestling... only not quite... One player is trying to find ways of picking the other up without being tackled... while the other player is trying to think of way to pull him down, without being picked up. Interesting idea, isn't it?

Ball carriers chasing tacklers? So if they manage to carry the tackler also... its xx extra points? What might their victory dance be like? Dancing with the er, tackler?.. But this can only work with one-on-one football. It won't work with a team.

Now: put that game just once on a National Network: and don't tell me that it won't catch on like wild fire. And oops. You'll have to fire all coaches, the coordinators and the playbook specialists, who sit on top of the stadium, making tons of money, controlling the game like so many useless out-of-shape vultures. The players themselves will have to think up their own plays. They will be forced to show how smart they actually are, how creative they actually are. No matter how great any athlete's physical abilities may be... if they are dumb and uncreative: they will be beaten badly by the smarter players. Then you will finally have a game that tests and shows such a wide range of human abilities, that the ones who are actually more able in all abilities... the ones who have the most balanced all-round game will come out on top. Then there will be no more specialization in football at all.

What if you allowed not only tackling... but also tickling? And had a five to ten second delay after every tackle; before the whistle is blown... To give a good chance for the tackler to tickle the ball loose from the other player. That would allow time for every sneaky thing to be done... Then it would allow every player to pile onto the downed player and tickle them free of the ball. But... too many piled up bodies prevent any effective tickling. Allow tickling to go on all over the place. The pass defenders would be allowed to tickle the pass receivers all over the field... with no five-yard limit. The defensive linemen should be able to tickle pass-rushers with no limit. Tickling would be allowed even after the play is over, and the players are going back to their respective sides where their players won't tickle them... Like hell they won't.

Only tickling of genitals would be penalized. Besides...their metal cups are protection enough... and who wants to be penalized for trying to tickle someone's metal cup? They'd be thrown off the field as wimp-fags, or dirty lecher-rapists. Then who would be the easiest to tickle? Then any tickling on the insides of their thighs would make the biggest macho, homophobic idiots go nuts... Then the professional teams would have no choice but to find layers who are the least ticklish. The ones most secure in their maleness and... those players just happen to be also the best ticklers. You would see players being chased back to their side of the field after the play Herded... cornered... crying for help. How can you get insulted at someone tickling you at an inappropriate spot, if that is the entire point of the game? Those whoever loses their tempers, or has too much macho pride... would be cut quickly from the team. No matter how good an athlete they might be. They would be draw too many penalties, and would be booed off the field for being a poor sport. 'He tickled me here...!' 'So what, you big lummox?'

Where do football players hold the ball? Against their side, or stomach. With what do they hold the ball? With their arms. What happens when you tense your muscles against attack? They become sensitive to tickling. Where are football players the most ticklish? On their stomachs and under their arms. Ten seconds is plenty of time to coax any football out of a properly tickled football player. That is... unless they squirm... like eels. In that case, someone just takes a hold of their ankles; pulls them up, upside down... and lets the whole team tickle him to death until he drops the ball. Then you might have scenarios like a player who knows exactly where someone is ticklish... and after he is tackled, just saunters up to him leisurely with all the time in the world as the player is desperately clinging to the football...tensing himself against the oncoming attack, and says to him:

'Yoo Hoo, Oh, Yoo Hoo... Hoowwiee... is that my ball you're playing with...? Why you bad boy. How dare you be playing with my ball?... Now give me the ball Howie... What are you doing with my ball, Howie?... Now Howie... Tickle, tickle, tickle...'

And the instant poor Howie being tickled to death loosens his grip on the ball... the tickler pops it out. Then they will call it tickleball instead of tackle football. And be a hell of a lot more fun to play. Then children will love playing tickleball, and parents will no longer be paranoid about letting their children play a violent dangerous sport. But now we wouldn't want that, now would we...> Eh? Too many multi-millionaires would lose some of their precious millions of dollars if we ever changed the game of football into a better game, and had more fun playing it. Which team would win? The best comedians. The funniest players. The slyest. The best tacklers. The best takers. Or the best givers. The smartest. The ones with the biggest egos... the best lovers... The ones who cling to the ball the hardest. Or the ones who do not cling to the ball as hard. How many professional athletes are smart, and funny, and sensitive, and good at tickling... eh? The entire psychological momentum of the game would be determined by who were both the best ticklers, and the best tacklers. The team that could make the other team laugh so much that they lose all concentration and drop their passes, fumble the ball, and make silly mistakes... Then all the players would end up tackling each other so gleefully, so funnily, and have so much fun that... oops. They might forget about winning... They might tend up treating each other so lovingly and tickle each other so much that... Oops... There goes professional football: darn.

As for baseball. Do it with three teams instead of two. And have them rotate positions. Try having twelve batters against twelve pitchers and twelve fielders. And the pitchers have to throw the ball all at the same time or throw it again if they throw too soon or too late. The bases would be the same as the numbers on your watch from 1 to 12... every time the score reaches 12, each separate team switches roles-positions... All the pitchers are one team. All the hitters are one team. All the fielders are one team. After twelve balls go up in the air at the same time, (or only three, or only ten...?) ... The advantage of the pitcher is reduced because they have to time their throws as well as aim them. The hitters hit more balls. But... there are twelve bloody fielders.

There are three teams labeled team A, team B, and team C. 12 players each. Each team rotates after each play to play the three different positions together as one team: hitter, pitcher and catcher. So all the pitchers are one team. All the out fielders are one team. All the batters are one team. So all of them are playing the same position together with the same skills needed and the same goals.

The pitchers all throw their balls at the same time. If there is any pitcher who does not throw it at the same time the others throw it... either he is penalized, or all the pitchers are penalized. Lets see how damn good the best pitchers in the world are if they have to synchronize their pitches with eleven other pitchers... The scoreboard should be like a drag-race count-down... with the no.'s 10!... 9!... 8!... 7!... flashing. So all the pitchers can do their own wind-up to let fly exactly when the Emperor blows his whistle. The anticipatory excitement of that build-up alone... will drive the entire crowd into such a frenzied state of excitement that girls will faint and full grown men will start screaming... You want excitement? When twelve pitched balls flash down at twelve coiled batters... and they swing their bats in near unison. All at the same time.

The entire damn park will erupt in a screaming roar of adrenaline, that will be heard so far away, that people will phone police stations... swearing they just hear a full-grown lion roaring outside their house. The Emperor is the referee deciding which hitter gets to start running the bases. There are no catchers behind each batter. The hitter must pick up their own ball if they fail to hit it and throw it back to the pitcher. There are no umpires behind any batter... they are no longer called batters because their only job is to hit and run there is no waiting around, sitting on your ass for hours. There are no balls-strikes-fouls at all... any ball hit counts no matter where it goes except into the batter's cage... whether it is playable or not. This will make all batters cages everywhere decent training grounds for any professional Hit'n run athlete.

Will this make the hitters try to hit it as badly as possible and hit it over their heads as a former foul? No. There will be a cage over their heads, so any foul balls will bounce back onto their own heads, so they have to throw it back to the pitchers and hit it again decently. The hitters work purely on a hit-or-miss basis. If they hit it; they have to run whether they want to or not. The pitchers are on an honor system. If they throw a strike: that is bad: then they will have to throw it again. If they throw a foul ball into the cage that is bad: then they will have to throw it again. If they throw a home run, or a ball out of play, that is bad: because then the other teams will score... Their only goal is to have as many balls hit into the air and on the ground as possible... at the same time; that are cacheable or gettable... hoping that the more balls hit at the same time, the more screw-ups the other teams will commit and the better chance they have of scoring when they get to hit.

But are the pitchers on the side of the fielders or the hitters? They are on both sides. After the pitchers throw the twelve balls, they all run like hell to become the 12 basemen. They play a dual role. They want the hitters to hit as many balls as possible so they will not be penalized for lousy pitching... but they also want to get the hitters out so they will not lose. The pitchers will be furious if the hitters don't smack the ball right away. They want all twelve balls to be hit to create a log jam of runners that can be thrown out more easily. The hitters who don't hit on the 1st pitch will want to see where the open field is that is not being covered by a catcher.

“Throw me the damn ball back... you lousy @%#$%@...”

Both hitters and fielders will be yelling at them and hating them: believing they are on the other side... oops; they better not: otherwise one team might find itself battling two teams... er... instead of one. Pitchers dropping easy balls so hitters can score, or throwing wicked curve balls that make for easy ground balls?... which do they want? Who are they rooting for? They will have both fielders and hitters begging them, sweet talking them bribing them... It will become so full of secret deals and nefarious alliances and friendships and feuds... Everything the pitchers do will become suspect. They will either be forced to become paragons of virtue, or the sneakiest bunch of rascals you ever saw... The fielding team tries to throw as many balls as they can catch or get to the pitchers-cum-basemen. Needless to say: twelve pitchers running to twelve bases, with all the hitters having to run to the starting point of the first base, will be crazy-wild action. The right side of the batter's boxes will have a great advantage because they will not have to make a 90-degree turn to begin running the 12 bases and they will be closer to 1st base. Any pitcher who does not get a hit has to throw the ball again as fast as possible if he wants to get to his base... the hitter will fumble the ball and return it as slowly as possible while their pitchers yell at them to throw back the damn ball or be called out by the Emp.

The scene at first base itself will be a nightmare ... far worse than Abbot and Costello's bit about who's on first. Because the Empire... not the umpire, has to control literally who gets on first-second-third-fourth... Augh. With count-em: Twelve hitters madly running to be the first runner.... Big status for the quickest? No. Not if the quickest is stationed at the end of the hitter's boxes farthest away from 1st base.

Oh... and what if more than one ball gets thrown to any basemen. Do they try to catch one? Or two. Or all of them... And what do they do with the extra ones since they can only use one ball to tag one runner out. The way to solve this is to give all twelve balls a different color, so only the orange ball can be thrown to the 1st base, and only the red ball can be thrown to the 2nd base. While all the balls can be thrown to twelfth base. And... once a ball is caught by any baseman, it can be thrown to any other base to put any other runner out.

Never mind picking up an already thrown ball that is dead and trying to use it to throw out another runner illegally... then... God help the Empire. He will have to be a real Emperor. And lay down the law; as twelve fielders and twelve basemen-pitchers... all told, 24 men. Come running to argue with only twelve hitters...who are trying to claim that some skullduggery was done without anyone seeing it. How to make sure they listen to him. Give him a whistle that freezes all play. Besides, he would need that whistle to coordinate twelve runners rushing to 1st plate to begin their run. If anyone does not heed them; then he can blow the whistle... while all the balls in midair are dropping to the ground. In fact; whoever is whistled will have to called a jerk because that is exactly what happens to him... he simply gets jerked out of line. Then if anyone gives the Empire any lip, they will be extremely sorry when The Empire Strikes Back... blowing his whistle at the worst possible time for the jerk who offended him. Anyone who openly does not respect his freezing whistles is automatically blown out of the game. Then the whistles will keep the players literally on their toes.

Also, anyone who decides to go after the Emperor, if he sees him coming; the 'Emp' can freeze him in his tracks with his whistle. Can you imagine an enraged player stalking in fury after an Emperor... and having to freeze in his tracks when the terrified Emp blows his whistle...? And if the guy decides: oh what the hell, I don't care if he throws me out. Can you imagine the retreating empire desperately blowing his whistle and hoping that the reflex of freezing at the sound of the whistle will momentarily slow the guy down long enough for him to run for his life... And then if the player ignores all the whistles and comes running at the Emp how the ensuing fracas might end up. My guess is that it will make the game funnier than the keystone cops.

Picture the Emp throwing a furious manager out of the game by blowing the whistle on him... while he is yelling at the top of his lungs into the Emp's face.... And he freezes.... Then keeps on yelling.... Until the Emp throws him out of the game... as he retreats... and freezes in mid-stride...every time the equally furious Emp blows the whistle on him to throw him out... Until he freezes, and refuses to move, and refuses to be thrown out of the game. While the Emp blows the whistle on him... as the manager glares at the Emp, and pretends he did not hear the whistle that releases him from his motionlessness. The power to cut off a stream of words... and start them again...?

'And I'll tell you ANOTHER TH.....!!!!!!.....!!...(Huff-puff, huff-huff...) THAT BALL WAS.....!!!!'. Tweet! "IN!!... you-" Tweet!

How long can two arguing, red-faced people; frozen by a whistle, glare at each other in silence... and not start laughing?

Somebody do it!

You can make the game even better if the color of each ball matches the color of each base, along with the baseman-pitcher's uniform, and the hitter's uniform and the fielder's uniform. The teams would be labeled: A. B. C. So... if the Red A. Pitcher, throws to the Red B. Batter, and the Red C. Fielder catches the Red ball: he gets extra points for it.... And if the Red baseman puts out the Red runner with a Red ball, he gets extra points. But if someone throws the Orange ball to the Red plate, the Red baseman will have to throw the Orange ball to the Orange baseman to get the extra points for the out. It should be called rainbow ball: because the balls and uniforms and bases are the 12 colors of the rainbow.

Is that complex enough for you?... Spectators love the complexity of Baseball... What if that complexity can literally be seen?... In living color? Seeing twelve different colored balls hurtling toward twelve colored uniforms, with twelve different colored uniforms running the bases? And seeing ...

'A Red-RED-RED! A BLUE-BLUE BLUE! Oh shit... that was an ORANGE-GREEN-PURPLE! Damn!... No, the RED runner's SAFE! The BLUE runner's OUT! The... damn, I missed that play!! Wait, there's a OH! Now there's an OH! OH!...SLIDE you BASTARD! RUN FOR TENTH..! No, RUN BACK!!'

Of course, twelve balls being thrown at the same time at twelve bases with twelve runners scampering in-between the bases will give everyone a chance to make the most hilarious mistakes possible. In fact the game will be televised not to see who wins, but to see the jokes being played on the Empire... The coaches tearing their hair out and screaming instructions during the play, and every kind of underhanded sneaky trick that will be caught on instant replay... Only... you would need to have forty cameras, and it would take you six hours of watching the slow-motion re-plays to figure all of what happened in just one 'Hit'n Run' inning of Rainbow Ball.

Of course... if any runner except the last one tries to stay safe on any base and doom all his team-mates behind him into forced-outs: they will be pummelled into oblivion when they get back to the dugout.

And God help the twelfth-plate baseman if more than one runner comes barreling down the stretch... No... actually it will be called 'the curve' ...making it easier for the runners to hit-and run because there are no right angles to the running lanes. Can you imagine four runners on each other's heels and four balls being thrown at the poor twelfth plate baseman... having to catch each ball in succession and touch out each of the four runners. That is... if the balls are thrown at just the right timed intervals. Or if he drops the one meant for the first runner and uses the second ball for the first runner, the third ball for the second runner, the fourth ball for the third runner, and picks up the first ball to tag out the fourth runner... Will that be considered legal? Personally, if this is ever done on TV...I will be laughing so hard at whatever happens; I won't care what the score is.

Never mind, which base you throw which ball to... to get which out... or not.... Somebody do it. And what will happen when the entire sport needs twelve times more pitchers than it needs now? The pitcher will no longer be more important or more valuable than a batter or fielder or baseman. Then all children and athletes playing baseball this way will have a decent one third chance at becoming a pitcher. Then to play baseball this way you will have to be good at all of the basic skills including pitching. No more special status for specialized players or specialized skills. No more superstars. Just millions more children having more fun, and not sitting on their asses watching just one person at bat.

Children invent games when their elders do not interfere and tell them how to play a game... they do not bother with all of the professional rules. They just make up their own rules and play the games to have fun. If adults were more childlike, it would make our games more interesting, more fun, more even. It would also make them more difficult, and it would make us more creative... and you could finally find out what a true all-round person is, not an all-round athlete... then the most generous, happy, mature, intelligent, loving funny people in their respective groups would be our role models... and then the idea of a role-model might be a positive influence on children who would mimic their heroes, and try to play all the positions well, do everything well... work hard at being better at everything... not just one skill, one position, one specialized job or career or game, or sport.

The two motives of fun and winning are at odds with each other. If you actually try to keep the tennis ball inside the lines... longer... playing more... learning, getting better, without trying to win: you play more, you hit more balls, you get more fit, you improve your technique faster, and you end up having more fun. But the way civilized people do it... is to first practice as boringly as possible against a dead wall instead of finding a living partner because if you ask anyone just to practice and not play; they sneer at you as a beginner who is not worth playing with. This idiotic egomania exists on every field in almost every sport known. People automatically separate themselves into different skill levels and only play with those most 'equal' to them in ability while sneering arrogantly at anyone less skilled and humbly kowtowing to anyone more skilled. The result is that unskilled players never get a chance to be challenged and people that are more skilled never get a chance to teach what they themselves have been taught. The only reason they lord it over others is that they have been taught and coached better, and practiced longer, and trained at it longer. They have become more specialized at it then you. Their energy is better focused in this one endeavour... While you may be better than them in a thousand other things.

So, the only way to make sure they are taught and coached better than you ...is to never bother to teach others what they were taught. Since they might actually get better than they are Oh, I see: you do not want anyone else to get better. .. You do not want to waste your time teaching them. Oh. That's right... because you want to play competitively... you want to play with your own equals. You want to have fun... you do not have the time to waste teaching other's what was taught to you. Somebody explain this to me. I don't understand. Were you any good when you first began playing any sport? No. Everybody else was better at it than you were. Only because teachers and coaches, and other helpful generous players who gave of their time and love did anyone ever learn how to play any sport. So... The answer in competitive sports is for all the best athletes to never teach other people how to play sports. So all the best athletes never teach anyone else what they learned.... Just so they can play competitively with equals. Huh?

If everyone were like the highest paid athletes; then in one short generation, all competitive sports would die out and disappear... and good riddance to them. Unfortunately, there are just enough people training and teaching small, elite groups of children how to become athletes to keep it going. Why are so few children ever trained intensively in sports? Because professional athletes do not want all the world's people to reach the fitness level of an Olympic athlete... if they did, then they would have to kiss their high-paying careers goodbye. The national hockey league jealously guarded its reputation as the world's best hockey league. But when they gave the Europeans and Russians a chance to play, they found out that there were better ways to play the game, and became better at passing. All inclusion is better than exclusion. It makes all people better. All exclusion is bad. It makes people snobbish, selfish, it creates overblown egos; it creates the habits of mistrust, distrust, dishonesty, and cowardice. Usually in any Western society...there are more competitive egoistic people on any given sports field at any given time than non-egoistic people. So the majority wins, and... the non-egoistic people corrupt themselves by not opening their mouth! By allowing themselves to be intimidated. By not telling the smart-asses to shut the fuck up, and stop brow beating other less able players. Strangers are tolerated only because they managed to learn the sport somewhere else. If any beginner tries to play with any more advanced players, they are shown the door, and that is that. If you are not good enough then do not even show your face here... don't even bother trying to play because you will receive so much abuse and hostility that it will become a horror rather than enjoyable, or you will be completely shunned and not allowed to play with anyone, because nobody wants to play at your level with you. But do non-egoistic people help others, do they show them how to play better?... or protect them from the super-jock mentality of thinking they are better than someone else if you can play a certain sport better? No. They keep their mouth shut thinking that they are better than the ego-jocks merely for not actively joining in with them. Their moral superiority is lost because of their neutrality.

'You are not welcome. Go away. This place is only for assholes strutting their egos around on the field as a special exclusive clique. Not nice people. If you have any love, sensitivity, or kindness... if you have any kind of generous, giving-teaching-coaching-learning personality... we do not want you here. If you are not an egotistical ass and a snob, if you are not competitive above everything else, if you just want to play sports to have fun... we don't want you.'

And so; usually most children, most adults get so burned by these kinds of competitive people and competitive places that they never come back ever... and grow up hating all sports, all exercise, and live their entire lives never using their bodies more actively ever again. They destructively shut down their entire bodies...and never feel their bodies fully as long as they live. Simply because when they wanted to be active, when they wanted to play sports, they were met with so many people; with such destructive negative energy... all yelling at them to... Or: 'Can't you play any better than that?' Or: hearing other's say, 'Yeah... he's lousy... don't pick him... or her.'

To have dozens, even hundreds of sports egos visibly sneering at them in disgust... at their ineptness. So their entire experience becomes a painful, humiliating, ordeal that nobody with an ounce of sense would ever want to resort to just to be active. So: where does all this blind competitive spirit come from in the first place? It comes from social pressure to succeed and survive at any cost... it comes from the fear of dying... it comes from the sex-instinct of all male and female human energy...

The entire ego-crap of the sport-jock lording it over others; is nothing more than a spurt-jock... translating the male sperm's desperate need to be more active than the other sperm if it wants to live, and not die... they all sputter out... lose energy, ability, become lazy, arrogant, foolish, stupid... and they usually are attracted only to competitive careers... they become carriers of the poisonous myth of competition as the best way to live and love and learn... and end up learning nothing... loving nothing... and living empty useless unhappy lives. Why...? Because most of us are all trapped inside the antagonistic competitive culture of civilization: which is based upon exclusion and fear...

We are taught from birth to exclude all others who are not exactly like us. To exclude all others except your immediate family... to exclude others who are not your immediate neighbors. Who do not live on your block. In your city. In your area. In your country. On your continent. Of your race. Your religion. Is it any wonder that sports are not fun for most people today in the West? We simply have too much competitiveness in our society and it is poisoning our children badly. Look at our history... when did any westerners band together ever?... when we were threatened with death and destruction... or when we managed to believe we were threatened. Using that as an excuse to make war on other energy-poor, powerless nations and people. The entire expansion of the American West is mostly a litany of Westerners slowly and systematically committing mass genocide on other peoples... by labeling them as murdering savages.... When all they wanted was to be left alone. But the Western Europeans would not leave them alone. Because these people were strange, because the Westerners feared them for ungodly reasons... because the Westerners were more greedy... more fearful of others, more hating... so they vilified these people by making them scapegoats... putting all of their cultural shame onto the American Indians and using this psychological projection as an excuse to do every unspeakable evil possible. Which is only another culture-based, universally trained reflex of projecting their-our own murdering savage hate-fear onto other people who are not like them. It is the universal message which all cultures teach.

“Are all other people like us? Oh no, oh no, no. Other people are bad: We are good. Other people are liars: We are honest. Other people are greedy. We are less greedy. We are moral. Other people are probably immoral because they are not like us. How can they be good, moral, honest, less greedy, and not bad; if they do not eat what we eat, wear what we wear, act as we act, speak the same language as we speak, have the same car, the same job, the same house, the same values, the same outlook, the same attitudes, the same accent, come from the same school, have the same assumptions, etc?”. Huh? How stupid can you be?

Whether it is sports, or business or war: the same corrupt, sick, lying myths we have been brainwashed into believing have shaped and controlled how we live and what we do and why we do it and how we do it. Whether it is sports, or business or war: the same corrupt, sick, lying, Myths we have been brainwashed into believing have shaped and controlled how we live and what we do and why we do it and how we do it. The truth is... only way you can win at any game is by playing not to win: by playing only for the excitement and the fun of playing. Every top athlete understands this joke. They play the game for both reasons... while destructively destroying their own pleasure because they make money from it.

What excuse do the richest, most overpaid professional athletes give when they lose their temper and throw tantrums? They scream out loud that they are trying to feed their families. They scream out loud that they are trying to put food on the table for their children. Like the millions of dollars they already have; are not enough to feed their children with. This is the kind of hypocrisy that happens when you play sports for money. But...leave a professional skier on a hilltop to go down a slalom course alone... without someone else beside them, to force them to compete against anyone else except themselves. Then they forget the need to win, because they are having too much fun. When they get down to the bottom of the course and people start running up to them... not noticing how much fun the skier was having without thinking of trying to win, but yelling at them that they won.... That they were faster than someone else was. That has nothing to do with the fun of skiing. Who cares how much faster or slower you go compared to someone else as long as you were having fun? Then they get their reward signals mixed up. Then you start thinking that the fun of the game or sport is winning. Then you think that bragging rights is what it is all about. If you to study competitive sports, you will find out that without exceptions it is the team or people who cooperate best amongst themselves, who are having the most fun playing the sport who are the most selfless on the field, that end up somehow winning.

However: 12,000 years of civilized competition cannot be easily broken. The reason most humans compete amongst themselves is because there is nothing else left to compete against. Tools and civilization have developed such a huge advantage over all other living things that fighting against Nature is not a competition anymore... it is a slaughter. If you want to put competition back where it belongs, into competition against other living things, and Nature on a fair and balanced playing field: you would have to take away all tools from humans.

But that involves too much hardship. And no civilized person will endure this kind of hardship if they can avoid it. Unless you educate people... and they come to understand that natural hardship is healthier than artificial hardship. Until they understand that natural, balanced, fair competition is healthier than unfair, selective, exclusive competition.

There are infinite ways to make life challenging, hard, exciting, fun, actively... without competing at all. If you want to do away with competition as a mainstay of our civilized culture: you would first have to first create a non-competitive community with a non-competitive lifestyle... and create non-competitive games and non-competitive rules to test this and see if it is a better way to live or not. Non-competition is used everywhere... selectively, half-heartedly, incrementally... all mixed up with the competitive cultural values, rules, ideas, etc... Every study ever done has proven that cooperation works better than competition. If all cooperation has been proven to work better than all competition... then why don't people change their cultural values?

What if you changed the rules of volleyball so that the two teams that had the most consecutive hits in a row without ending the play would win...? And the more accurately they passed the ball, the more points they scored?... and the harder they hit the ball the more points they scored?... and the harder it was to get a ball the more points were scored? Then the ball might in play for hours... then the spectators would be on the edge of their seats at every single pass, every single set and every single hit. Never knowing when or if the run would stop or keep going. And really good players would naturally try to make it harder for the other team to answer the ball... but not too hard... but if the ball kept on being played, they would naturally increase the difficulty of their shots. Or they would aim exactly in the middle of two players to see if they react to the ball properly. In other words, they would be doing exactly the same thing they are doing now competing, only in a harder, more cooperative fashion.

Then the idea of scoring individual meaningless points would disappear; since each game would be played by different teams with different players and different results... and trying to compare how hard or how accurate one player was one day with another player another day would become too ridiculous to bother with. Then the athletes would play until they dropped from exhaustion, and become ten times better at the game because they would not be practicing it as a boring exercise for hours before actually playing. Then the game would become its own practice session and give the players a thousand times more opportunity to hone their skills. Then both teams would be winners. Then both teams would be forced to cooperate. Then sports might become a way of training people to cooperate... not to compete.

Or... If you want to have beach doubles volleyball made more interesting... just have both players on one side serving a volleyball simultaneously. That will cut down the 'advantage' of the high jump serves because they will have to serve their ball at precisely the same time their teammate serves theirs or it will not count or they lose a point or do it over. Then the opposing two players both need to bump-receive a ball...and instantly get ready to bump the ball their team mate has gotten... to set their team mate... while he does the same thing for them! And then the two defenders have to do the same thing! Unless only one ball is left in play... in which case it gets boring... Like old-time volley-ball... no action for the TV viewers. Then you can really call it doubles volleyball. You can do this with any single-ball sport: football, soccer, basketball, ping-pong, tennis; and see how much harder it gets; but also more fun. Or... you can simply take any sports ball that has air in it, and replace it with helium and see how much more fun that becomes.

But not even this simple improvement has ever been tried or seriously considered. In fact there are no games that are played with more than one ball at a time. No matter how many people are involved. Why? Pyramidal focus. Having all people focusing mostly upon only one ball, one thing, one interest, one hobby, one career, one person, one group, one family, etc. Yet, the instant you introduce more than one ball into any sport, it automatically becomes more fun to play. Playing sports that have more than one ball trains people to develop a different kind of awareness; where they have to be aware of more than one thing at a time... it forces them to widen their awareness and it forces them to have uncertainty... and have fun with that unpredictable uncertainty, instead of trying to control that uncertainty. Rather than being obsessed with trying to manipulate and control only thing, it forces them to have fun with more than one thing at a time. It even trains the spectators out of the habit of pyramidal focus. Their eyes would be jumping all over the place to catch as many plays, hi-jinks, scrambles, as possible. Watching any sport with twice as many balls in play at the same time is twice as much fun to watch. Watching any sport with ten more balls in play is ten times more fun to watch. This leads to another mystery: Why in hell do people play any sport the way somebody else tells them to; instead of inventing their own games, their own rules? If people had the courage to do it their way instead of somebody else's way, by creating their games, making up their own rules, and changing these rules and games any time they want to... then any monopolization of sports, any monopolization of fun. Any monopolization of play would disappear.

'The official rules to playing this sport are-', or: 'No, no! That's not how you do it. That's not how you're supposed to do it!'

They would be instantly kicked off the field as a nuisance. Because then: nobody playing any game would be stupid enough to listen to anyone who tried to become an authority figure, or tell other people what to do. Then all coaches would lose their careers because nobody would listen to them unless they were trying to be positively helpful, instead of being authoritarian or negative or too critical. Then there would be no reason to supervise any game, and all of that power-crap would go out the window also.

Then any centralization of sports wealth, sports ability, sports training, sports knowledge, sports status, sports elite would be destroyed... gone... disappear... and the only people who would mourn that disappearance would be the ones who get an ego-blast from proving that they were better at something than somebody else... or richer than somebody else... or more powerful than somebody else... etc. What would happen if all of the revenue generated from professional sports was made available so that the entire nation could play sports? How many couch potatoes would there be left to watch anyone play sports. How much healthier would the entire Nation be if there were no professional sports... if everyone exercised and played sports as complete equals? How many trillions of dollars of health care costs could be saved? How many millions of working man-hours would be regained? The idea of a culture where hundreds of millions of in athletic spectators spend their hard-earned money for the privilege of watching a few professional athletes is an exclusionary waste of human potential and health. All elitist concepts are impractical, wasteful, and destructively inefficient.

In modern society, competition is such an over-all normality, that the existence of any cooperation anywhere is literally invisible in ... unless forced into a crisis situation. Usually... only the ultimate threat of war is strong enough to temporarily overcome the normal level of antagonism and competition within any tribe, clan, culture, nation, empire or civilization. As a result: wartime is often remembered with nostalgia. As a time when people banded together out of sheer necessity, and became nicer-kinder-closer to each other... actually helping each other selflessly. As crisis-oriented animals, war-killing-violence becomes the only force strong enough that forces people together more closely. Why? Because the only serious challenge-threat that we humans have left is not Nature, or other animals: but ourselves. Once the crisis is gone, then we revert back to our normal adversarial competitive lifestyles, and this temporary closeness also disappears.

Another insanity of trying to universalize the physical standards and rules and lines of any sport... trying to force all people to compete against an identical level of difficulty is that the concept itself is irrational to begin with. The raised bar of difficulty, whether it is how high the basketball hoop is placed, how high a volleyball net is placed, how far apart the goalpost on a football or soccer field are placed etc... should be different for each person's different height, skill level, etc. The idea of trying to force all people to compete against a single universal mechanical difficulty or raised-bar of difficulty is absurd. It assumes that all humans are the same height, the same weight, and all have identical skill levels, etc. Difficulty or hardship comes in all shapes and kinds. To obsess and focus only on mechanical difficulties' by glorifying professional sports and by sanctifying the concept of competition above the concept of cooperation: is not a healthy way to live.

Why do people uphold and justify the idea of competition? Because people need a reason for their existence just as they need air to breathe. Take away the motivational reason of competition and accomplishment. Take away the pyramidal challenge of struggle; take away the hierarchical condition of civilization... And what is left? No human wants to look into this unknown blackness. No human wants to ask these kinds of questions. Humans lack the courage to delve deeply into themselves or their surroundings because they have not fully developed their own human tools of Courage and Honesty... Because their Sense of Wonder has been systematically destroyed by a system that is threatened by that wonder. We are crisis oriented animals that thrive on challenge: but nobody has ever sought to find out: in what context that challenge should be placed. What kind of challenges we were designed to face and deal with. The very concept of what is human: has been segmented and pyramidalized. The glorification of a specialized talent or ability has developed steadily and has been Pyramidalized: until today, there is a mystical belief that anyone who is a genius at something; is somehow superior in some way to other humans.

The inevitable result of accumulation is too many people, cities overpopulation: everyone fighting over things, territory, wealth, power... with most of the wealth being concentrated at the top of the pile. All of this leads to too much competition. Out of pure necessity, the masses must fight amongst themselves for what little is left over. Rather than sharing equally amongst ourselves, rather than giving to the most needy: the least needy... sports superstars end up with even more lucrative contracts, with even more millions of dollars. The moral-spiritual corruption of competitive sports is inescapable as long as our civilization is hierarchically structured. The fact is that if there were no reason to get any advantage over another human, then sports as we know it would not even exist. The entire idea of getting an advantage over somebody is corrupt to the core.

TV interviewers and hosts try to make out that winning excites the winners. They want the winners to be happy, overjoyed, ecstatic... If a winner is not sufficiently visibly overjoyed at winning: then the announcer demands that their reaction is one of pure joy: by going up to them and trying to share in their glory by saying: "How do feel? Happy? You won!"

‘So? Why are you telling me how I’m supposed to feel about it?’

Why do they do this? Because all civilized humans enjoy winning. Overcoming hardship. Struggling to finally succeed in their efforts. But since we no longer fight against the elements of Nature. Since there is nothing left to fight, or struggle over except ourselves: this is the only arena of hardship left to us. And since the masses are oppressed by their rulers. Since the masses are not allowed to fight amongst themselves. Since they are not allowed to fight against their own rulers. One of the few remaining acceptable ways of experiencing the satisfaction of struggling against something, and overcoming hardship is the vicarious pleasure spectators get from watching professional athletes struggle against each other. By spectators experiencing vicariously in their struggle. By vicariously sharing in their abstract token struggle. By sharing in the experience of winning and triumphing. The masses get a vicarious, shared, token, superficial feeling of closeness. They all come together. Half of them root for one team. Half of them root for the other team. They get an abstract, vicarious, shared experience of cooperating in a crisis under hardship.

It is supposed to be a shared experience between the winning athletes and the loyal cheering fans. It is supposed to prove their dominance over the other teams. It is supposed to prove their superiority. It is supposed to prove that they are better than the others. But in many, many ways... winning is a letdown. It is not an energizing moment at all. It is an ending. A finish. The winners are left empty, confused. Everyone else is happy for them... How come they do not roar and scream and jump as much as the spectators? And if they feel justifiably happy for all the effort that finally paid off in succeeding. Why doesn’t this happiness last? What is the fleeting happiness of winning? Why spend your entire life striving to achieve a few fleeting moments of temporary false euphoria? Except as an addiction to a temporary feeling of superiority?

Could it be that the spectators are only vicariously living through their athletes and teams? And the spectator’s investment in rooting for someone has nothing to do with that individual’s life or happiness? What can you do with a win? Unless you make money from it: it is worthless. Why do you think there are so few amateur sports compared to professional sports? Because when you make winning the first priority... amateur sport stop being fun. People find that when they get no positive reinforcement out of a sport except the abstract goal of winning, with no money incentive of greed... it’s not worth it. Most people stop playing sports when they are still young and active because all the fun has been leached out of it.

Why doesn’t an honest athlete for once say the truth to an asshole sportscaster after winning?

‘How do you feel?!’

‘Not so good. I was feeling much happier when I was playing. Why do we have to stop just because we won? They were a really good team. It’s a shame they didn’t win. Why are you ignoring them? They’re really nice guys. Hey. The win wasn’t that important... I’d rather play sports and lose than make money and win because it’s playing more fun than making money. It’s the sport I love. Not the winning and not the money.’

Then sportsmanship and liking your opponent might become more socially acceptable. But that might lower viewer ratings. Less people might watch sports, if winning is not glorified.

What if the ritual of winning had the winning hockey team give the trophy to the losing team? And the losing team had to try not to accept it... as humbly and shamefacedly as possible? And then they had to give the trophy back to the winning team... and the winners had to shuffle their feet and say they didn't really deserve it: because the losers played harder than they did. The only reason they won was a lucky shot. That is what most goals are: lucky shots. There are so many intangible, undetectable factors that cannot be controlled in sport; that it is impossible to single out any one reason why any team or person wins. From what the athletes had for breakfast, whether they had an argument with their wives, to what airline they flew on, what hotel they stayed in, what food they ate, etc... If the intangible factors of why any team are so unidentifiable. Then exactly what is the supposed superiority and dominance of winning based on? And how much of it is earned, and how much of it is luck, and pure circumstance?

What if the hockey teams had to do pass the trophy back and forth between each other at least twelve times before it was officially given to the final winning team. As a public ritual of sportsmanship. In front of all the sports cameras. Lauding and praising the other team: instead of crowing like idiots in triumph. Until they got so sick and tired of accepting the damn trophy, that they pass it off as quickly as possible just to get rid of it. Until they all lost their tempers and good sportsmanship and just started yelling at each other to:

'Take the Goddamn Thing. We don't want it okay?'

And then.

The first team to crack; loses the victory, the trophy, and loses face publicly. What if, the team that finally gets so sick of this inane ritual of sportsmanship, they suddenly grab the trophy; and run like hell out of the Stadium? With the other team hot on its heels yelling at the bloody thieves to give it back. What if the whole fun of having that Trophy was stealing it from each other? And publicly stating at press conferences in angelic innocence:

'I haven't the faintest idea of what you're talking about. What Cup?...'

What if every week: some team managed to steal the Stanley Cup from another team's locker room. And all the sports announcers every day had to dig up all the juicy gossip and rumors of who really stole it, and who really has it, and who is planning to steal it next.

What if the teams had more fun stealing the Stanley Cup, than they had playing hockey. Why? Well... What if all the Hockey players were allowed to pick up the puck and hide it. And casually skate around and suddenly drop it near the net and suddenly easily score a goal. What if once a player stole the puck: 24 hockey players piled on top of him. So even after the pile-up: nobody knew who really had the goddamn thing. So all of them would be skating around the rink... glaring furiously at each other. While the real thief is busy glaring just as indignantly at all of the other glarers. And nobody in the entire damn arena or across the Nation has any damn idea of who stole the damn puck. Until at some crucial moment; they drop it and they try to score. Then the players would stop even using hockey sticks. They would just throw the damn puck at the goalies with their hands. Then there would be a lot less injuries caused by pucks being blasted too hard at players by blind, inaccurate slap shots that only go in so rarely that they are actually random pieces of pure luck.

What if once the Goalie caught a puck: he was allowed to secretly pass the puck to any player on his team as they skated by him. Then the entire game would change into a game of cat-and-mouse... with the opposing team totally confused as all of the other team innocently and mildly just sort-of moseyed over the blue line... with the other team glaring at all of them, backing up. Then there would be more fights, more pile-ups, more goals scored, more screaming fans, more cursing, more bloody violence, more sneakery and down-right evil skull-duggery... There would be more puzzled looks, more strategies for scoring and defending.

What if the winner was determined not by who scored the most points, but who finally managed to steal the last puck? What if the last goal counted for half the score? Then everyone would be trying to score as many goals as possible to build up such a huge lead that not even half of the other team's score added on at the last second could make them win.

Fans would start throwing their own pucks on the ice. The entire rink would be flooded with hundreds of pucks. There would have to be security checks at the turnstiles in every arena for puck-smuggling... Then there would be so many bloody pucks on the ice that the goalies would be machine-gunned to death with hundreds of slap shots every game, and you would need at least five goalies per team to last out the season. Do you think maybe, the fans would have more fun? Do you think the players would have more fun?

The goal frames would have to be screwed down. Because the teams would take their own nets off the hinges just so nobody could score a goal against them. Then the nets would be filled with so many pucks that trying to find the real puck would be a nightmare. But... if the real puck was found in the opposing teams nets... then that opposing team would automatically lose the game. Then there would be an entire ritual at the end of the game of puck-counting by official puck-counters who were supposed to be 100% unbiased, and they would be accused of cheating even if they were as white and as honest as the driven snow. Then each goalie would be so busy trying to get all the damn pucks out of his net, and passing them off to his teammates; that all the players would be bulging in odd places from too many pucks hidden in their uniforms.

Then hockey would for once begin to resemble what it originally started out as. A bunch of sneaky hi-jinks that Indian villages played on each other before Europeans came. And spoiled the game.

What if after the victory of each game: the winning team had to wine and dine the opposing team, and ceremonially present them with the winning puck. And slyly try to steal it back from them during the evening. As the losers pelt the winners with as many pucks as possible, so nobody knows which one is the actual winning puck. And get them all as drunk as possible. So they would be too groggy to play at all in any decent shape the next day. All the losers would be loudly trying to refuse all the winning team's ahem polite, hammed-up, fake hospitality... looking at their huge plates of food and booze in disgust... trying to smile, grimacing as they choked down stuff smuggled in from McDonald's and made to look as if it was real food. While the winning team plied them with liquor and politely asked them:

‘Oh... by the way... you wouldn't know where the trophy is, now: would you?...’

How many secret alliances between supposed archrivals might be hatched behind closed doors and closed locker rooms to steal the Stanley Cup from whoever had recently stolen it. Every visiting team would generate the wildest stories of who had the Stanley Cup, and whether a plan to steal it back was being hatched.

Do you think the sport writers might love this? For once; all their sports connections would become priceless assets. For once, their love of gossip and ear for the real lowdown, might be used with a passion that could give them the ultimate scoop of who really has the Stanley Cup. And be publicly vindicated after it is stolen again from the team they were screaming that really had it. Only to have to go passionately back to work pulling every string in Heaven and on Earth to locate and find out all the dirty secrets of who stole it all over again.

Oh. Stealing a prized National Trophy that is so steeped in history and sacred, that it is kept in a museum most of the time is not a sure-fire way to outrage and energize fans. Until they become so involved in the controversies; that fights start breaking out more in the seats than on the ice. Oh, we don't want the fans to have too much fun, or become too excited... oh.

But if this was done...then the inevitable next stage will happen sure as shooting. Copies of the Stanley Cup would be made. Right down to every scratch and name on the original. Stanley Cups would appear in arena-crowds... handed around from one bleacher to the next. The fans not even knowing if it is the actually Stanley Cup. Scientists would be called in to verify which Cup is the true Stanley Cup.

Then Lord Stanley would have to finally stand up and say:

'I cannot tell a lie. I stole the whole idea from the natives. But they stole it back. Now; I have no idea of where the real Stanley Cup is....' Then the true Stanley Cup will remain shrouded in Mystery. And the entire idea of winning will fade out of the entire sport of hockey, and be replaced by better things.

The cult, and culture of Sports have become degraded and become corrupted in so many ways. Take Golf for instance. Outside in the open: the entire focus outside is on eighteen, tiny shallow holes a few inches wide in the middle of trees and grass and water; that have been domesticated and sculpted and boring to look at. Millions of people stand there; ignoring a Nature that is so artificial: it is not worth looking at. Training people to ignore their surroundings. Training them to stand and not move. Training them not to even look at each other. Training them to be as unathletic as possible. Training them to be as passive as possible. And only care about the abstract numbers-points-scores concept of winning. Can you glorify the ritual of winning into a sicker form of abstract, meaningless idiocy?

Look at the degeneration of professional sports. Boxing has become an Asian craze of full-contact violence called Tai-Bo. Hitting your opponent with Fists, elbows, knees, feet. Only head-butts are not allowed. How much more physically brutal can you get short of drawing blood? Why don't they give the antagonists knives; and have them disembowel each other; like they did for over 500 years in Roman coliseums?

Look at professional wrestling: which the entire audience knows is faked. The bouts are painstakingly orchestrated and rehearsed in advance. But the audiences does not want to know what the ending will be. They want to be surprised. This is exactly what the Roman Games evolved into. Choreographed bouts, where the gladiators already knew which fighter was supposed to win, and which was supposed to die. They died merely for the audience's pleasure. They obeyed their masters. The winners strutted their asses off and became household heroes for the Roman masses: as the modern fake wrestlers are today

And what keeps the wrestling audience glued to the set. Subconscious suppressed Hate. A suppressed desire for violence. Bragging. Ego. Threatening, blustering. Eyeball-to-eyeball stare-downs. Vicious tricks. Cheating. Demonizing opponents into idiotic grotesque, caricatures of 'evil' and caricaturing the other opponents as epitomes of good Captain America. A totally fake, hypocritical act. Does the audiences care about the obvious fakery? No. instead they love it. They love the fake posturing. The more obviously fake it is, the more ludicrous and grotesque the entire soap-opera posturing is; the more they love it. They are in love with all kinds of fakery... as the best way to glorify, and justify their own fake, swaggering egos and inferiority-superiority complexes. Since the entire civilized world is a fake, then they are a normal person, with all the normal fakes and fake egos and fake lies and self-delusions that all other people have. It is a value system of complete cynicism. Which reinforces the consumer cynicism of meaninglessness of their entire lives. Another vicious cycle. What you love betrays who you are, and what you are. If the fighters were allowed to actually kill each other in public do you think the viewing audience would stop watching? Want to bet they won't stop watching? Want to bet the viewership won't skyrocket? It is all a matter of what is allowed publicly. Let public executions be televised regularly. Let slaughterhouses be televised. Let blood and gore be socially acceptable. Let violence and hate be socially acceptable: and it is but a short skip to another Hitler, or Mussolini screaming out their hate in public, and being applauded by millions of adoring fans. That's exactly what professional wrestling does also.

But back in the locker rooms you can't tell the bad guys from the good guys. They are all just professional athletes who have trained like hell... just to make a lot of money and become famous, being worshipped and adored. What if after every wrestling match, the winner hugged the loser? The audience would boo them and leave in disgust and demand their money back. The TV viewers would shut off their TV sets and never watch Professional wrestling on TV again. The 'World Wrestling Federation' would go broke. Because it was not supplying the spectators with what they are addicted to. To wit: A vicarious addiction to hat, violence., dislike, dishonesty, cheating, bragging, egomania. Crazy maniacs spewing their anger and rage out into the crowd. Yelling hate at each other. That is what modern culture is screaming at the masses and brainwashing spectator to believe-in, and how to behave, and how to think, and how to feel....

You can only be famous if you act like a posturing braggart. You can win only if you are a hypocrite, a hater, violent, and a professional asshole. In order to make money: you have to be a damn good actor and a fake... and damn good at cheating, sneakery, and betrayal..

What would happen to any fat-mouthed attempt to hype winning... just to please the audience, and keep the show 'exciting' if the winner did not show visible elation at winning? Would the spectators start booing the winner? Because the winner was not properly respectful of his hard earned win? What if a sportscaster stuck a microphone into the face of a winning athlete and he refused to smile or act happy? 'What's wrong... you won. You should be ecstatic! Why aren't you happy?'

And the winner turns and point to the loser who is happy for his win; and says:

'Because he lost... and he's a really nice guy....'

What would the crowd reaction to this be? Something like:

'Hey. Fuck the other guy. You won. That's what counts.'

But that never happens. Because for athletes: winning and competition is more important than human relationships or human emotions.

What if professional athletes refused to do victory laps or strut their ego-crazed show-off routines like in the NFL. Then maybe competition in sports would be less ego-driven. Then the spectators could not vicariously feed their egos on other people winning for them. Then winning would matter less, and the game, and true sportsmanship would matter more.

It is easier to identify good guys and bad guys if your culture tells you who to hate, and who to cheer for. Then you can safely project and vent all of your own hate and your own urges to be violent... safely inside the anonymity of a massed crowd... or in the privacy of your own living room. You can vicariously feel like a 'winner' instead of a loser. Instead of feeling like a lowly worker: you can feel like the people you are watching by living vicariously through them. You can be easily distracted from all of your own problems and avoid living your own life. As long as you waste it looking at this stuff. Professional Wrestling is only one way civilized people distract themselves from their own lives. It happens to be one of the most obvious ways. But it could not exist if civilized humans did not glorify winning over every other human ethic, moral, emotion and value. Wrestling is a fairy-tale sport for those who no longer see any difference between the fakery of the society they live-in; and the fakery they watch on TV.

Why does each Wrestle mania fan watch it? To find that out, you would need to find a wrestling fan who is capable of introversion, logical thinking and inner curiosity. And then they would have to be capable of understanding what they find inside themselves, and honest and brave enough to admit it. Unfortunately... no such fans exist.

That is the inevitable deterioration of professional sports into cheating and fakery and hype. It kept the Roman masses entertained for centuries. That is the effect of competition in civilization. Professional sports are used to distract the masses from their miserable boring meaningless lives: nothing else.

What about tennis? Have it played with two rackets instead of one. With sliding, adjustable handles so no player will have an advantage of 'reach' over their opponent. Let the length of the racquets and size of the racquet be completely unregulated. Have the two players agree to what length of reach, and racquet-weight they will play with to even the matches up. Have the racquets handicapped so the stronger players have to swing heavier racquets. Play the game with two balls instead of one. Have the ball boys, and ball girls toss in the balls so nobody has an advantage of being a better server, or taller. Two fisted racketeers? With two balls they have to scramble for? How long do you think the taller, heavier players would last against the shorter-lighter scramblers? They would be made fools of. Pete Sampras without his serve is just another ho-hum tennis player. Pete Sampras with two racquets, hitting two balls in quick succession would never have time to wind up for a blast, because he would be too busy running for dear life; trying to run down the second ball.

Then Tennis would for once become a gentleman's game, and a ladies' game... where two people trade shots only for the purpose of keeping the two balls in play as long as possible. What if the longer a rally lasted: the higher the points for each rally? Then a rally lasting ten minutes would be worth ten one-minute rallies. Then a player behind by ten points could instantly come back from unbelievable odds as long as he kept the rally going... and won the point. Then the players will never know quite when their opponent is going to try for a winning shot and end the rally. Then you would have every imaginable tactic used. From the one-shot blasters, to the ten-minute rally-endurance specialists.

Oops. You mean this would make it a hundred times too hard even for the world's best pros? You mean they might look silly out there making so many errors that they would be having tantrums, or laugh themselves sick? You mean then nobody else in the world will train their entire life: trying to hit a tennis ball properly? You mean holding two racquets will give the players even more power and leverage? You mean they will be dancing side-to-side facing each other all the time? And almost never get out of position because they will probably opt for racquets that are four feet long? Try to make a passing shot with an opponent holding a four-foot handled tennis racquet in both hands...

Ah. But try slamming the ball straight into their face or body! You will see the wildest kinds of defensive shots, with players desperately trying to shorten their handles by throwing them at the ball. You will have players going nuts; unable to decide if a longer, or shorter tennis racquet is better depending on which opponent they are facing. Do you think this might make the game more fun to watch? Then tennis players for once would be a macho sport. And sissies would not dream of playing it unless they like using both hands to hit with. Let the players have unlimited customizing rights. You will see more innovations in one year than there have been during the entire history of the game. Have different ball-weights depending on the power of the players... or better yet: put helium in the balls, and watch them sail all over the court gracefully at the slightest tap. Until only professional ping-pong players win the championships. Have three weight classes for the players: heavyweight, middleweight, and lightweight. Then there will be twenty-four trophies in every tournament. Have trophies for the best-dressed, and the worst-dressed. Have a trophy for the player with the nicest smile. Have a trophy for the loudest arguer. Have a trophy for the funniest rally of the tournament.

And have every last cent of the turnstile receipt, and media contracts donated to poor communities: without any middlemen involved. If not a single tennis player could make a single cent out of playing tennis: how many poor people, who love the game itself, would enter the tournaments? How many rich people who love the game for itself would enter? If that happened: my guess is that the upper class would no more play tennis, than they would wrestle alligators in a swamp. It would become a strictly lower class sport.

Allow talking during and in-between the rallies and matches. Watch how the players orchestrate their tantrums to distract their opponents. Watch how the funniest players make their opponents crack up so badly that they miss half of their shots. And if they have a lot of time to hit one ball: watch them double up two racquet and really give a double-armed blast overt the net.

Would tennis ratings skyrocket? Would more money be poured into the poorest communities? Would the tennis rich finally be liked by the poor and not sneered at? Then maybe when the queen tosses the first two balls into play for the first match at Wimbledon: the crowd might actually cheer and applaud. Since when is silence required in the stands of spectators except at rich, exclusive snob games; that are so boring to watch, only the rich watch them? Allow the crowd to cheer, and rant, and boo, and make any comment they want during matches.

Why not remove the 1st serve from the game of tennis completely. Instead: have the players lob the ball underhanded to each other. Have both players do it at the same time to each other, so each one has to play a ball at the same time. So there will be two balls in play at all times instead of only one. How much more difficult is that. Will the best tennis players in the world whine and complain that it's too hard? What if the longer they can keep two balls in play at the same time, the more points they score. Wouldn't that be twice as interesting to watch for the spectators and fans? Oops. Then there wouldn't be any 'competition', then there would only be cooperation. Then tennis players would be teaching children to cooperate with each other: instead of trying to beat each other and try to prove one is better than the other. Then tennis would be twice as much fun.

Now we wouldn't want that, now... would we.

How many examples do you need to see that you can actually improve a sport by changing how it has been played for lo-these-many-centuries? New ways of doing things are invented every day to improve something. Why should Sports and Athletics be excused from any kind of change? But.... What does any this actually consist-of? You still have abstract lines. You still have rules. There is still competition. There is still winning and losing. Basically nothing is actually changed except there is more fun, and more intensity, more diversity, more creativity, more love, more honesty, more courage. There are still antagonists. Players and teams still relate to each other as enemies and combatants.

What is the entire aim of tennis. To put the ball where the other person cannot reach it, or cannot return it. That in itself is 100% antisocial And every other sport that uses this idea is actively, destructively antisocial also. They all teach by example the opposite of communication... but the avoidance of all direct communication. Throwing words back and forth between two words two people is not communication unless the words are thrown properly with the intent to communicate, and each word and meaning caught, held, digested, understood, and then the response thrown back with the intent to communicate, and the other person catching the meanings. Communication only happens when both players are on the same wavelength, and have the sane intention to communicate.

Ball sports such as tennis, etc., where the intention is for the other player or team not to catch or touch the ball... teaches by physical example how not to communicate. How to deflect all words and meaning away from the other person. How not to be direct and honest. Sports teaches people how to be so fundamentally dishonest, so fundamentally detached from your own self: that nearly all athletes develop a psychotic removed numbness, an emotional deadness so impenetrable: they walk around like robots... moving like machines, functioning like machines, thinking like machines, feeling like machines, most of their life.

What if you make the entire aim of tennis to put the ball where the other person can reach it and return it. And putting the ball the ball where they cannot reach it or return it as a minus point in the game... But whose fault is it that it cannot be reached or returned?. Then the entire concept of points becomes so dicey and absurd, that you could argue for hours over one 'point' about whose 'fault' it was that the ball was not returned. Why would that inevitably happen? Because you have changed the game from a negative intent to a positive one. Suddenly all the absolute rules have to be interpreted relatively. Suddenly everything becomes vague and questionable. Suddenly nothing can be defined 'absolutely'.

The difference between a positive and a negative game is the difference between inclusion and exclusion. If you play a game positively: then you have to include everything into it. And the second you try to draw an imaginary boundary, or an absolute definition: you destroy the positive intent and aim of the game completely. If you play a game negatively: you have to exclude everything from it. The second you try to include anything outside of your imaginary, abstract boundaries and definitions: you destroy the negative intent and aim of the game completely. The difference between a game with a positive intent, and a game with a negative intent is the difference between something that has no limited boundaries, something that is limitless something that is infinite... and something that has limited boundaries, something that has limits, something that is finite.

A positive-intent game can be changed creatively forever, and kept interesting and fun. A negative-intent game cannot be changed creatively at all. It cannot be kept interesting and fun.

What is Sports anyways? Sports are merely a way of ignoring your surroundings by distracting yourself from the World around you, from the sky over you, the trees around you, from the other living things around you. Sports was devolved, not evolved from living actively outdoors in Nature to ignoring Nature. It is merely a way of ignoring all other people around you: except on a competitive-combative level. It is merely a way of training humans into competing against each other. It is merely a way for spectators to focus pyramidally upon contestants, and live vicariously through them. It is merely a way to fill arenas. A way to make money off of sports fans. A way to commercialize Sports so nobody but professionals play them. A way to preserve the tradition of worshipping icons, heroes, stars, etc... A way for a few elite superstars to become rich and famous, and a way to make sure everybody else remains poor. It supports all of the myths and lies and fallacies of civilization.

However... the creative ideas mentioned in this book, can effectively water down, and weaken these idiotic lies and untruths. They are creative ways to spoof and question the norms Sports try to uphold. They are merely ways to have more fun by intensifying the human elements in Sports instead of worshipping only the mechanical-physical elements of Power-control-manipulation-domination-winning-absolute values-linear lines, linear-dead ideas. It is merely a way of making Sports so human, and so creative... that the mechanical-tool basis of Sports will eventually laughed out of human existence, so people will despise anyone who tries to 'prove' that they are mechanically, or physically better than someone else. So the idea of someone being better at using a certain tool, or a certain kind of club; is publicly seen to be so stupid, that this idiotic civilized concept will completely disappear.

Look at the Sport called: Golf. What else is it; but a way of making Nature artificially boring: and then ignoring it by focusing all your attention on a tiny ball instead of the trees and grass, and sky and ponds around you? What is it but a way to focus, and obsess on a way of using clubs as killing implements? Is there anything even remotely athletic about it? Does it develop anything human in you? Except a way to use your hands with a tool... trying to crush a ball, or a human, or animal skull? What else is Golf: but a way to destroy your own Sense of Pure Wonder at all the beauty around you? Obsessing on trying to get a stupid little ball into a useless cup.

Take away the idea of points and lines and scores and winning, and losing, and tools, and manipulation, etc; and what is left? Athletic ability? Balance? The ratio of Strength-to-muscle mass? Fitness?

Try climbing a tall tree. Who is your opponent. The tree? The wind? The height? Yourself? Nature? What are you competing against. What is your goal. To get to the top so you can see farther. So you can get a better perspective. So you can enjoy Nature from a different viewpoint. So you can look down and feel that you are taller than everything else around you.... So you can look down upon everything around you and feel like a King. So you can feel that you are dominating Nature. So you feel like a dominant ape in a tree. So you feel better. Better than what? Better than the tree. Huh?

Or is it just because you have such a Sense of Pure Wonder that you enjoy all viewpoints, and all vantage points equally. So you explore everything around you without thinking of building up any athletic prowess or athletic advantage... or how high up, or how low-down your vantage point is. Because you live in the middle of a society that demands that you compete against your fellow human beings even though you really do not want to. Because these are the only ways human society allows children to grow and live.

Which is better. A sense of competition and aggression, or a Sense of Pure Wonder and Humaneness? What happens when fun becomes more important than competition? What happens when love becomes more important than hating your enemies, and fighting against them? What happens when courage becomes more important than specialized advantages? What happens when honesty and the truth become more important than lies and fallacies? Then people trying to prove they are better than anyone else; would be exposed as lonely, miserable, egotists; with inferiority complexes... who need to be taught a lesson ,so they do not try and use fake advantages in order to bolster their own egos.

What if a reporter shoves a microphone in front of a professional athlete of Sports Star in the middle of a match, and the professional athlete yells out at the packed masses of spectators watching him:

‘What are you all watching me for? Go play your own sports. I’m sick of you all watching me. Get out of my sight. Go on. You think I like people who sit on their ass and do nothing? Do you think I worship people who are too lazy to play sports? Do you think I respect you for being lazy? Oh? You won’t leave. Then I’ll just quit playing. Now you can watch me sitting on my ass watching all of you...sitting on your ass. Now isn’t this exciting. Watching a bunch of asses sitting around, doing nothing.’

‘Oh. Now you’re leaving. What’s the matter? Don’t you like equality? What gives you the right to watch me and I don’t have the right to watch you, eh? You don’t want to be equals? If you don’t want to play sports then get out of my sight... go worship some other idiot who wants your hypocrisy. I don’t.’

For that matter: what is Athletics anyways. What is Sports anyways. Where did it come from. Literally all of it comes from running. What is the point in running anyways, if you are not a coward? The only living ground animal we cannot walk down is an Elephant. And even there: an elephant needs more food, and more water. We could walk down any animal on Earth. What point is there in running them down. There are many animals that can run faster than us. So what is running for: except cowardice. If you are not a coward. Who gives a fuck how fast you can run? If others can run faster than you: that just proves they are bigger cowards than you. That just proves they are afraid of you. So... fuck running as a sign of physical status superiority. It is basically a sign of physical cowardice. It is rewarding the biggest cowards: not the bravest people who are not afraid, and are not interested in running away from anything.

What if sports were designed to test courage: and not cowardice. Then you would have to change every fucking athletic ‘game’ beyond recognition. Then the principles and idea of Athletics, and sports would change beyond recognition.

What is the beauty and emotional and physical glory of Olympic Sports. It is the beauty and love of selflessness. It is the generosity of giving. It is the inspiring stories of personal hardship. It is rooting for underdog. It is the athletes who compete not for themselves; but for their country, for their coach, for something greater than they are. Sacrificing themselves for something greater than they are. And that has nothing to do with who can run faster, who has the biggest ego, or who is the biggest coward, or who has the greatest advantage. If you could take away all the advantages each athlete has: from the advantage of size, birth, training, time, affluence, education, love, support, help, status, power, etc... then pound-for-pound: you could easily determine who is the most courageous athlete. By having them stare into each other’s eyes. The first one to blink loses. The first one to smile loses... and wins at the same time. The first ones to fall in love win.

Have them tickle each other. The first one to laugh loses... and wins at the same time. Have them shake hands. The one most willing to spit the most on their own hands before they shake hands wins. How ‘bout the best ass kicker? Have all the athletes bend over to have their ass kicked... and the one with the nicest ass wins. Have all the athletes bend over in a line facing forward. The last one kicks the second-to-last one's ass, who then has to leapfrog over all the others bending over. Do this until there is only one athlete left standing. Have every spectator in the stadium be given scorecards to judge all the events. The loudest cheers win. The loudest boos win. Then all the spectators can stand up, give marks, shout themselves hoarse, and participate in whatever is going on down on the field. Have all the athlete chase each other around the stadium playing tag. The one who refuses to be chased wins. Have the athletes who refuse to be chased by the other athletes; chase the crowd out of the stadium. The last person out of the stadium wins.

Nothing except creativity and fun.

Take away imaginary abstract lines: and what is left of sports.... Nothing. Oh. You mean you can draw an imaginary line anywhere, and create a game from it. You mean you can create a playing field in a million other shapes and sizes instead of the same boring rectangle used for thousands of years. You mean you can draw imaginary lines anywhere you want to... and invent any kinds of rules you want to. Take away the sacredness of preserving someone else's imaginary lines and imaginary rules... and you can invent your own games easily.

Is that how you want to live... to waste your entire life obeying somebody else's imaginary lines and rules. Or spend your entire life creating your own life's imaginary lines and rules. What for? What is all of this sacred worship and preservation of imaginary lines and rules. What is it all for. What sense is there in it. Scribbling away at inventing imaginary lines... imaginary boundaries, imaginary rules... and then living by them. Living an imaginary life of pure abstraction. and abstract lines.

Oh. I see. Abstraction is more important than actual living. To hell with actual life. To hell with actual living things. It is the abstract meanings and rules and lines of civilization that are more important than the actual meanings, and boundaries, and rules of the Universe, and the world, and your body, and other living things: huh?...

What has sports turned into today? What is something called a sport? A chance to grandstand. A chance to show-off. A chance to win. A chance to Triumph. A chance to parade around in front of cheering crowds. A chance to blow-up your ego. A chance to prove that you are better than others. The basic emotional motivation of Professional sports is hate: not love, not fun. You cannot win unless you hate your opponents. The teams and players and athletes who hate the most are the ones who win. What does this say of modern human culture: eh? It says we all prefer hating to loving. Hockey and football teams have to get their hate-levels up before the game. If they don't get their hate-level up high enough: they lose their intensity. They lose their focus. Every professional coach knows this. Human intensity that is based upon hate is sick. It is insane. It is filthy. Human focus that is based upon hate is sick. It is filthy. It is obscene.

Modern Sports are an obscene celebration of the individual human ego. It is a celebration of winning. And fuck everything else. It is the humiliation of losing suffered by thousands and millions of people, while one ego gets to strut around and be worshipped as a God. It is the same dynamic of the ancient God-Kings of the first ancient civilizations. One rich, wealthy, powerful, worshipped human God. In this case a Sports God: And fuck everybody else. Fuck everything else in life except winning. Fuck everything else in Life except dominance. Fuck everything else except hierarchal status, power, fame, wealth, etc. Brainwash the masses into doing nothing but watching passively. Brainwash the masses into not being active. Make the masses physically inferior to elite winners. Brainwash the masses into only worshipping winners. Brainwash the masses into being spectators. Don't even give them a chance to play professional sports. Don't let them play sports at all. Turn sports into an elite activity only for the upwardly mobile: who are obsessed with competition, ego, greed and love showing off in front of other people.

What sense is there in 100 million fat lazy unathletic spectators watching a few spoiled rich professional athletes? Why doesn't everyone play sports? Why are sports reserved for only a lucky few and not everyone? The double value system of modern capitalist consumer culture is insane. Billions of human idiots are brainwashed into the idea that the hierarchy of class and status and wealth and power is based upon sitting on your ass and doing nothing but watch other people struggle and strain? While the professional athlete's status and fame and wealth and power is based upon hard work, exercise, discipline and effort athletic physical prowess. What sense does that make? Billions of idiots preening because they can sit on their asses and watch other people playing sports; thinking this is a statement of class power and privilege? While they pay for the privilege of attending these mass events making athletes and owners obscenely rich? Who is fooling who? Billions of idiots fooling themselves: being entertained by watching other people enjoy themselves. Instead of enjoying themselves: instead of them having fun... their idea of fun is watching other people having fun while they don't have any fun and only sit and watch in envy: wishing they could do what professional athletes can do. While eating junk and never exercising, and dying of medical problems which stem from obesity and lack of exercise. Who is fooling who? 2 billion idiots getting fatter and sicker and stupider: sitting on their asses watching idiots who don't have a brain in their head: genetic freaks blessed with healthy bodies and nothing else: robots parading for money: for profit. Turning all sports into an obscene spectacle of boring corrupt gladiator games. What is the motive for watching sports anymore? Sports has been so corrupted that the main and only reason the masses watch these shit spectacles is to BET on the outcome to make FREE MONEY. Sports has been swallowed by the racket of gambling. A billion idiots fooling themselves: escaping from their own lives: by becoming sports fans: addicted spectators: idol worshippers, idiots worshipping worse idiots. What for? What is the point in worshipping an idiot who can hit a ball and nothing else. Hitting a ball is not life: it is not human: it has no human meaning. What if all the billions of idiots worshipping sports icons didn't worship them? Then they would have to find something else to worship. WHY? Why do human idiots need something to worship at all? Hasn't anyone told them that it is actually possible to enjoy your own life without worshipping anything and anyone?

This is the fucking point: if people were forced to not worship anyone and anything: they would be forced to look at their own lives and ask themselves; what are they living for? If people did not live for the weekend so they can root for their fucking favorite team or sports star, or gamble on some fucking stupid sports game: then what are they working for? What are they living for? The explosion of sports hysteria in cities has for centuries been a way for the masses to tolerate the meaninglessness of their lives.

The more meaningless your life: the more you will desperately fill it and replace all true meaning with the most trivial meaningless things you can find. The mass worship of sports stars marks the emptiness of modern civilization. When there is nothing in your entire fucking civilization that has more meaning for you than watching a sporting event: then the civilization you are living inside is dead: is finished: has nothing more it can offer: is empty of all human meaning and human purpose. Sports spectatorship is merely one more way by which humans avoid the meaninglessness of their own lives. Staring at other people. Forgetting that you exist> forgetting yourself: distracting yourself from your own life: is not a sane thing to do. Detaching yourself from yourself: becoming a detached observer; is the mark of an insane poisoned human who has no sense of themselves as a living human. Watching sports to relieve yourself from the stress of working all week is only a way of deadening yourself to your slavery and your boring meaningless pointless existence.

If everyone played sports: nobody would be sitting on their asses to watch sports: they would be too busy having fun and playing sports themselves. Then nobody would pat to watch any spoiled idiots playing sports because it is more fun to play sports than sitting on your ass and watching it. The entire system and culture of modern sports is a complete copy and recreation of the insane, obsolete, out-of-date roman arena: where professional killers killed each other to satisfy the blood-lust and aggression and competitiveness of one million poor Romans. The Roman system of 'Circe et Panem' was merely a way to keep their poor masses brainwashed, fat, out of shape weak, spoiled rotten: so they would not constitute a threat to their masters who manipulated them, pandered to them, and controlled and ruled them for their own advantage. It was a system of keeping masses of people crowded into an artificial hell called a city under control. Which is exactly what is being done today. Cities are not natural organisms. They are breeding grounds of explosive rot and rage and unhappiness and misery. Let any mass of people inside an artificial packed mass called a city free of the constraints and brainwashing of the elite who oppress them, and they will leave that unnatural ghetto environment and find a better place to live. Humans are genetically designed to live out in open spaces and have the freedom to move and travel: not stay in one place all the time for the rest of their lives. If everyone played sports: the masses of human brainwashed slaves would become so healthy: they would kill their owners and oppressors and create their own cultures and communities: and civilization would be destroyed. This is very important to understand> civilization survives only by a constant downslide of human health and human intelligence and human will. The instant any mass population becomes too healthy: it rises up and kills its masters. This is why the future of civilization is doomed to total extinction. If civilization survives long enough to genetically debilitate the human species into extinction: then civilization will die: along with the human species. If civilization allows humans to become healthier and more intelligent: then humans will rise up and destroy their rulers and destroy civilization with their own hands. There is no possibility of human civilization lasting more than a few more years at the rate it is going now. The exponential accumulation of overpopulation, overpollution, toxic poisoning of the world's environments, the natural reactions of the earth to this explosion of one species destroying all other living organisms on earth; is destined for inevitable catastrophic collapse. Regardless of exactly how many years this will take: human civilization will destroy itself so completely: there will be almost nothing left of it, and there will be almost no humans left also. The increase of new deadly viruses, the increase of nuclear proliferation, the increase of toxic chemicals in the water, air, and earth and plants and animals and humans: the accelerating levels of psychotic insane detachment, distraction and inhumanity of the entire species living inside the artificial womb of mechanized industrial civilization: the instant this artificial support system implodes upon itself: 90-99% of the human population will die almost instantly so fast: it will be impossible to determine exactly what killed them. What will kill them is simple: their pride: the arrogance: their smugness: will be punctures: their egos will be destroyed. And all poisoned humans who live by their unspoken secret egotistical assumptions will die simply because the artificial system they religiously believed in failed them. When there are no gas stations, no cars, no grocery stores, when there is no money, no global trade, no mass media, no oil, no electricity, no heated homes, no stores, no mass produced products, no jobs, no government, no centralized power, no higher authority to tell them what to do and how to live: when all their gods and idols and icons are smashed into pieces and are dead and destroyed: they will die simply because their purpose on earth is finished: poisoned humans who are controlled by undead things have no will of their own to live: when undead remove themselves from these drones: they die. Instantly: immediately. Why? Because they were never alive in the first place. They never lived; they merely existed as poisoned shells filled with undead things filthying their living bodies minds and hearts. The instant they can't eat their fucking pizza and hamburgers and can't jabber on their cell phones and can't listen to their fucking iPods and can't play their fucking computer video games anymore: they will die on one week: dead from lack of artificial stimulants: addicted to artificial stimulus; unable to live without them. Unable to live without their fucking egos.

What if the best soccer player who ever lived; has no interest in showing-off in front of other people? What if the best tennis player who ever lived; has no interest in showing-off in front of other people? What if the best athletes who ever lived; have no interest in showing-off in front of other people? They would never play sports professionally. They would quit playing professional Sports completely. In disgust. Simply because they are not interested enough in winning. This destroys the entire premise of winning being a way of proving that you are the best at anything. What if the best athletes who ever lived have no interest in getting rich? This destroys the entire motivation for playing sports professionally. What if the best athletes who ever lived have no interest in becoming famous? This description covers billions of people who never even tried to become athletes.

Oops.

So unless every human ever born is brainwashed into wasting their entire life as a professional athlete. Nobody will ever know how many millions of better athletes could have beaten the pants off the few professional athletes who love strutting around and grandstanding in front of fat lazy spectators as the only way to make a living.

Since the beginning of the 1900's: all physical games, all physical play, all athletics, all sports: have become less and less fun by being poisoned by organized professional competition. You can track the systematic corruption of sports in every human who was ever born who ever played sports. Beginning at birth; learning to walk, falling down, making mistakes, laughing and giggling about all the funny mistakes you make. To young children: playing happily, making up their own games, having fun. To the idea of competing against someone else, to the idea of winning, to the idea of being better than others, to the idea of glorifying and believing in the sacred concept of superiority, inequality, to the use of unfair advantage. To the goal of becoming a professional athlete.

This de-evolutionary change in how people play games can be traced from love... to hate.

Games and sports begin with babies and children with love. And they end as adult professional athletes with hate. As young children: the most loving, generous, happy, humble innocent children who have the most energy, 'wins' because they do not care about winning. This exposes the fact that love is stronger than hate. The happy love-filled child will always win over the hate filled child. But by the time they get to professional sports: the best haters win. The ones who play sports more as a war, the ones who really hate, who want to hurt, to kill. Sports and games that were once played out of love: are now played out of hate.

The entire dynamic of the game changes. Young children who were far better athletes when they were little: become lousy at it when they are forced into organized boring sports. All the fun vanishes from the game. The only ones still playing: are the ones who were never very good at sports when the game was played out of love... or those who were lucky enough to be wise enough to still play the game out of love: not hate.

These are the few, rare 'superstars'. The lucky ones who learned to play sports early for the fun of it, and were lucky enough to never stop playing for the fun of it, and had unfair advantages over other children in how they were raised, how they learned, where they were born, their genetic heritage, etc.. Because professional sports are played mostly out of hate: not love. All professional sports have a matter of brute force. Force Majeure. Only the biggest, tallest, most powerfully muscled lifetime athletes who hate the most win. Not the ones who love the most. From love and gentleness and sensitivity... to hate and brutality and brute force. This is the evolving experience of sports in every human lifetime: this is how sports changes as you grow up. This is how civilization systematically poisons everything good in sports.

What is a sport anyways? Basically: a sport is hitting a ball violently. It is how humans express their subconscious hatred of the earth. Sport is basically a way humans express their subconscious hatred of the Earth, their rage against the earth. Sport is a deflection of hatred. It is an avoidance of expressing hatred and violence directly and honestly. Instead of admitting you want to kill your enemy-opponent-adversary-antagonist-competitor... instead of cutting off his head, you cut off his head figuratively every time you hit a ball. Hitting a ball: is merely the ancient legacy of decapitation preserved as a part of human society. Hitting or kicking a ball violently is not a healthy form of human culture. There is no love in sports. Violence without love is not healthy.

Soccer should be played with the hands not the feet... huh? That's rugby. No: the instant a person touches you while you have the ball: it's theirs. What? But that will force people to pass the ball all the time! Then nobody will be able to hog the ball for a long time. Then...oops... then soccer will become a team sport and so complex and so interesting that the old stupid foot soccer will be forgotten completely. But what if a person touches somebody in the act of throwing it away just before they throw the ball? Then only the other team is allowed to catch it or touch it. But then people will be diving for the ball on the ground. So what? Ha!ha!ha! Cracked heads in a hand soccer game? But 3 people touching the ball at the same time? Whoever gets it, it's theirs. With 2 other players all over him? Then he has to turn the ball over... wha-?? That will turn the idiocy of fighting over a ball so damned funny: Abbot and Costello couldn't make it any funnier! So the entire object will be to get away from the opposing player with the ball without being touched? Then hand soccer will become the most cowardly, nancy-pants, silly, 'don't you dare touch me!' sport in the world... which it is already... hmmm having to give the ball over if touched? Here! 'Touch' here damn you! 'Touch'... all the time trying to get away from the person who gives you da ball and cursing them for trying to get it back?? That's tag! That's the oldest child's game in the world!

You're it! No, you're it! No, you're it! No, y-! Then players will lose their damned patience and just get red in the face and get rid of the damn thing so they will not have to give the ball back to the opposing player! Then it will become worse than touch football: it will be touch handball, and the ball will be passed and thrown... what if somebody kicks the ball? Then it's brought back and given to the opposing team. God almighty... then the referee if he sees a kick of the ball with a foot? All play stops?! That is the opposite of what the game is now. If a referee sees a ball being touched by hands all play is stopped. But it's sure as hell more fun! Can players throw the ball so it bounces off an opposing player? Yes.

Ooooo whoooweee!! Then players who have an ax to grind will wham the ball at somebody who did them dirt so hard: their faces will be swollen, then chaos becomes... throwing the ball into a packed crowd of players in front of the goal. And hoping the highest leapers will be your team to angle the ball into the net. That is better than basketball. But isn't the goal too big for hands to throw it into the net? No. Ohhh... oh-oh... then the scores will be 59 to 75. Then there will be so many sores so fast and so complex that... replay cameras will have a field day. Showing which players finally tipped the ball into the net. Then scoring by throwing the ball at an opposing player is entirely legal? Yes. Now that is running on a huge field... and using your upper body to the max... somebody do it. Running with the ball... that is like water polo, only on land: and if a foot race ensues between the fastest speedsters? The one running down the one carrying the ball? The one carrying the ball better know exactly where the other runner is or else he will have to give the ball over to him or her? Then foot races will become epic races so thrilling that the replay camera will show how he got rid of the ball just before being touched. What if the opposing player touches the ball not him or her? Then it's a free-for-all. Ah!

O boy... tussle and dexterity. And if the touch is just before he throws it? The referees better be on their toes! Brought back? And a free throw for the opposing team!! With the attack inside their goal within striking distance? Saved by the fastest diving most selfless players who manage to touch the player before he throws it or passes it? Then position and tactics and passing becomes so important and upper body strength becomes so important: the best most accurate thrower... but what am I saying? Throwing a soccer ball is crude. Soccer goalies can throw it half the distance to the other net! But passing a ball throwing it accurately? A round ball that size? Whoa Mama! Missed passes. Mistakes costing them the game. Bad passes suddenly become lucky passes or unlucky depending on the strategy and placement of the players on each team> Whoa! That sounds more than interesting: that sounds complex and fast and furious and fun. Running 40 yards and having to give the ball over?> because you were touched?

Talk about sportsmanship being forcibly rammed down the players hearts. People would pay fortunes to see it. Their most hated rival... giving the ball to their team... the emotional ups and downs or the game. the possession of the ball changing hands and sides so, so.... Why did you say the opposite of what soccer is? To play it with the hands not the feet? La Crosse is the closest thing to this new sport. No: it'll be called soccer. Just with hands. Not feet.

Ah... so the rules are not any different, except the touch rule. Hell: the touch rule is in effect now in foot soccer anyways. The instant any opposing player gets near enough to touch an opposing player who has the ball: its HIS anyways. He steals the ball anyways, unless he loses it and the ball is stolen back... it works. Same field same rules same goal same goalie, same equipment, same ball... hmmm. Same strategy also. And same requirements: everybody has to be able to run like the wind all day, only now they have to use their arms and hands and brains more...

The art of hitting a ball teaches hate: hitting is hating. Civilization does not teach the art of touching lovingly, sensitively; it teaches the arts of hitting and hating. Civilization does not teach kindness, sensitivity, love, tenderness: it teaches people how to hit something round that has a dead skin. Civilization teaches death: it does not teach life. Civilization teaches people how to hate the earth: civilization does not teach people how to love the earth. The earth is a ball also. Every living animal that has a living skin does not like being hit. Teaching children to hit is one of the vilest, most evil, cunning, sick devious way to brainwash an innocent child into hurting and hating and hitting and making enemies: instead of touching softly and sensitively without hurting, instead of loving and making friends. The arts of abstraction are not human: they do not teach honesty and courage: they teach people how to lie and be deviously dishonest. Competition is the art of making enemies. Competitive Sports are not human skills. All civilized skills are ways of killing. Skill means to kill cunningly like a Snake. It takes no skill to hit a dead animal that has already been killed and skinned and inflated into a ball: it takes insensitivity, it takes unfeeling brutality, it takes hatred, it takes aggression.

Modern ball sports like volleyball, tennis, ping-pong, baseball, hockey, soccer, cricket, etc, are intrinsically anti-social for a basic reason: they are based upon the idea of hitting the ball or puck or whatever is used... so the other person cannot answer back. These sports are living examples of the complete dysfunction of human communication: the avoidance of response: the goal is to be sure the other side cannot respond, cannot answer back. If these sports were based upon the human ideas of equality, reciprocity, fairness, friendship, communication, cooperation, good will,... then they would be based on the principle of responding, on answering back as equals; the ball or puck would be hit to the opponent-s so they could answer back. In fact if the ball is not played so it can be answered back: that would be a penalty, and any ball played so the other side cannot reach it, would cost the ones who did this points, and they would lose if they played this way, instead of winning

These sports are living examples of how not to play, how not to live, how not to communicate, how not to cooperate, how not to be fair, how not to have good will towards other human beings, how not to reciprocate, how not to treat others as your equal. These living examples of antagonistic competition are living examples of how unfair advantages are used in order to 'win'. This is the way all rules of civilized sports are set, and this is why all such activities should be abolished, outlawed and changed into forms of play which are not based upon the idea of trying to plat a ball or puck so that the other team or side or person can answer back. By reducing physical activity to this kind of unspoken hate, aggression, cunning, antagonism, unfairness without any words allowed to be spoken during the opposing side, without any human communication allowed: it gives the living elite example of how to treat all humans on earth: do not speak to any opposing players-teams-opponents... do not communicate humanely with them: treat them as enemies, be silent and treat every human you meet as a potential antagonist, a competitor who might take what you have or wan. The verbal silence that is practiced in all of these thinly disguised war-games is worse than anti-social, worse than elitist snobbery, worse than racist tribalism; it is ritualized violence; it is the deflection of hating and hitting another human being: diverting all your hate and violent impulses onto an inanimate ball or puck, so instead of hitting your opponent honestly, you do it ritualistically, hypocritically, abstractly, unfairly, cunningly, as violently as possible so they cannot answer back. The idea that you win if they cannot answer back, is not only anti-human, anti-social, insane, stupid, pointless and negative, it is totally evil.

The basic reason sports are evil and negative is because they all originate from the negative principles of war. Sports creates an artificial environment where you are playing against an adversary, an opponent, an enemy. Instead of playing and having fun with friends: sports forces you to turn the friends you play with into enemies, adversaries, opponents. Instead of having fun playing, winning becomes more important than play. That is the crucial difference between play and sports. That is the difference between adversarial opposition and cooperative play. That is the difference between competition and fun.

The difference between GOOD and evil is simple, and can be demonstrated simply. Babies and children who have not been poisoned by hate, play with each other, not against each other. They don't see other humans as an adversary, an opponent, an enemy. They play with each other as friends: not against each other as enemies. Their play is based upon cooperation, not competition. The more you take friendship out of play: the less fun it is. The more you put adversarial competition into sports: the less fun it is. The less fun people have: the unhappier they are. The more friends people have; the happier they are. The more fun people have: the happier they are. It does not take a fucking rocket scientist to figure out that competitive sports is not intelligent and should be banned.

The hypocrisy of professional sports is obvious: fans rooting for a team which represents their city, town, state, nation. Are these people rooting for one team friends with each other? Do they socialize with each other? Do they talk to each other? NO. They stay in their tiny cliques, and cannot stand each other. When there is no friendship, no fun, no play and no happiness in the larger society: the vicarious thrill of living your life through watching sports is a symptom of the emptiness of your own life. If the only time you can be happy is if you are a 'winner' and the only way anyone can 'win' a world championship is to make sure that the rest of the people on this planet are 'losers'; then whatever temporary elation one 'winner' might have doesn't change the fact that for 99.9999% of the rest of humanity, his exception only makes them envious and miserable and unhappy and fosters the culture of worshipping winners and looking down upon all other people as being losers. This kind of toxic elitism is what poisons all human relationships today, and it comes mainly from the mass media culture of professional competitive sports.

The whole point is that no matter how much people may like each other, no matter how much they are friends: that friendship ends when they come onto the arena and compete against each other in sports. Instead of being friends, they become enemies. This changing of roles from friends to enemies is why all competitive sports and all sports stars are bad role models for young impressionable children. Competition in sports is bad enough; but when you add money to it: when you make what is supposed to be fun into a for-profit enterprise, then the system and culture of professional sports becomes pure evil. For example the twin charity matches between Federer and Nadal called the 'Match for Africa' where they played two matches: one in Federer's hometown in Zurich Switzerland, and the other in Nadal's Home turf Madrid Spain. When they were interviewed; they were giggling and laughing so much they were couldn't speak, doubling up in happiness and fun, making jokes. Nadal arrived in his private 5,000,000$ jet. Federer picked up his friend Nadal in Zurich in his red 200,000$ red Mercedes. Hundreds of filthy rich people, and their spoiled rich children paid hundreds of dollars to see these 2 matches. And who sponsored this event? It was sponsored by the filthiest richest bank cartel in the world: the Credit Suisse. The bank that controls the World Bank. The bank that has systematically destroyed the economies of the poorest nations in the world by financial bribery; corrupting the dictators and rulers with offers of loans which comes only provided they destroy their own infrastructures-economy and allow global imports to take over a monopoly of the most basic services and products like milk and electricity. Will the 500 million this charity compensate for the western banks of the world impoverishing the 3rd world nations down to starvation levels? No. Is this how to be friends? Is this how you help poor underprivileged children? Is this the only way you can get rich people to part with their ill-gotten gains to help poor children? Why don't all these filthy rich parents who bring their filthy rich spoiled children to these charity matches cut out all the costs of this fund raiser? Why don't they just give their money directly to poor communities and children who are living in Africa? This is why professional sports and capitalism is evil: it takes the best motivation and the best good in people and it twists these good intentions into token lies, into corruption. Is this what you want the richest children to emulate? Watching close personal friends become enemies on the field of battle? And keeping rich children from helping poor children by sticking the false front, the false flag of charity onto the greediest most evil corporations in the world. So impressionable children grow up with an unconscious assumption banks care about poor children; which is a filthy cunning lie which these rich capitalists try to sell. So the only people who are allowed to 'help' poor children: are filthy rich multi-millionaires and sports stars; the ones who are the cause of all the poverty in the world; the ones who have over-accumulated so much money that there is no leftover money left for the billions for poor people? This is how civilization twists the truth. This is how it twists the truth and the fact that all rich people are intrinsically evil regardless of their 'personality; simply by the evil effect that the over-accumulation of money has on other people. When 1% of the world's population controls and owns 90% of the wealth: It does not matter one fucking shit how 'nice' they are in person. What matters is how much money they have legally stolen from all the other people in the world. What actually matters is the effect these super-rich people have on the rest of humanity. The love of Money destroys fun. The greed for Money destroys friendships. The lust for Money destroys trust. The need for Money destroys human relationships. Money destroys humanity. Money is destroying the human species and the living earth. Professional sports is now the last gasp: the last culture left in Capitalist culture. Just as in ancient Rome when the culture of the arena was the last culture before Rome rotted into total systemic incompetence, corruption, degeneracy and lunacy. Now it is modern western capitalism that is following the same path of total corrupt lunacy. Sports and gambling, the ritualized culture of competitive sports rotting into its logical insane conclusion where one man is a super-rich world champion-winner and the rest of the human species: 6.7 billion other people... are all miserable, poor, envious losers. This insanity is the logical and inevitable dynamic of tool-use. This is the logical end-result of the ant-heap of overpopulation, the pyramidal shitpile of civilized society, the insanity of over-accumulation which comes from using tools and competing instead of cooperating. The insanity of making millions of dollars from turning friends into enemies. That is the insanity of professional sports.

What is the most common sign of winning in Tennis and many other sports? The raised fist of hate, destruction, killing, violence... only after a winning shot or scoring a winning point is the truth about winning revealed. Winning in professional sports is all about concealed HATE. Teaching and training athletes to hate each other

What is the unhealthy obsession of most sports? It is the blind obsession of possession, possessiveness. Everybody wants the ball or the puck or the billiard ball or the football or the baseball or the tennis ball or the racquet ball etc.. Everyone wants to hit the ball, kick the ball, throw the ball, pass the ball, score with it, make points with it, win with it. It's my ball! Gimme the puck! Gimme the ball! Gimme, gimme, gimme! You can't have the ball: its all mine! It's my ball. How do you win in sports? By not allowing the other team or player to have the ball of course. Is there any sharing at all? No. Sports promotes possessive selfishness. The more possessive you are the better you are at preventing your opponent from touching the ball, hitting the ball, scoring with the ball, having the ball: the better an athlete you are you are, the more you win. The more selfish you are the more you win.

Sports is one way people are brainwashed into thinking 'inside the box' of civilized 'rules'. Sports is one effective way people are brainwashed to accept the rules of civilization and never question them. Sports is one way young children are brainwashed to worship, respect and stay inside abstract lines and boundaries. Sports is one way people are brainwashed to only act within the boundaries of the 'box' of artificial stupid 'rules' and 'traditions' of civilized life. It is one way young people are programmed to never step outside the 'box' and act outside the boundaries of these stupid obsolete rules. Why the fuck should people worship the rules of sports? They are not sacred! They are not religious or spiritual. Make your own rules fro chrissake! Play your own game! Create your own ways of playing sports for chrissake! Instead of playing 'inside the box'... play outside the damned box. Stop using abstract lines and rules at all! Just play and have fun with no damned boring rules. No abstract boundaries. Then you won't need sports at all. Then you won't want to even play these boring ritualized obsolete games based upon war and hate. Then you can play and have fun without making enemies, without hurting anyone.

Without violence, without brute strength being the deciding factor of who wins and who loses. Then there will be no winning and no losing at all. Then there will just be fun and play and happiness.

The basis of competitive adversarial sports, the idea of sports is based upon the accumulation of abstract mathematical things called points. Winning is based upon accumulating imaginary mathematical points. The entire concept of adversarial sports is based upon accumulation. How can you preserve, save, accumulate the past mathematically? The past is gone: it cannot be saved or accumulated except as a memory of what happened. What is the fucking point in basing sports on remembering who won or lost imaginary abstract points in the past and creating an imaginary accumulation of them to determine who wins or loses? Even the idea of abstract points is insane. Every mathematical point ever scored is uniquely different. No two are the same. The idea of labeling each play using a system of absolutely identical mathematical symbols which doesn't even come close to representing what happens on the field, the quality of play, how well or badly the athletes perform, whether the point was won or lost by mistakes or good plays. There should be two kinds of points: one set representing a point won by making a good play, and the other representing a point lost by making a bad play. The entire assumption that whoever accumulates more mathematical points is better than someone who accumulate less identical points is crazy.

What is the simplest toy a child can play with? A ball. The reason playing sports is fun is because you are using the simplest toy there is; a round ball. The earth is a round ball; if you play with the earth, if you play with everything that lives on the earth, you will have more fun and happiness than you can ever imagine. Life is a ball only if you play with it gently and sensitively. If you play with it brutally and unfeelingly and destructively: you destroy your own fun and happiness and you destroy the planet you live on.

The competition of sports is a perfect example how competition destroys happiness. Take the NFL. The only way these overpaid professional define happiness is winning the Super bowl: for them nothing else matters except getting that super bowl ring that tells them they are 'No.1'. Likewise, the only way any business company or Corporation defines happiness is by becoming 'No.1'. The end result is that only one person or one team or one company is 'happy'... while everybody else is unhappy.

That is not true happiness. That is saying to all the other people, all the other athletes, companies, corporations: "Fuck you... you're unhappy: so what, we don't care: we won and that's all that matters." It is this kind of competitive culture that destroys human happiness; competition ruins human lives, it is what makes brainwashed human zombies waste their lives fighting against each other, hating each other, committing every inhuman, immoral, unethical criminal sin and abomination possible in order to 'win'. Competition is responsible for the steady increasing levels of corruption and the steady increasing dehumanization of the human species. Until the entire human species understands that the culture of competition is pure evil, until the entire human species stops fighting and hating each other, the human species will destroy itself and destroy the Earth it lives on.

When your fucking 'happiness' is based upon the unhappiness of everyone else you know who also want to be happy; then your fucking 'happiness' is not happiness at all: it is a corrosive, evil poison which rots your Inner soul and creates an arrogance, an unfeeling ruthlessness, a dehumanized form of subhuman behavior, a cruel, sadistic, disgusting persona which makes 'winners', those who 'win'... the most miserable unhappy, unliked, unloved, despised, hated, envied assholes in the world.

Happiness

Happiness is only a secondary result of Dynamic Equality. If people are equal to each other: they do not need happiness in the first place because they are not unhappy to begin with. Unhappiness is a symptom of imbalance. Only unhappy people seek happiness. Happiness is only the back swing which over-corrects this imbalance. If you are not unhappy or happy... if you feel good, if you have energy: then you will not understand the question of whether you are happy or not because it is not relevant. Happiness is what unhappy people seek. It is a symptom of lacking. This is why when people are happy: they do not realize they are happy; but when they are unhappy; they realize it. Unhappiness is a lacking, a needing. Happiness is a not lacking, a not needing. It is only when you are unhappy that you search for happiness. But if you find someone who is your equal, and treats you as an equal.... You suddenly find that you do not need happiness any more. Once you have equality, you do not need happiness. Happiness is searched for because people are unequal. Happiness is sharing between equals. The dynamic of one-sided accumulation of human civilization does not allow equality or happiness to exist. It creates unhappiness.

The search for happiness is merely the search for equals. It is merely the search for equality. How can you create happiness if you are not equal? Share your knowledge with others equally. Share everything between yourselves equally. If one person is better at something than others: have them teach their knowledge or aptitude to others until everyone is as good at it as they are. If you are fitter and slimmer than others: teach others so they will be as slim and as fit as you. Not selectively. Not greedily, not selfishly: but so you will have other people as fit and slim as you: whom you can play with, and do all the things you want to do. This way: you can create your own friends. This way you can create friendship, equality, fun, sharing and happiness.

There is no other way to do it.

This is why sports and games should be fun that is shared equally. They should be played between equals. You should play them as equals. This is why most games and sports are fun: because they are played between equals. Because they are based upon the Principle of Equality... from which all the laws of Dynamic Balance come from. The more equal people are when they play games and sports: the more fun they have and the happier they are.

As long as people are unequal: they will be unhappy. As long as the pyramidal pile of civilization exists: humans will be unhappy. Happiness should be the basic motivating energy for all humans on Earth. Civilization corrupts and poisons it. . If all people want to be happy. All we need to do is destroy all forms of inequality. The reason civilization should be completely destroyed is because it destroys all happiness

But... there is so much accumulated inequality in human civilization: the ones on top do not want to get hurt. As long as they are safe: why should they change? As long as they have all the Power and energy and money... why should they throw it all away? For something they never experienced? And never even learned to want? As long as humans live in civilized societies that sanctify and uphold inequities, and injustices and inhumanity over the idea of equality, things will only get worse.

Play and Food

Babies play with their food because they do not want to eat it. You stupid fucking brainwashed imbeciles. Babies only eat food if they are hungry. Babies are designed to play and have fun with everything they touch. If you allow babies to play and you do not tell them 'no', if you allow babies to do anything they want to:

They will not eat your processed shit called 'food' because they are wiser than you and know it is not good for them. If babies are allowed to live without being brainwashed and forced into doing things they do not want to do like being forced to eat when they don't want to; they will grow up happy and healthy and strong and a million times more intelligent than their parents.

The point is: no parent knows how to raise their children and they should admit it. Once you admit you know nothing about raising a baby and a child: then you can learn from them as they teach you the universal truths of human babyhood and human childhood. And that truth is: the only job you have in life is to make friends and have fun. And you do that by playing creatively with everything, and you do that by not touching anything that isn't alive.

If it is dead> no touch bad dead

If it is alive? Happy curious touch make friends play gently sensitively! No harming anything that is alive.

If you live like this: you will have no problems. And you will be fulfilling your function in life as you were designed to fulfill it. You will have meaning in your life. Your life will have meaning to it. Unlike now: where your life not only has no meaning, but it has a negative evil meaning which is the systematic poisoning and destruction of all life on earth.

Law

The emergence of law was a natural evolution of human abstraction. Beginning with the concept of ownership and property, the increased accumulation of human populations, the development of abstract linear reality: abstract boundary lines, writing and a pyramidal authority which had to create a system for managing this condition of massed humanity.

For thousands of years, humans practiced robbery: using brute force as the quickest and most efficient way of accumulating wealth. This kept most populations in a state of upheaval, greed and fear. It was only upon the legalization of robbery through the invention of agreed-upon tribute by less powerful entities to the more powerful tribes, rulers, and kingdoms that it was found you could rob much more effectively. That is, if you did not milk the cow completely dry: but just enough so you could keep on milking it indefinitely. This was further refined by civilization into a legal system of robbery that managed to siphon off most of the wealth from the masses and concentrate it at the top of a ruling class or elite. Civilized centers thus became more prosperous than the outlying non-civilized areas due to the peaceful legalization of robbery.

Originally a ruler's word was law. Depending on who comprised the ruling class, how the society's cultural makeup was structured: any form of authority was considered to be lawful. But once the population increased, then this authority could no longer be concentrated in a few hands. It had to be delegated. It had to be written down. 'Thou Shalt' became written down: so other lower classes could be told by intermediaries what they were allowed, and not allowed to do. It was in this way that abstraction itself came to be worshipped.

As civilization grew: theocracies became kingdoms; its authority split into religious and secular bodies. This created yet another conflict in the struggle for supreme authority-power. Originally: most rulers were either deified, or seen to uphold their society's religious values. All legal systems are designed to sanctify, preserve and uphold the concept of their authority. They are an attempt to control a large population by enforcing conformity of behavior. To ensure obedience: servitude, responsibility: to preserve cultural values, religious values, ethics, and morals... The concept of law and the legal system is merely an abstract code conceived by those in power for their own advantage.

The only reason laws are necessary is the accumulation of large populations. Without this: you do not need law. If you remove all abstract values from human existence and leave only human values: there is no need for any kind of law. What if all people were honest, courageous, and loving... And had a sense of Pure Wonder? Then law becomes redundant. What if people simply did not lie? Then there would be no need or reason for a legal system in the first place. If everyone was honest and tried to cooperate with each other, there would be no need for even the idea of justice. The assumption of the Law is that everybody is a liar.

And God help you if you are not a liar in a court of law. Because the legal system does not understand honest people. They assume that each person's honesty is full of lies. And when they cannot find any lies... then they dig even deeper, until they find something, anything to incriminate them by. Because if they cannot find any incriminating lies or corruption in another person... then they become vulnerable to that person's superior honesty. So what do they do as a matter of instinct? They attack honest people a hundred times more viciously. They lie publicly in court to prove that the honest person is not actually as honest as they claim to be. Just so all of the dishonest liars can feel that everyone is equally a liar and corrupt as they happen to be. And that is how regularly; every honest person who was stupid enough to believe in the legal system; who is unfortunate to have to actually be involved in any legal matter, is taken advantage of.

All liars have a huge advantage over honest people in legal courts. Because the legal language is designed for the best liars to win. It is designed to punish all honest people and grind all honest people into the dust so they will never show their faces again inside a system that feeds off of the worst liars in history. The legal system is designed to ignore facts and truths. It is designed for the manipulation of lies. Nothing else. It is designed for upholding the rationalization of abstract insanities above actual facts or truths..

The concept of Law, or legality: is an outgrowth of the unavoidable conflicts of different civilized cultures, traditions, morals, ethics and values. With any accumulation of people, no social harmony can prevail unless some central body artificially enforces it. The abstract development of Law merely became a codified system for this enforcement. As a part of the hierarchical nature of civilization, it became a way to control and manipulate. It became an abstract tool. It is used to preserve the status quo. To keep a large number of people in order: as opposed to the chaos of no authority or control over them. It takes on the values and beliefs and attitudes of whatever civilization or culture it upholds. It becomes a way of preserving ideas and concepts. It also becomes a way of preserving power and wealth. It takes on the most basic dynamic of civilization: accumulation. Law is piled on top of law; regulation is piled on top of regulation. The older the Law, the more it is worshiped-preserved-valued.

But it is all an incremental accumulation that is selective. Some out-of-date laws become obsolete, uninformed, ignored. While others become more and more sanctified with the passage of time. All adding up to create an abstract code that is merely another expression or aspect of power-fame-wealth-knowledge. Ancient laws become so revered and sacred that they resist all change. The older these laws become, the more sacred they become.

One flaw in all legality is that it is set in stone and not allowed to be changed. This can be seen in all legal institutions as the gulf between the relevancy of their original documents widen between what is written and what is the actual state of their changing societies. Thus creating more and more conflict, equity and imbalance as time goes on. Simply because the abstract law is considered to be more sacred than any actual situation or truth. The end result is that people's lives are governed by abstraction and not actuality. The older any written law, or code, or constitution gets the more out-of-date it gets, the more inappropriate it becomes, the harder it is to interpret, the less relevant it is, the more it has to be amended or tweaked to fit the changing conditions of society. Until they become so obsolete, so absurd, it is ignored and not enforced.

This helps to keep human awareness frozen and limited. It is only recently that grass-roots movements have ever shaped law or legality. And that minor sprinkling on top of this 10,000-year-old tradition has done relatively little to change its basic unfairness. The concept of law is basically a cultural stamp of accumulated normality upon a society's practices, beliefs and values.

Modern laws are supposed to be used as tools to resolve human conflict: mostly as a last resort when all else fails. Why? Because when humans are so corrupt, so dysfunctional, so antagonistic: they cannot cooperate or agree on anything amongst themselves peacefully. Then the law takes over and forces them to agree on a binding decision or settlement: whether they like it or not. But the fallacy of this system is the idea of justice. Which is completely apart from the idea of legality. Justice is based upon the ideas of balance, honesty and fairness. But: every legal system ever invented is based upon the assumption that all people are liars. The problem with this assumption is that if all people lie: how can you determine who is more honest or less honest? Honesty is relative and subjective. Abstract laws are absolute. How can you force a fluid dynamic of relative honesty into a set of absolute rules? No matter how you arrange such a system, you cannot guarantee that the plaintiff, or the defendant, or the jury, or the lawyers, or the judge, is any more or less honest. And if this system is based in the context of corruption: then justice does not exist. Any justice system is as corrupt as the culture-society-individuals who make up the system. The end result is that those who are most successful at distorting the truth to their advantage get the most advantage-power-wealth out of this and vice versa.

This is especially clear in the practice of plea-bargaining. Justice and fairness becomes a commodity to be traded, bought and sold. Thereby corrupting the integrity of the entire principle. Ultimately you cannot separate any legal system or concept of justice from the condition it exists in, from the context it exists in: which today is the civilized condition of culture-power-wealth-fame-knowledge.

Because of the adversarial makeup of civilization, all of its legal systems are also adversarial. This overriding basic condition tends to neutralize any other effect of legality. Whether a person confesses to a crime or not, the ritual of adversarial combat is upheld. Regardless of the best interests of any victims, regardless of practical limitations, regardless of what is sensible, regardless of the pure waste of time, money and energy: the entire system remains based upon conflict and opposition. But adversarial conflict has nothing to do with justice, fairness or balance. Unless you assume both sides are equally corrupt and dishonest, which is absurd. Because all legal systems are based upon the premise of everybody being dishonest: all legal systems are mostly used for the avoidance of responsibility. It is literally unheard of for people to admit guilt or responsibility in the legal system. They must be forced to admit guilt: and only by a preponderance of physical evidence is that ever successfully achieved. But this does not stop guilty people even after they are proven guilty, to persist in protesting their own innocence. This simply goes to show that all forms of human abstraction including one's own self-created reality or truth, and any human-created abstract body of law: are entirely questionable and relative.

Laws are simply a way of standardizing human behavior by enforcing identical values upon everybody within a certain society regardless if they agree or disagree. Basically, laws are a way of forcing people to conform. They are a way of ingraining the habit of obedience in a large population that would otherwise be unmanageable. But they can only be enforced on a mechanical level. They can only enforce tool-values, not human values. You cannot force people to be honest, courageous or loving. You cannot force a person to have a sense of wonder. But on the other level: you can force a person to behave and act like a tool or a machine. Laws are merely a set of tool-values designed to enforce the tool behavior of humans. Laws can never force people to be honest.

This brings up the question: when did the phenomenon of dishonesty come into being? When did people learn how to lie? How does the dynamic of dishonesty work in the human psyche? This goes back to the creation of culture. Once you create a condition where inner reality is more real than outer actuality: you effectively remove any means of perspective, or comparison, or evaluation, whereby a person can discover or realize anything which is true outside of their own self-created reality. If you raise humans inside a social system and abstract culture: where dishonesty and lying is normal: then there can be no effective search or discovery of the truth whatsoever. Once you create a structure where personal advantage is necessary for survival, once you dehumanize people to become antagonists and strangers: then lying becomes a necessary part of life... it becomes normal to lie.

All legal systems only reflect the conditions of the structure they developed from. They cannot reflect any universal truth or balance. The problematic thing about human reality is that it is self-created. Meaning that people can create their own lies and then believe in them. People can selectively choose not to be aware of what is actually true and only allow what they choose to admit into their awareness. By being selectively aware, by focusing only on certain things and ignoring others, by this very dynamic of awareness: you are lying to yourself. If you go further and manipulate these selective truths, you can literally construct any kind of rationalized belief into what you consider to be real, or normal, or true. This is further exacerbated by the selective use of evidence known as facts in any legal system. In fact, the majority of all legal battles are won before the case even goes to court by simply determining selectively... which evidence is admissible, and which evidence is not admissible. This game of legal tactics is shown and demonstrated endlessly in television shows, and demonstrates over and over that people who do not want to be honest, people who want to lie, can selectively tell any selective truth, and hid 99% of the rest of the truth simply by not including it. It teaches all people to sneer at all truths, by assuming that all truths are bias, selective and unfair. That there is no such thing as a universal truth. And by that universal corruption of the idea, the concept of truth itself... makes it perfectly okay for all humans to be untruthful simply by the rationale of: 'Hey... everybody does it.'

Legal courts are not interested in truth: they are not interested in connecting anything. Each lawyer is only interested in selectively using certain facts and laws creatively in order to win. The actual truth is ignored, buried, hidden, not mentioned, lied about, distorted, and denied... all to get some legal advantage. The idea that there is any fairness or balance to this is blatantly absurd. Yet all cultures hold up the sanctity of their laws. All law is supposed to be fair, honest, just, balanced. Because if people find out that it is not: then they might try changing their legal system. All law is sanctified beyond questioning, upheld and enforced by the authorities until people obey laws through fear.

It is only when human awareness is completely open and always questioning, that you can gain a contextual understanding of anything. What is actually true is relative: it is never absolute. But all laws are based on the abstract concept of the absolute. By setting up an abstract system of absolute rules: the concept of law is basically an attempt at duplicating human behavior. This has nothing to do with balance, fairness or justice. It is simply a management technique.

The concepts of including equality, fairness and justice into law only came into the public arena with the shift of human slavery into wage slavery in the last two centuries. And this new version has only been successfully implemented slightly in a small minority of the human population on this planet. The only reason that this happened was the explosion of tool-wealth, tool-training, and literacy. In a few lucky societies, humans were no longer treated as human slaves: only as tool-slaves, or wage slaves. The idea of law never evolved out of this late development. On the contrary: the concept of law has always been a means for keeping large populations oppressed throughout human history. This still remains true today.

But with the advance of technology, with Capitalism replacing War as the most practical way of amassing wealth and power: societies found that they had to train their populations much more intensely to serve civilization's mechanical needs. The offshoot of this increased level of tool education was that the main form of accruing wealth shifting from conquest to trade: this resulted in a cultural power shift from serfdom to citizenship, from war to business.

For a legal system to work in the context of business: it is no longer feasible to practice pure oppression as in the past. So a compromise is found. The barest, minimal tool education to provide the trained manpower for the needed tool functions, and the indoctrination of the entire population into the corruption of wealth as the carrot to keep them slaving at their jobs. In other words: the stock market. The way to wealth is now through tool-use, technology: not robbing by brute force, but through accumulation of knowledge, through better tool-use, through legal and illegal thievery of all kinds.

Give the entire population the hope that they might share in this wealth and let them slave all their lives trying to attain it. Then the entire system becomes one of corrupt greed: but now it is legal, peaceful. Legal thievery becomes a norm instead of outright butchery, killing and rape. Why? Because the accumulation of population has become so great that if you didn't: civilization would destroy itself through its own violence. Those countries that lack this refined form of legal corruption stay poor and in constant turmoil and conflict. Those whose corruption is legalized: get rich.

Then what happens? Parts of the human population are no longer treated as complete slaves: in a highly industrialized nation, it is the tools and the machines that are on the lowest rung of this totem pole. Suddenly human rights become an issue in politics: suddenly the tool slaves become wage slaves with a tiny bit of power. Now the slightly humanized tool slaves want to share in the wealth and power also. This is perfectly fine: as long as the elite still control and manipulate the populations by possessing most of the power and wealth of their society. As long as they can harness the productive power of the majority of the population as wage slaves, the corporations and governments can amass more and more power and wealth: only now, they now need to train a willing work force that is peaceful. As a more humanized system of corruption: this trade-off is only supported because it makes the rich richer. But:

the offsetting balance to this raising of human populations out of complete slavery and oppression has, in the last two centuries, been the rape and pollution of the entire planet. The industrial advantage of a higher standard of living for an elite, lucky minority is achieved only at a terrible environmental cost.

When there are groundswells of sufficient magnitude, the legal system is slightly tweaked and adjusted to fit the changing times. How? Through an endless accumulation of laws being piled on top of each other to produce a bureaucratic pile that gives the opportunity for yet another massive accumulation of power and wealth to occur. But how it all works is incremental. One plaintiff to file one case, to establish one precedent. One law piled on top of another, on top of another. One law to benefit one interest or concern: and no concern whether any of these laws may conflict with each other. No cohesiveness or overall plan to it: just a bunch of piled up legalized restrictions and punishments that automatically become sanctified, unquestioned, feared, hated. Until the definition of what is legal ends up bearing little resemblance to the actual conditions, or truth about anything. All caught up in a continual legal conflict and struggle of antagonism. What rights does any person have in any culture-nation-class? It is all arbitrary and expedient: non-universal.

Law is just a faster more effective way of sanctifying power, a way of avoiding the questioning of authority. Once something becomes "The Law", then you can fight and kick all you want, but it won't do you any good. What that teaches people is that once something becomes legal... No matter how unfair or evil that law is... then they should give up fighting against it. The only thing that law recognizes is unquestioning obedience. That effectively muzzles all civil unrest, all civil discontent all civil disobedience... and makes the millions and billions of powerless humans, easy dupes for the lawmakers who profess to make laws not for their own advantage. Good gracious no. Who ever heard of such an idea. But only laws for the advantage of other people... How stupid can you be to have been sold this farce as representational government? Then, go off and leave these lawmakers alone and unsupervised?... and do not even bother to find out what they are doing, or why or how they are doing it...? And assume that these people will be honest, stay honest, unselfish? The Law is made for the benefit of those who design them. And this simple fact is never openly and honestly discussed or admitted anywhere. The Law is never designed to keep the lawmakers in line... it is designed to keep all other people in line except the ones involved in making those Laws.

How...? By fear. By the fear of being brought to court and forced to go through a ritualized kind of insane, inhuman torture: where nobody is supposed to be human, nobody is supposed to get even slightly upset, nobody is even allowed to raise their voices, or speak in an unseemly fashion, or horrors of horrors: speak when not spoken to. The entire legal system is designed to treat both litigants, plaintiff and defendant, like two year-old children who must be told where to sit, when to stand, what to say and not say. As the powerful parental authority figures are allowed to speak when they please, raise their voices when they please, and punish their legalized children as arbitrarily and unfairly as they please because what ever they decide is the Law, and cannot be questioned or fought or even doubted... except by creating another sacred "law" which nullifies or abrogates the other Law.

Ultimately all law is based upon human reality and human normality. Start with a cultural norm and once you preserve its abstractions in the form of law, you get that system to mirror the accumulating complexity of the evolving society and culture. Each accumulation undergoes its tortuous incremental changes and catastrophic landslides until it is just another mirrored pile of the accumulation which created it.

In South America, the Spanish not only robbed, pillaged, murdered, killed, and raped the native inhabitants: but their cultures and their legal systems as well... and after destroying their cultures, replaced them with their own vastly more corrupt culture and a single corrupt language that is so unwieldy; you cannot express a logical thought in any logical sequence. That historical trauma we can still see today in the corrupt evils where the imported law of the rich and the wealthy now controls most of this continent. But let one house of Jesuits be massacred in San Salvador and what happens? International outrage. Political upheaval. Why? Because the law was supposed to protect the white, educated, rich. It was supposed to protect the European culture: not the millions of legal citizens or their culture. And what is the effect of this ripple in the corruption of one small legal system? An end to physical violence as a legal norm in one small country: no more death squads... While the rich get richer and the poor stay poor. But the Law itself has advanced. This country now has elections. Human rights. To what effect? Almost nothing: the status quo remains basically unchanged. The lesson in all this is, that in order to preserve peace by upholding the concept of law: you must also preserve the pyramidal heap of civilization, and vice versa. But in all this: the question of fairness, justice or balance has nothing to do with the adversarial conflict of legality except as an abstract joke.

It is the natural progression of accumulating human population that produces the conditions of irresponsibility, authority, power, coercion, oppression and legality. All of the tool-aspects of culture, tradition, myths, religion, morals, ethics, values... The creation of cities, nations, governments, empires, can be seen as the endless effort of civilization to control its inhabitants in as many ways, on as many levels and degrees of conformity as possible.

What law does is similar to what Science does, to what tool-use does: and that is: try to translate actuality into an abstract construct. It tries to take all of the subtle uniqueness and diversity of human relationships and force them into a narrow conformist code of conduct; so all people are forced to behave identically regardless of the actual circumstances. It attempts to reduce the diversity of human interchange into an application that can be duplicated: one-size-fits-all. Conformity, Law, Tradition, Culture, are all abstract attempts at the duplication and identity of human behavior and actions.

Laws are merely another way for humans to selectively focus-on and manipulate things like facts, evidence, testimony, the interpretation of all this, the legal meaning, the legality of it... all done for the purpose of winning, getting an advantage over your opponent. It is a system based upon polarized absolutes of absolute innocence and absolute guilt. It is based upon the polarizing ideas of absolute right and absolute wrong. It is based upon the polarizing absolutes of winning and losing with no in-between, no relativity, no actuality, no true basis of the actual universe we live in. It is a purely abstract set of abstraction. It has nothing to do with being human. Legal systems do not recognize love, or honesty, or courage, or wonder. They do not recognize that people are even human, or that they have feeling or emotions except as interpreted through its jargon, which is designed to dehumanize all human feelings into some kind of formulated, obscene, abstract representation of emotion. Law and all legality is merely one way all civilized societies force humans to treat each other inhumanely by sticking to the letter of the law, by putting law above all human concerns, by forcing people to act inhumanely, think inhumanely, feel inhumanely. It is a necessary part of the dehumanizing process of civilization. It is pure dehumanization at its most obscene example of demonstrating how the power, arrogance, and the stupidity of pure dead abstractions that are based upon semantic gibberish called 'absolutes'... are more important than anyone who is alive and living and breathing and actually feels emotions and is unique and is human.

And what does this legal huge system do? It deal almost exclusively only with the past. The dead past. What is called legal evidence. ? Dead things. What is the largest department of crime prevention.

Forensics... where tons, and tons of dead things are stored as evidence. Moldering away for decades. A morgue, a museum of dead useless evidence. Evidence that is more important than any living evidence. What does the legal system obsess over? Death, killing. Past killings. Killings that happened just yesterday. Horror. Crisis.

Has the Legal system ever tried to prevent any killing? No. It just waits until someone commits a crime, and then tries to sift through all of the lies to figure out who was guilty. It is a purely reactive-mindless stupid tactic of shutting the barn door after the horse escapes. Guilt, shame, punishment... of the past.

But at least it is understandable. If you look at the history and evolution of all civilized legal systems. The idea of sanctifying any Law as being absolute... and the idea of Laws changing with the times. These two assumptions are total hypocrisies. They refute each other. They conflict with each other. They are diametrically opposed to each other. They make no sense. You cannot create a sane legal system by using both of them in the same system. But if you look at Law as an attempt by whoever is in power at the time to make themselves more powerful: then using these two dysfunctional concepts explains why they use them in the first place. Any relative change in the Law is supposed to be absolute. Any absolute Law is subject to relative revision.... Huh? How illogical and stupid is that?

The Supreme Court of the United States was a bias court in favor of human bondage and slavery for more than one hundred obscene years. It took a huge, bloody civil war to settle this fight over humans being treated as the property of other humans. The sacred Supreme Court did not decide the illegality of human slavery. If Americans had waited for a legal court to decide that human slavery was a legal abomination, slavery would never have been abolished.

The issue of slavery was taken out of the legal system. Why? Because the sacred legal system; which is supposed to be the last resort of human conflict and disagreement... did not work. Why? Because it was too corrupt. Why should any human sanctify a system that cannot even give a sane ruling about something so obvious, so evil, so inhumane; as slavery?

For one hundred years. The American supreme court was obscenely corrupt and biased: in favor of human slavery. It considered the property rights of a white man to be more; much more important than the life of a black human. A black human was considered to be property. The entire Civil War was not fought over human rights. It was fought because of property rights. How the can you mindlessly worship the legality of a court that did that for 200 years?

The South claimed that black people are not human: they are property. Because they had money and time invested into them. Here comes the same corrupt idea of investment.... That was invented over 35,000 years ago. The idea that you are owed a return on your investment. The North had so much other ways of enslaving humans into machine-bondage, and tool-bondage... that the machines were doing so much of the work, keeping human slaves became a nuisance. A time-consuming, inefficient way of getting a proper return on your 'investment.'

In the 1700's People spat on the United States Constitution. They burned it in public. They did not show it any respect. They did not slavishly respect a piece of paper. They were not stupid enough to respect a legality they despised. Why? It was not old enough yet to become sanctified merely because of its age. Sanctity is merely a matter of age. The older, the more out-of date something is: the more obsolete, the more useless it is... the more it is sanctified, worshipped and revered.

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

Only by constantly putting in different amendments to the originally badly written, crude attempt at self-government that was already fatally flawed; was the American Constitution saved from being thrown out as a completely unworkable document. As a corrupted document with so many loopholes for manipulation and unfairness; that it has not slowed down the destruction of the Democracy it was supposed to uphold one bit.

The supposedly sacred Constitution of the United States should be thrown out the window... As out of date. Times have changed. The U.S. Constitution no longer works. More pertinently; it never worked ever. It never worked as a legal document for all the people in America... moreover; it was never designed to do that in the first place. Preserving this obsolete document, and basing a modern functioning Nation upon it by adding a few Amendments the American Constitution: is like trying to add a few Amendments to James Watt's steam engine, so you can build a rocket that can go to the Moon.

However... you cannot write a better legal document for what it was actually intended for. Its original intent was to protect the property rights and privileges of a small elite class of wealthy, landed English Gentry living in America. The Constitution of the United States is a document sanctifying the English belief that: property rights are more sacred than human rights. You cannot force people lacking in kindness and understanding to become more gentle and wise by writing words on paper. You cannot legislate human ethics or human morality.

Human rights were only added on later as an amendment. As an afterthought.... After a bloody Civil War forced people to include black males. Not women white or black women: they were still forced to remain second class citizens until the suffragette movement of the 1920's finally gave women the power to vote. If you want to write a better Constitution for a Nation; then each person should write their own Constitution... and ALL of them should be legally sanctified. And whenever any person is dragged into court, they should be judged by their own written Constitution.

'Did you write this?'

'Yes.'

'It says here this is how you want to live: you have violated your own sacred personal constitution... your own personal system of values.' 'Oh... so your values have changed since you wrote these things?'

You mean people actually change their values and ideas as they grow up and learn? Oops. Too relative. Too much constant change and diversity.

Because civilization is based upon root lies called myths that have become legalized lies, no legal system works. Any legal system based upon the sacredness of the ego does not work.

The concept of individual rights being more sacred; over and above the rights of the larger group is another lie.

You cannot create a working legal constitution based upon the sanctity of an individual over a larger group. So. How do you develop a Universal Constitution? First you need root myths. That are universally, and actually true...then root cultures to evolve from these root myths. Then groups to evolve from these root cultures... then if they want write anything down, I couldn't care less. Because whatever they write down will all be universally and actually true, and Universally agreed upon... by every other culture..

Law is not based upon equality. It is based upon inequality. It is based upon powerful people having the power to punish less powerful people. It is a one-sided, unfair concept. The People who legally judge and punish other people are never judged and punished by the same legal standards that they use to punish their victims. Look at how modern Law works: it is based upon fear and hate and greed. The victims in the system are not allowed to say anything. Anything they say will be used against them. Teaching the public mass to shut up and don't open your mouth... even if there is injustice. It teaches people to become craven cowards too terrified to speak up, or speak the truth. Because it does not matter if they speak the truth, or if they are lying: the system is so rotten and so corrupt: that honest lawyers are terrified of their honest clients saying anything! What is that but a perfect legal way to terrorize the oppressed masses to shut up and keep quiet?

Punish people for being too honest? Punish people for speaking their minds? Punish people for standing up and saying anything in a democratic court of Law? How different is this kind of justice from the mock trials held in the USSR by Stalin? The result is the same. Truth is a joke. Whoever the court decides is guilty will be convicted because a legal reason can be found for anything.

The Law does not heed the Biblical warning of: 'Judge not; lest ye shall be judged'. Legal judges are the complete antithesis of this exhortation. They are never judged. Their own power protects them from the law. All humans are guilty of committing sins and crimes. What is the point in creating a legal system where liars get away with their crimes and rewarded for lying: while honest people do not get away with their crimes and are punished for being honest?

One-in ten million corrupt politicians are honest enough to publicly admit their corruption; and have to resign their office, while the ten million others who are not as honest; stay in office, and get away with it, and stay in office. What does that teach? It teaches that you must never be publicly honest, or else you will go to prison. It teaches guilty people to lie in public; and hire a lawyer to lie for them in court. Politicians who are honest enough to publicly admit to any sexual, or family scandal are forced to resign in huge humiliation and disgrace. Even though this kind of sin is not even a legal crime... While all of the other politicians who are not honest enough to admit to their own sexual and familial peccadilloes and scandals stay in office.

But... this kind of honesty has nothing to do with honesty in politics. It is merely a person being punished for being personally honest in public... They are not being punished for being a bad, or corrupt politician. They might be a completely honest politician.... But that is not important in politics. Honesty is not important in politics. Honesty is not important in Law.

Lying is much more important in civilization than telling the truth.

If you do not lie in civilization: you cannot live with other civilized people. They will ostracize you, kill you, jail you, imprison you, attack you, hate you and do anything to shut you up. Civilized humans will do anything to shut an honest person up. Because civilized humans cannot stand honesty. They cannot face honesty. They do not like honesty. They hate honesty. They fear honesty. Because their entire civilized lives; their entire civilized realities, their entire civilized normalities, their entire civilized abstractions are based upon lies: not upon the truth. Pure honesty threatens civilization. All lies, and lying supports and preserves civilization. It is that simple. This is one effect civilization has upon humans. It turns all of us into dishonest liars. The hypocrisy of legal honesty is pathetic. People lie every day. People do illegal things every day. Then suddenly...: they have to be 100% legally honest...? Suddenly they have to be legally pure? And claim that they never did anything illegal in their entire lives?

If you put any human in the world on the stand and ask them what they did that day: you can catch them in a lie, or doing something illegal. So: honest people become terrified of testifying: because they know the difference between a lie and the truth and do not know how to lie well. While people who have practiced lying all their lives lie so convincingly: the court loves them.

The hypocrisy of a legal system that demands 100% honesty, pure morality, pure ethics from the masses: while allowing privileged classes to get away with murder. A legal system whose authority is based upon the criminality of robbing and killing, Force Majeure, and armed violence. Trying to force a token legal honesty at the point of a gun by fear, intimidation and violence. While trained hypocrites paid to speak for their clients exploit every technicality of the insane regulations that define legal honesty... stinks so badly: it is not worth spitting on.

Why is Western legality so corrupt? It is based upon criminality. It rewards the criminals and punishes the honest. It is based upon the idea of secrecy being sacred above all else. It is a system that protects liars, crime and criminality by sanctifying secrecy above all other legal values and concepts and values. It is a system that penalizes all outspoken honesty.

What is the root of all Western legality based upon?

‘You have the right to remain silent’

Not “You have the right to speak the truth.” The only way you cannot be hurt by Western legality is by saying nothing. The only way you cannot be punished, the only way you cannot be held responsible, the only way you cannot be convicted and found guilty is by remaining silent. All a criminal has to do is say nothing: and they can escape justice.

Western legality rewards silence. Not honest people who speak the truth. It rewards liars. It rewards criminals. It abets criminals. It enables criminals. It enables liars. It gives every person the legal privilege of lying by saying nothing. It gives every person the ability to hide the whole truth by not punishing them for keeping secrets. It gives every person the legal right to hide their criminal acts, and criminal thoughts and criminal emotions: by not punishing them, not being totally honest and forthcoming. It assumes that everybody has something to hide.

Western legality hides crime by silence and secrecy. It hides crime by sanctifying silence and secrecy. It hides crime by supporting silence and secrecy.

What is Western legality opposed to? Open honesty.

‘Anything you say: can and will be used against you.’

Western legality attacks every person who is outspokenly honest. Western legality hates all honest people. Western legality fears all honesty. Western legality is a merely a maze of convoluted ways to avoid all direct simple honesty. It is an abstract invention: that was invented by criminal liars: to get away with their crimes.

How can you improve Western Law?

Simple. Get rid of the corrupt concept of the sanctity of silence.
In fact: do the opposite. Turn the entire system around.

Make the legality of legal rights read to every person read like this:
You do not have the right to remain silent.
Anything you say will not be used against you.

But what you actually did WILL be used against you... not what you said you did

If it is required for every person to answer every question fully and explain everything in detail. If no person is allowed to hide behind the sanctity of silence. Then the system will work. Then all that has to be done is to compare stories, and compare details, and facts: and the truth will out. Then what people say will not be used as evidence. Then what people say can be used to find the actual truth. Then what people say can be used to find the actual guilty parties. Then the entire basis of Western Justice will change from people blaming each other and trying to find a scapegoat to pin the crimes on... to a system of investigation that can and will expose the actual truth.

However... If a person is hiding one tiny incriminating piece of information which they know will find them guilty. Then what do you do? Simple. Ask more questions. Do more comparison between stories and facts. Find discrepancies, find differences and explore them in detail. Explore motives. Explore every person's life. Find out how they were raised. Find out who they are. And sooner or later: if you dig deep enough; you will find they truth. If a person refuses to testify. If a person refuses to answer a question... they should automatically be jailed and found guilty for obstructing justice.

What will this do?

It will not only protect every outspoken honest person in society: it will support all outspokenness and forthrightness and all honesty. It will legally force all facts and all information to become public knowledge. It will legally force all selfishness to be stopped. It will legally punish all people who are guilty get an advantage by using secrecy and silence by hiding the truth. It will destroy the concept of personal patents and personal ownership being hidden and kept secret. It will legally destroy all attempts to form criminal conspiracies by secrecy and silence. It will change the normality of human behavior. It will legally force people to answer all questions asked of them honestly and fully.

It will legally revolutionize the Western Justice system. It will legally force all criminal acts and institutions out into the open. It will legally force all criminals to be exposed for who they are and what they are actually doing. The only trouble is... It will also put all the people who are part of the Western Justice system now: behind bars. It will put all the lawyers and judges and police, and clerks and justice system workers out of a job, and in jail. For refusing to testify. For refusing to be completely openly honest. For keeping quiet. For not telling the whole truth. For hiding the truth behind secrecy and silence....

Oops... Now we can't have THAT, now... can we? Why not?

In fact: this concept would put rich person behind bars for refusing to explain exactly how they got rich.

This would put fat people behind bars for refusing to answer exactly how they got fat. This would put teachers behind bars for refusing to answer exactly how come their students are not learning anything. This would put parents behind bars for refusing to answer exactly how come their children grew up traumatized to become sick, damaged, lazy, dishonest, liars and criminals.

In fact: if this concept were enforced legally... it would put all mankind, all humanity, it would put civilization: on trial. It would put every businessman and corporation and every capitalist fat cat behind bars for refusing to answer exactly why they sell poorer quality goods for more money. It would put politicians behind bars for refusing to answer exactly why they supported bills that were harmful to their Nation and community.

In fact... it would put most adult civilized humans behind bars. Because every civilized human adult is guilty of something. Every civilized human is hiding something. Every civilized human has something they do not want to talk about. Every adult has something to hide. The core reason why the Concept of western Justice is completely rotten right down to its fucking roots is because ...

Nobody civilized adult wants to look at themselves. Nobody wants to look at what they are actually doing to themselves or to others. All civilized existence is merely a way of avoiding being fully aware of yourself. Civilization is a system that brainwashes people into avoiding all truth. No civilized human wants to examine themselves. No civilized human wants to explore themselves. No civilized human wants to expand their inner awareness. No civilized human wants to expand their outer awareness.

The fact is: human civilization cannot stand to its own legal inspection and exposure. Civilization cannot afford to be exposed for what is it actually is. Civilization cannot stand open honesty to be legalized. This is one reason why all civilized justice is an abomination and a travesty. The Western Legal system of civilization forces people to become liars. It forces people to be dishonest. It forces honest people to shut up. It rewards criminals for hiding their crimes. It protects criminals and attacks honest people.

Logic and Legality

Because humans have never yet evolved properly to explore and balance their inner selves... because the accumulated pressures of civilization made external force the only practical form of controlling large masses of people: there exists a huge yawning separation between how humans should live, how they should behave, what they should do... and what they are forced to do, how they are forced to live, and how they are forced to behave inside civilization.

That enormous separated condition can be shown in civilized society as the difference between what is legal, and what is right. Within civilization, an endless number of corrupt laws, rules, regulations, edicts, mores, values, etc... exist as they are piled up, preserved, sanctified, worshipped and enforced. What your inner self tells you, what you feel is the right thing to do, has nothing to do with living in civilization and obeying its abstract insane, irrational laws. If you do not want to be attacked, vilified, ostracized, hated, outlawed, judged, sentenced, jailed, imprisoned, shot, or hung; you obey its external laws. The problem with law is that it is basically a legalized form of advantage and corruption made largely by those who have the power, wealth and status to shape, pass and enforce these laws. Once they are created, they become normal, they become an unquestioned condition of civilized existence.

Today, if a thief robs a liquor store of 100 dollars, he can be put into prison for years. But if a corporate executive manages to swindle people out of billions of dollars, he is given a slap on the wrist and allowed to go back to his fancy yachts and mansions to live in comfort and ease. Why does the law punish petty theft viciously while affording huge loopholes for the most outrageous thefts of billions of dollars to go unpunished? Legality has nothing to do with truth, or honesty, or fairness. It has no humane ethic guiding its edicts. One would think that these glaring hypocrisies and one-sided judgments of the rich over the poor would be made a major social issue. One would think that the handful of obscenely wealthy, unprincipled, corrupt criminals; would easily be overpowered by the millions of people who they stole from, and be punished so severely that such monstrous crimes of greed are never again repeated. But that does not happen because what they do is legal.

The effect of living your life by any legal standard or ethic is that by totally gutting and eviscerating personal ethics-morals-decency which people need to live by ... by throwing away all personal ethics and honesty and replacing it with "legality"; you have in essence sold your soul to the powers that be; whether you know it or not. Simply by mindlessly abiding by the civilized laws and regulations, you yourself become a party to every corruption of that system. Thoreau insisted that in order to be a conscientious citizen of any democratic state, you must practice civil disobedience. But he did not go far enough. He did not accurately analyze and trace the origin of civilized corruption: nor did he accurately analyze and describe what kind of civil disobedience is necessary to successfully fight the legalized corruption in any civilized society. Why did he not go far enough? Because he himself never practiced what he preached.. He never in his life practiced civil disobedience ever.

Before you can understand what is right, just, and fair, in order to fully understand political and legal corruption, you need to understand yourself and your own corruption. You need to understand that there actually is a logical, common-sense, practical system of values, a common code of ethics and morals that is Universal for all humans. If you do not have an understanding of what it means to be human, if you do not understand how all humans are universally meant to live-act-be; then your own humanity will be slanted, narrow, bias, non-universal. And inflicting that narrow view of humanity upon others is itself an injustice. Only when all special interests, all lobbyists, all reformers, all people who engage in voting, and being responsible citizens of their society have the same universal code of human behavior and living; will you ever get a quorum of agreement that is united in its vision, practices, and enforcement.

To begin with; you must recognize that humans are a single species, and as a single species, their genetic commonality over-arches, and outweighs every other specialized, separated, segmented form of normality... from language, to culture, to religion, to ethnicity, etc... Only when civilization is made to adhere to the genetic, biological and physical Laws of the Universe, over and above any form of legality... only then can you get a civilized society that is not in conflict with itself. In short: to arrive at a way of life that is good for all, where all can be happy, and not waste their entire lives pursuing happiness; you must outlaw legality. You must throw out the entire concept of legality. Merely because some idiot wrote something down on a piece of paper, that other idiots voted on, while other idiots enforce it: does not make it right, fair, humane or just. But for this view to be universally accepted, you need the entire human race to develop an awareness of its own humanity... and develop their inner selves to the point where they are in actual control of their own lives, their own actions, their own thoughts, their own feelings. And also, everyone must sensitize themselves to the level where they can intuit, sense, be aware of their instinctive-subconscious-conscious totality of being... to such a sensitized degree that they only practice, follow, and work at developing only the truly universal truths which exist in the Universe.

Sound impossible? All it takes is simple honesty, and simple logic. If you want to abolish legality: first compress it and simplify it. Only if you selectively go through your garage every seven years, can you keep it from becoming a pigsty of useless junk. The same principle can be applied to anything else. Accumulation for the sake of accumulation is not good, sane or healthy for households, society, police, governments or legal systems.

What if every Law ever passed could only be kept on the books and enforced for 7 years? Then any Law that proved to be unenforceable, bias, unjust, or just plain stupid; would become automatically defunct, and be automatically expunged from the record simply by being ignored. Then the masses could vote on every Law by if they agreed with it and recognized it. Then the power of Lawmakers would be so lessened in power and status: no rich wealthy corporation or individual would waste their money trying to bribe lawmakers to pass their exclusive special interest laws because they would know beforehand that the majority of the voting public would ignore their special laws. Then every person in a democratic Nation could tell these elite privileged bastards to go fuck themselves simply by ignoring their privilege-driven laws.

Then popular Laws that the majority agreed with would be faithfully renewed. And if effective Laws that made sense and actually worked were not renewed: then the experience of what happens would be a continual sharp lesson to never again neglect basic, fundamental rights and Laws. This would increase voter turnout and keep politicians focused on important issues. It would reduce, shrink and simplify the entire legal system. Then the most important laws would no longer be taken for granted. Then the Constitution would change and be repealed and amended every year. Then people would not be forced to obey old, obsolete Laws hundreds of years old.

Now... take it one step further: simplify the Laws themselves.

You should be punished according to your crime. If that crime is stealing money; then the punishment should fit the crime. What if people were jailed one day for every ten dollars they stole... with no parole... and no plea-bargaining whatsoever? What if this one Law were enforced regardless of any mitigating circumstances? Then, anyone caught stealing more than 9,000 dollars would get a life sentence. Then, nobody would dare steal more than a few dollars. Most jobs pay more than ten dollars a day. Anyone who had enough money to live on... anyone who had a decent job; would not want to steal. Then, only the truly poor and desperate would steal. Then, the risk of being caught would outweigh any possible advantage: even if they could make more money stealing than they could working.

Cuba already has such a law for any Cuban possessing black-market dollars. They are jailed one day for every dollar they possess. Cuba is almost free of petty theft because everyone is poor. That law is corruptly enforced only upon the poor, not upon the rich owners who legally possess thousands of dollars. If Cuba's law was enforced across the board regardless of how rich, or powerful the person caught with American dollars is, then it would revolutionize Cuba a million times better and more honestly than Castro ever did. Before Thailand's legal system became corrupted by money and plea-bargaining, there was no rape. Why? Because the penalty for it was public castration.

If plea-bargaining were outlawed completely; declared illegal, and made a statutory crime: many lawyers would find themselves unemployed. Why? Because they would have less leeway to manipulate the system, there would be fewer motions filed, less paperwork, less bureaucracy, less time wasted, less precious court-time wasted. There would be literally less work for them. And... horror of horrors: also less profit. Your lawyer is supposed to fight for you... and try to finagle every possible advantage, and if they cannot do that: then they invent precedents of all kinds. This keeps the judges tired, bored, angry, and disgusted with the entire system and literally forces them to make preemptory judgments based upon insufficient facts simply because both sides are trying to cover-up.... any truth, any fact, any evidence, that they think might even slightly hurt their cause. That in itself only magnifies any and all personal prejudices of each judge. Until lawyers try with all their wiles to get the right judge who is proven, and known to be personally biased in their favor.

So: the structural truth is that any competitive legal system is automatically also the also the most corrupt one. That is why no lawyer will ever allow plea-bargaining to be abolished. It makes too much money for them. Its repeal would force them to be too competent.

If, by some magical wand, plea-bargaining were declared totally unethical and illegal then the cost of the entire legal system would diminish and the number of legal-based lobbyists who were once judges or lawyers would diminish. The primary way into Power is through the legal system. If you reduce the number of lawyers and force them to become more competent: then you reduce the number of politicians while also making them more competent.

If this Ten Dollar-a-Day Law were actually enforced... if plea-bargaining were outlawed... if the entire legal system were simplified and made more effective... Then... if a thief robs a liquor store of 100 dollars, he can be put into prison not for years, but for a reasonable time that makes sense. And if a corporate executive manages to swindle people out of billions of dollars, he will no longer be given a slap on the wrist and allowed to go back to his fancy yachts and mansions to live in comfort and ease. Then, even though he will never be able to pay society back for all the untold damage he has caused, he will at least not be allowed to get away with his crimes, he will not be allowed the enjoy the reward of being a legal criminal. Then; Governments could be spend more of their budgets and time on priorities that are more useful: like education and job-creation. If Stealing a 30,000-dollar car gets you almost 80 years in prison... with no ifs, ands or buts. Then, only the truly desperate, the truly poor, or the truly sick, the truly deranged; would be crazy enough, or desperate enough to steal anything. Prisons would be filled with mentally and emotionally sick kleptomaniacs. Prisons would be filled with the poorest people. Prisons would become a social scandal, a social stigma of National Shame. The rich would become incensed at the homeless poor flouting their sacred Laws: they would scream at their legislators to rip those lazy bums out of jail and make them work.

Every progressive person would be screaming at the unfairness of that Law and pointing to the millionaires and billionaires who... somehow... Magically. never even are prosecuted for crimes of robbing people of millions of dollars. The polarization of the already existing inequities of the system would be drawn into such a sharp, unmistakably clarified contrast between what happens to poor people when they steal and what happens to rich people when they steal; that it would rip our entire society apart into warring factions that for once... Start honestly hating each other. Instead of speaking hypocritically or hypocritizing their true feelings: into politically-correct propaganda buzzwords. The whole country would rise in protest either at turning the penal system into a welfare program, or... against the rich criminals who are caught red-handed and, somehow... Magically get off scot-free.

What would happen then? Just maybe, you would find work programs sprouting up like crazy. Unemployment would be greatly reduced. Living standards would rise. The voters would demand that the government concentrate on prosecuting the largest monetary theft; not the smallest. Tax fraud would plummet. Rich people would sweat blood at the thought of doing anything even slightly fraudulent...

because if they were caught: they would serve time based purely on how much money they had stolen. Billions upon billions of dollars of stolen, swindled, wealth would remain in the economy.

Then... follow it up. If one simplification of our legal system can have such an across-the-board improvement upon all of Society... All you have to do is simplify the law to include all types of stealing. Have the idea of one, simplified Law put into other Laws where money is not involved. The more you simplify any Law, the easier it can be enforced, and the more effective it becomes. That makes getting any kind of advantage for anyone harder... Nobody likes that... yet, it also makes all people more law-abiding, equal, and benefits everyone... not just the rich.

Then...? Make it a cultural value. Make sure all liars and cheats are publicly shamed. Teach honesty by example... Who does that? Nobody. Make honesty a status symbol. Give public acclaim only to honest people, and never to liars. Reward honesty instead of punishing children when they are honest with you...

‘Did you do that...?’

‘Yes.’

‘Bad Boy! Bad Girl!’

Not: ‘Oh. Thank you for being honest and confessing your guilt.’

Honesty should be a social norm: not a rare exception.

Why is the innocent honesty of all children laughed at so much? Because people do not value their own children’s honesty. We have all been brainwashed into this obscene patronizing derogatory dismissal of our children’s honesty. That all honesty... especially the honesty of children: is something to be ignored... and laughed at. Even if we hurt them. Even when our laughter at their honesty makes them cry. The most worthless thing in the world; are the tears of children. The most worthless thing in the world is the honesty of our own children. That is how sick human civilization is

No wonder children learn how to lie. They have to learn how: or be laughed at and ignored for the rest of their mostly damaged lives. If you want to improve your society. Improve your society’s values. Improve your society’s culture. Improve your own values. Improve the way you raise your own children. Children learn by example. How many times have you ever lied knowingly to a child and smiled condescendingly while doing it...? Because you think that your child could not handle the horrible cynical truth? How many of your actions and attitudes are conflicting, false, self-deluded lies that your child learns and absorbs like a sponge? If you want society to be more honest, you have to change the honesty-level of all its members... not just the ones who get legally caught for doing illegal things. You have to develop the importance of honesty and push it onto other people... and force them unwillingly to slightly... begrudgingly; be more honest. That is no small task. Who wants to start it? One? Two people? You need a majority of people to enter willingly into this if you want to have any hope of succeeding.

If you want to eliminate the stealing of money: you need to make sure that the habit of honesty is ingrained into the cultural fabric. If, by enforcing this one Law, honesty becomes habitual, if being honest becomes so taken for granted that nobody even thinks of even trying to be dishonest... if you could do that: then you would be solving a whole host of problems, while increasing the standard of living for everyone. By actually eliminating poverty, stealing would become unthinkable.

For anything to work better: you need to simplify it. No Law is respected unless it is fair, unless it is fairly applied and enforced. If people find that they can't get around it, they will try to vote it out of existence. If the legislators hold firm long enough until the simplified Law becomes normalized, so people grudgingly begin to accept its basically fair precept: then you have enough public opinion on your side to resist any special interests who will be certain to keep persistently trying to change that simplified Law so they can enjoy the levels of wealth and corruption they were previously accustomed to. By simplifying one Law so that no matter how any Judge, Jury, Plaintiff or Defendant may try to twist that Law to their advantage, they find they cannot do so: then you get the general, over-all effect of fear and respect for an incorruptible Law. Why has this concept of simplification never even been voiced? The legislators have already laughed it out of existence... because it threaten their own privileges also. How can you expect anyone with any kind of advantage to give it up willingly? That has never happened in all civilized history. Advantage, power, wealth, status, knowledge, privilege, is fought for. People bleed for it, suffer for it, die for it, are robbed of it, and killed for it. It is never given up without a desperate, hard, bloody, dirty struggle.

Moreover... in order to effectively change civilized society by one simple Law: you need to reverse every sanctified, normalized, concept, of privilege, power, wealth, and status, that is, if you want to legislate it, enforce it, and uphold it. Only when everybody is forced to change, only when there are no exceptions, only when a Law is enforced fairly, only when everyone is affected simultaneously by a Law, only when it applied to everyone equally: can you, or will you ever get any civilized society to undergo any kind of fundamental change. You cannot change anything effectively unless everyone is forced to change at the same time: never piecemeal. Only when people realize that no matter how inconvenient or unpleasant that change may be, they are all in the same boat and all sharing the hardship of that change; can you get any civilized society to allow any fundamental change to even happen.

You will always have diehards who will never give up their sacred advantages without a fight. They will go to their graves screaming and kicking about the unfairness of not being able to steal money easily without a horrific penalty hanging over their heads if they should be caught. You will still have the corrupt police precincts, the corrupt city officials, the corrupt legislators, the corrupt lawyers, the corrupt businesses, corporations and lobbyists all screaming, and kicking at the unfairness of a fair Law. In addition, that very fairness of a truly fair Law will clearly define and reveal by polarizing our entire society; just who is one the side of fairness and who is on the side of corruption. Then bloody hell will break loose. There will be riots, marches, speeches, scandals, conflict, and debate. And then, just maybe: something will change for the better. All change is difficult... all change is unpleasant. How much do people want to change, even if it is for the better, and for the greater good? The fact is: you cannot have any legal system that is evenly and fairly enforced, unless it is simplified to the smallest possible number of Laws so the courts and police are not buried under paperwork... with all the obfuscations and regulations that slow down the process, and pervert the intentions of those Laws, and cost the tax-payers hundreds of Billions of dollars. You can actually change society for the better: if you use logic. You can start anywhere; and civilization can be systematically improved... even by enforcing one simple Law... without any complicated legality.

But that is just a fantasy. How can you actually change the legal system? There is only one avenue left that will not corrupt you along with the Lawyers who are already corrupt. There is only one Legal forum where you can actually match the rich corporation dollar-for-dollar in legal clout and muscle. There is only one legal form of justice that can actually make the corporations sit up and take notice.

And that is Class-Action Law Suits. First: the scope of a class-action lawsuit is so wide that each one goes on to define by its precedent, other Laws. If you can get the corporations to cave on your law suit:

then every other individual after that; can use your lawsuit as a precedent and sue the corporations individually without having to go through the legal hell that such a battle involves. Class-action lawsuits are usually settled out of court. But for those who want to scream loud enough: they push it to the Supreme Court. And if the Supreme Court refuses to award you a win: this does two things.

One: it reveals to the public a fairly accurate level of the legal corruption that exists as a norm in whatever unfair legality they uphold. So at least the public is not living in fantasy land believing the Law is actually there for their benefit.

Two: it becomes a huge legal advantage, which corporate lawyers will use to squash all later lawsuits against all corporations. But if they do that: then the public will at least realize that Corporations are enemies of the public good. On the other hand: if they actually are forced by public outrage and media coverage to award you the win: they set back corporate profits and give the individual a little better legal break in court. That is a bonanza for lawyers called: ambulance chasers. This forces corporations to actually change how they operate. Yet... the class-action lawsuit against breast implants eventually lost. Simply by most of the misinformation flooding the Media about breast implants being harmless brainwashed the coming generations of girls; and the actual truth about breast implants was buried in the legal archives and never broadcast to the viewing public again. Women and girls still have breast implants using a saline solution: even though they are still incredibly toxic and dangerous.

However... if the pressure is kept up: and the corporations are flooded only with class-action law-suits: then the class systems in modern societies will be more clearly defined by the polarizing issues raised by Consumers, i.e. the individual Vs. the Corporation. To define yourself as a class of people: you need to organize yourself on a grass-roots level and find every person in your Nation that has the same legal fight you have. Then you can institute a class-action lawsuit. Then you will actually begin to organize yourself as a class to defend your rights and fight for justice in the courts. The truth is simple. As long as you remain an isolated spectator in a consumer society you will have no power except the money that only corrupts you. If you organize and pull together with other people: you will have a life involving other people and a reason for living. Until poor people discover that they are a class, and until they organize together as a class. Until poor people recognize that they are a class... and organize themselves as a class... As well, or better than the upper classes, who are intent on keeping them down. They will never have a chance in hell of ever being upwardly mobile as a class. Then only one in a hundred, or one in a thousand... or only in a million will ever manage to succeed.

Modern Nations want their masses to remain powerless and apathetic. Lotteries exist for that very reason holding up one chance in a 10 million of becoming rich as a rational way of spending your money. It is a blatant scam designed to be used only by the ignorant, the addicted, the self-deluded, the hopeless, the desperate, and the poor. It is a scam for spiritually empty people: who believe that more money means more happiness. It is designed for greedy people who only want more money.

As long as poor people do not realize they are a class... then this nominal success of the exception: the one-in-a-hundred long shot, this belief in random, blind, meaningless luck rather than hard work, this addiction to lotteries, and gambling... this belief in struggling within a system which oppresses them... without tearing down that system to its roots... will keep the billions of poor: Poor forever. As long as the Authority of the Upper classes is unquestioned by the poor: they will never discover their own Authority, or their own commonality as a class.

The only thing left in American Society that still admits there is such a thing as poor, powerless people who are taken advantage of by the rich and Big Business, and Big Government is this single legal phrase that is still used in public called a class-action lawsuit. And the rich are steadily destroying that legal power every way they can. They are trying to make all 'class-action' lawsuits illegal. And they are succeeding at a breakneck speed. That is one effect modern civilization has had on people; especially the poor. They do not even know that they are involved in a life-and-death struggle of class-power, class-wealth, class standing, and class-exclusive knowledge.

Another sick one-sided aspect of civilized Law is allowing accusers to get away scot-free with lying. If an accuser accuses someone of murder: and that person is found guilty and hanged. Then if the accuser is found guilty of lying, and trying to kill an honest, innocent person: they should be hanged also... as a way of teaching people never to accuse anyone of anything unless they are willing to put their own life on the line. The idea of having some god-given right to slander, and badmouth, and attack anyone you please legally... without any danger of also being attacked yourself: is pure insanity. Once you make all legal accusers invulnerable. Then you automatically open the door to every filthy human hate-filled scum to use the legal system as a way of safely attacking someone without fear of reprisal or punishment. The trouble is; that the legal system is already so stacked against any honesty: it almost never gets to the bottom of who is actually guilty of anything. The only time such a balanced two-sided form of legality could work; is if the legal system was actually capable of exposing the truth. Which it is not.

In cases of the obvious misuse of accusing someone. The plaintiffs should have the book thrown at them: and suffer twice the penalties they demand to be visited upon the innocent. And if that means killing an accuser twice by hanging them twice... or raping a person twice for the crime of accusing someone who is innocent of rape. Then you will see a huge reduction in the number of legal actions brought into court against anyone. But only if they are made liable. Only if they are caught and punished.

Why fantasize about there being any actual justice in any justice system: when there is no justice to be had throughout civilization in the first place? To show that there is more than one way to do things. To demonstrate the fact that there are practical alternatives to the problems of civilization which nobody wants to even think of, never mind talk about or actually try.

Science and Balance

To begin with: all Science is imbalanced. All Science is fundamentally one-sided. It has been imbalanced ever since it was invented. It goes back to the practice of alchemy, and to the Greeks, all the way back to Egypt: 7,000 years ago. When Egyptian alchemists tried to invent magic potions and elixirs... to give their rulers a supposed imaginary immortality: because their fear of dying. It goes back to Egyptians and Ethiopians experimenting with chemicals... trying to preserve deified dead corpses for eternity because these deified dead rulers were terrified of their bodies rotting after they died. They could not bear to think of their physical bodies rotting away after they died because they had brainwashed themselves into believing that they were immortal. The idea of immortality originates from the fear of death. Science originated from the human fear of death. Science originated from the human obsession with death.

The history of modern Science is the history of Two Thousands years of a kind of one-sided awareness. It is a history of Two thousand years of a form of one-sided feedback. It is a history of Two Thousand years of a one-sided observation. It is a Two thousand year-old history of the one-sided form of awareness called objectivity. It is a Two thousand year-old History of how humans have turned their own awareness into a cold, unfeeling, object. We train our observer awareness to function as an objective tool. It is a Two Thousand year-old History of humans removing themselves as detached participants in their own brain functions. It is a history showing how humans have managed to mentally numb themselves into becoming observing machines... machines that merely observe.

This completely obscene, one-sided hypocrisy about Science is insane. The idea of one-sided observations. One-sided conversations. One-sided conclusions. One-sided comparisons. One-sided evaluations. This entire one-sided idea is a way of not being aware. It is a way of not being aware of yourself, your own problems, your own conditions. By detaching yourself from your own self; and becoming a detached observer.

This entire idea of Science... of looking at everything but yourself. This entire idea is a pure cold, inhuman, dehumanized, outward awareness: with no inward self-awareness whatsoever... It is the cold, inhuman selective mechanical numbness of a machine that does not feel anything human.

The origin of Modern Western Science comes from Greece, 2,750 years ago. 2,500 years ago; Aristotle said in describing the Laws of Science: 'The Laws of Science is Reason without Passion'... He was describing a state of schizophrenia, a state of mental insanity that had become normal for wealthy Greeks in Greece at that time. He was trying to rationalize and uphold this latest inhuman travesty of separating feelings from thought; and pretending that nothing had any feelings. That everything in the Universe functions only as a machine. Those animals, and humans and all living things have no feelings and no emotions. And for 2,500 years... human idiots believed him. And what is the result? What kind of Humanity did we Westerners create worshipping insane assholes like Aristotle? He was describing the insanity of a mechanized artificial world; where emotions did not exist. He was describing the modern computer. Now we have that insane fucking computer. Has it solved any human problems? Or do we need 2,500 more years of idiots believing this shit?

His insane statement worshipping reason without any passion or any emotion or any feelings... as an elite form of awareness which only elite rulers are supposed to be capable of: was, and still is: pure self-serving, rationalizing bullshit. It was, and still is: a pathetically transparent, illogical, irrational excuse that all elites in power use.

If you live at the top of a class society based upon hierarchical servitude, bondage and slavery. Then of course your slaves and servants who hate you, and fear you: will not show you any emotion. Then of course; your entire life from birth to death will be spent living in an emotionless society where all the slaves and lower classes under you carefully hide their feelings. Because the slightest show of emotion could irritate their masters. Because they could be killed if they showed what they truly felt about cold-blooded scum who oppressed and ruled them.

Every oppressor and ruler who wields the power of life and death over other people has developed this form of arrogant blindness. Aristotle's book 'The Republic'; was written as a private complaint. About the fact that he did not have enough personal power to rule his own city as he wished to. He was complaining that he did not have the mythical power a Greek God. He was complaining that he did not have enough power to force other people to live like he wanted them to live. He wanted to have absolute power over all the people beneath him. The only way he saw fit to have a democratic polis, was by him becoming an absolute Tyrant and Dictator: so he could order how everybody else should live. His hypocrisy has stood unchallenged and unquestioned for 2,750 years. Any Philosophy student can challenge his professor on this point in public. And yet, not one student has done so yet. Why? Because the only idiots who go to University to study Philosophy are the idiots who cannot think for themselves. Anybody with a brain who reads Aristotle's 'The Republic' throws it away as pure bullshit, and does not waste their time going to a University to tell Philosophy professors they are full of shit.

Aristotle's book 'The Republic' is a complete contradiction in terms. He wrote it because he saw how all the Greek city-states had destroyed themselves under the obsolete, dysfunctional system of Greek Democracy: and tried to fix it. So he tried to paste the older model of a Tyrant onto the later model of a Greek Polis ruled by an elite mob of robbers and thieves and haters. But since no sane Greek in his age would ever have suffered the old form of rule under a beneficent Tyrant to become legal again: his book was purely a wishful, fictional fantasy. The book itself is full of so many lies and cultural distortions and fantasies: it would take 200 pages to describe in detail, the destructive idiocy of his insane notions. But because it was one of the oldest books to survive Europe's Dark Age of illiteracy, as a cultural backlash from the insanity of 1,000 years of the Roman degradation and destruction, and dehumanization of humanity: it became worshipped.

Aristotle's norm-form of insanity in his fantasy book 'The Republic': formed the normality of all rulers since then. It became the basis of all modern legal Law. It also became the basis of all Mathematics. This is the original obscene concept of the essence of Western Civilization. This was where we got this shit idea of detachment from. He was the first asshole to try to claim this was actually good. Only; he wrote it as a fantasy, as a dream of a perfect model society that never existed... except in his insane, detached mind.

You can see his form of schizophrenic detachment in the insanity of all Western culture. His insanity is the insanity of detachment. He detached himself from the world he was actually living in, and imagined in his detached mind; a fairy-tale imaginary world that did not exist and will never exist. Then he claimed that his imagined fairy-tale was more true, more right, more rational, more logical, more ethical, more moral: than the actual Universe he lived-in. Every person who is mentally sick and insane suffers from this kind of detachment. They are detached from the world they actually live-in. His legacy was to make the mental insanity and sickness of detachment into a social norm; that became the standard, the height of normality; for every ruling elite in Western society for 2,300 years and counting.

Were his concepts and ideas ever changed in 2,300 years? Were his insane assumptions ever challenged or changed? Have they ever been questioned or challenged? Why has his idiotic assumption that mental detachment is better than emotional involvement never been questioned or challenged? This idiotic, one-sided, convenient bullshit... taken as holy Gospel: simply because Aristotle's books were some of the few books that survived the book burnings of the Middle Ages. Simply because the only ones who were literate were detached holy Christian Monks detached and isolated from the outer world. So of course; if a holy Christian Monk reads an old book, the book itself must be just as holy as the Bible: because the monk is holy. All old books must be sacred. Even if they detail a system that goes against the very ethics of Christianity these supposedly holy monks were supposed to believe-in, espouse, and support.

In the Middle Ages, Books were considered dangerous, and evil. The entire legacy of European misery was attributed to the secret evils contained in these ancient texts left over from the hated and despised Roman Empire. But then... the Church began preserving these ancient texts and copying them down. Not even knowing what they were copying because the copiers were illiterate themselves. And simply due to the age of these books. Simply because they were some of the oldest books known of... they became almost as sacred as the Bible.

Simply because of how old they were... regardless of what they were about. Regardless of their content. Regardless of who the author was. Regardless if they were the equivalent of a Greek comic book, or a recipe for making bread.

Do historians talk about where the roots of our Civilization come from? They harp on it incessantly. Proudly. How these sacred texts were saved. And together with the other saved texts; how these texts went on to shape European culture. Simply because the oldest saved written text happened to be written by a schizophrenic, one-sided, detached ass: who was ignored in his day ... who had once been a student of Plato... who had once known Socrates personally.

Socrates himself was a lowly stonemason; he was a nobody. Only because Plato revered him: did he become the oldest root source of modern Western Civilization. What was his great claim to wisdom? One account of him being wined and dined: by a small clique elite of his Polis. A bunch of young fools whom he humored. Which was the exact same dynamic and story of Jesus humoring his disciples; who were all young fools who did not understand one word Jesus said to them.

Plato himself was a nobody also. The only reason his book became famous was because it was the oldest book that managed to survive the book burnings of the Dark Ages. No other reason. Merely the age of the book and luck. Because of the ancientness of Plato's writings: the western idea of wisdom became idle, hypothetical examples of Plato's illogic. Pure intellectual conceit and conjectures. Not the supposed passionate honesty that Socrates died for and was respected for. Socrates passionate? He was a boring, pompous, moralizing pest. An intellectual social climber who sneered at the very class he wanted to be accepted by. A lowly stone mason, trying to use his intellect to gain respect and power and influence over the ruling class of the city he lived in. And when they spat on his superior intellectual honesty: he lost all reason for living? No. He was such an egotistical intellectual ass he could not bear to lose face socially and be disgraced by being thrown out of the city he wanted to help. Death before dishonor: the ultimate stupidity of the human ego; the ultimate intellectual egoist.

The root of modern Western civilization is a cold intellectual insanity and an intellectual stupidity because its father was an intellectually insane and stupid egomaniac. Who had no passion. Who had no feelings. Who only had logic. Unfortunately Socrates' logic was so full of shit, it would take pages to detail. He was not even a martyr. He had no cause to live for or die for except out of pique. He did not stand for anything moral or ethical. Socrates did not die for honesty. He did not die for anything. He was merely honest about certain unpleasant political facts which he refused to publicly recant. He was already an old man. He was executed in the most painless way possible simply because he was a public nuisance. He himself saw no great drama about his own death. His last comment was supposed to have been about a rooster he owed one of his workers. He exemplified the same mental sickness of detachment... to the point that he did not have any feelings or emotions about whether he lived or died. The reason he is so famous is because he was the most insanely mentally detached Greek of his Era.

Aristotle admired him because Socrates was so mentally detached from his own body and his own life: that he gave the false, lying, obscene impression of moral bravery, spiritual courage, mental courage. It is the same kind of derangement that suicidal fanatics have; who kill themselves and others for abstract religious reasons called a cause. Socrates' feat of indifference to his own death was merely a feat of mental insanity called: mental detachment. All of his better teachings have been completely ignored.

All of his worst ideas have been glorified and copied.

Because Aristotle's book: The Republic; survived the Dark Ages. Because Aristotle happened to know Plato when he was young. His idiotic elite fantasy of a snob elite ruling a perfect Greek city, with perfectly obedient submissive robots, who obey their perfect Greek God-like rulers; became an idealized social model for every elite society from then on. Every stupid idea in his book has been unsuccessfully attempted for 2,500 year by hosts of copycat mimickers. Who took his imaginary fantasy and imprinted it so deeply into the fabric of our culture that we cannot imagine a society without his fallacies and platitudes being upheld as sacred unquestioned Gospel.

Take any scientist in the world and try to have a two-sided conversation with them. You won't be able to talk to them. They are too detached from the world and from you; to make any sense. How their brains work has nothing to do with being human. None of their work makes any sense to other humans. They cannot not make any sense to themselves. The really stupid ones are so arrogant, they actually think they are the smartest people in the world. They live in their own mentally insane, sick worlds of complete mental detachment.

The fairly intelligent ones who are not completely detached from the actual world around them; are terrified that other people might find out that what they do is actually meaningless; and a complete hoax and a total scam. But even they do not know how to talk to other people normally, using ordinary words. They get easily flustered. They stick to insane imaginary lines of abstract, linear detached thought called linear logic. They cannot handle the slightest disagreement. You can tie any scientist up in knots by using their own linear logic against them so easily; that they do not dare discuss their work in public. For fear of being made fools of in public. Except with other religious believers in Science... inside the halls of their most sacred religious scientific temples.

Science develops and justifies abstract theories. How? By sanctifying them into print, before anyone is allowed to question them. All they do is make a one-sided, selective observation about something that cannot talk back to you... and cannot attack you. And then publish it in a Science Journal as a bunch of facts with no opinion, no conclusion, no understanding, no context, no nothing of what you have observed... except a bunch of one-sided data. Anyone who disagrees with you can't. Since they are not Scientists, and are not allowed to publish their findings or conclusions or opinions in scientific journals.

This way nobody can question your dead detached ideas. Do not tell anyone exactly what it is you are doing, or why you are doing it, or how you are doing it. Keep everything hidden behind the closed doors of your tiny scientific clique. Then publish it in obscure journals that nobody reads. Only people involved in your specialized mumbo jumbo will read it or question its veracity or validity. The rest of the world will ignore it because it is meaningless crap. As long as you are paid to do this: you can say that you are a scientist. And that all the rest of the world is not as scientific as you are.

Hey presto! You have just turned a bunch of meaningless one-sided observations into scientific gibberish; and you have suddenly become a scientist. Suddenly you are an elite member of an elite society. And you did not even have to socialize, or speak to anyone to do it. Now isn't this a wonderful opportunity for some of the sickest, weakest antisocial whackos to become powerful and have safe, secure, cushy jobs doing nothing? Isn't this the easiest, best, most cowardly way to institutionalize and portray the sickest inhuman humanity as the highest human good? Simply by worshipping linear logic, and the Scientific Method, as the most sacred and only way any human can arrive at any truth whatsoever. The institution of Science has become so sanctified and whitewashed by the propaganda of the Western Media that now most people actually believe that Science is humanitarian. That it is Humane. When the exact opposite is the truth.

Science is basically a sickness of mental detachment.: it is a detachment from yourself and from Life

Most humans are not mentally sick enough to become scientists because they are not mentally detached enough from reality. Has any scientist tried to do a critical analysis of themselves? Has Science ever tried to do a critical analysis of their own, hallowed, Scientific Method? The stupidity of the Scientific Method itself is so obvious, its method itself is so boringly stupid and unintelligent: that anyone with a brain can blow holes through it wider than a barn door.

Let's take a look at the Scientific Method itself.

Just how can you discover one tiny clue about how something works or why it works... and label it as an absolute fact? When you do not know how this separate, unconnected fact fits into all of the other as-yet-undiscovered facts? The fact itself is meaningless: unless you put it into a Relative context: by connecting it to as many other facts as possible. However: by discovering those connections, you automatically change your understanding of whatever fact you have already discovered. This means that if you do discover more connections, it will change your understanding of that fact. The meaning and relevance of any fact depends on its context. There is no such thing as an absolute fact.

But science, and all scientists... never even try to put their facts into a relative context. They never even try to connect their facts to other facts. They do the exact opposite. They isolate their facts into unconnected, detached, fields of bullshit called Physics, and Biology, and Organic Chemistry. Then they isolate the facts inside each of these bullshit fields of so-called knowledge even more by specializing each field into more specialized fields... into more unconnected, isolated, detached meaningless facts.

Because of the example of Science, people now use facts as if they are absolutes... without ever bothering to look into the context of those facts and what they are connected-to. Studying, investigating, and questioning the context of facts is a million times more important than the detachment of the facts themselves. But, that is exactly what all specialized knowledge, especially Science, does. It detaches facts. And uses these detached facts to prove and justify whatever they want to. That is not Scientific.

That is pure bullshit. But that is exactly what Science is: pure detached bullshit.

The real question is not how you look at any single fact: because that in itself is worthless. But how wide a context you place it into. If you refuse to do that: if you keep that fact isolated inside its specialized field of Physics or Chemistry, then you limit your own understanding of it: you become incapable of developing any wider contextual understanding. The separation of knowledge into specialized categories has permanently crippled the ability of humans to develop any greater wisdom from that knowledge. By Science abstaining from any moral-ethical issues, by spirituality abstaining from any practical-social-physical issues: both venues have become useless in teaching people how to live.

Which leaves the question: what is the point of doing a limited finite exploration of anything, if you do not bother to put it into a relevant, meaningful context? What is the point of unearthing finite segments of knowledge, when you don't try to put them together? All you get is a jumbled pile of facts, which if you use: you do so narrowly, segmentally, blindly... unaware of their consequences or repercussions. Is that intelligence? Or is it just a blind drive to use and manipulate more things with more tools?

Worshipping technology does not denote intelligence: it is merely a blind worship of tool-use.

The history of civilization is the history of tool-use: this expertise became more, and more separated, more split-up, until all the connections between things were lost... until it became irrelevant what you separated as long as you could do it to everything. This resulted in a very strange phenomena: dissociation from the outer world... or was it the other way around? Regardless of which came first, people began to develop the ability to dissociate themselves from the world they lived in. They began to develop the ability of separating things not just with their tools, but also with both their tools and their minds. This ability, this cultural re-reflection of their normality and their reality evolved into the ability to look at everything outside and inside themselves as inanimate objects, or things. This development is called objectivity. The process is simple, and every civilized human can do it. First, take a knife, and kill a frog. Then use it to cut open that dead frog. Then, take that separating line and use it in your mind: separate everything inside and outside yourself: use it to separate yourself from everything you examine, use it to separate your mental processes from your emotions, use that separating ability to feel nothing while you are killing a living animal merely to satisfy your intellectual curiosity: that is called: Science. Science is merely curiosity without emotion or feelings. It is a psychotic Split-ness of the Human Psyche. It is a schizoid, sick, insane, numb, abstracted form of mental curiosity.

All Science is based upon measurement. Without measurement, Science could not exist. But measurement is based upon abstraction and objectivity... and all objectivity is based upon one-sided separation. In order to measure anything you must create an abstract line of absolute separation. That abstract line becomes your basis of measurement. That line: ( ——— ) whether it denotes a value, a number, a position, a separation, a connection, or whatever: cuts off everything else off from what you are measuring, focusing-on, evaluating or comparing. And by doing that: the line itself, the measurement itself; prevents you from using that measurement in any larger contextual framework. That is the fundamental fallacy and limitation of any kind of measurement. All measurement prevents any greater understanding of what you are measuring. So: if measuring anything automatically prevents you from understanding it better: then why measure it?

Yet, Science is based on the assumption that by measuring something, you can understand it better, when the exact opposite is true. In order to hide this obvious fact: scientists have couched their ramblings in arcane, complex, mysterious gibberish, that even they cannot explain to their own fellow scientists... simply to keep their sacred, specialized knowledge from being exposed as a complete fraud. What is so incredibly amazing, is that today: all modern scientists have been literally forced to conclude by the evidence of their own measurements that our Universe is Actually Infinite... not only in size, but in everything in it is Infinitely Large. Everything in it is Infinitely Small. It is Infinitely Interconnected to Itself. It is Infinitely Dynamically Balanced. And it is Infinitely Relative to Itself.

Yet, scientists still go on, trying to measure that Infinity. They still use two, weird, non-relative, absolute, unchanging constants to measure it with. Why? Because Einstein mistakenly used them almost a century ago. Even though everybody in the scientific community knows full well that they are a complete joke... that they are merely a convention that institutionalized scientific organizations have ordained as gospel.

Einstein proved almost a century ago that everything in the Universe is relative to everything else. But he was faced with the basic Triality of the Universe, and the classic problem of three moving bodies: You can only measure the speed and direction of one body if you have two fixed, immovable constants, or reference points to measure it by. If you have only one point of reference, then you lose all depth perception because you have no second reference-point, or constant to triangulate your measurement with. And, if you do not know how far away the two bodies are; then how can determine what speed they are actually going? If you have no fixed point, or constant to use... if all three bodies are in motion relative to each other. Which happens to be the case for literally everything in our Universe with no exceptions. Then you cannot measure anything at all absolutely... or accurately. Because you will never be able to determine which body is moving at which speed, and in which direction; since you have no universal fixed point to measure it by unless you imagine one. That is... unless you create an imaginary one out of the figments of your own mind, and arbitrarily decide that this imaginary something is absolute.

This principle exists in all scientific formulas and all mathematical equations. You cannot find out any unknown in any equation unless you have two absolutes, or known values to compare the third unknown value-to. So: in order to prove his Theory of Relativity scientifically: Einstein had to use two unchanging, invariable, absolute constants. The constants he chose to prove his Theory of Relativity was: the speed of light, and something called the mass of that light.

That triangulation of distance is crucial. It allows a person to compare and evaluate both the distance and speed of a moving object from two different vantage points. We are animals with two eyes: two supposed unchanging constants which gives us stereoscopic vision. But even our own eyes can easily fool us. Which only goes to prove Einstein's Relativity Theory is actually true.

The problem with civilized human awareness is that we only use one perspective: that of our conscious tool-brain. We do not compare and evaluate our conscious awareness to, and with our instinctive or to, with, and to our subconscious awareness. When you use all three in a Dynamic Balance, the result is an expanding awareness of Pure Wonder.

Now ask yourself: how can literally everything in this Infinite Universe, that is Infinitely Interconnected, and Infinitely Dynamically Balanced, and Infinitely Relative to Everything Else: have by some coincidence...two, weird exceptions called constants to its own Infinite Relativity...? And that these two sole exceptions to the Universal conditions of the Universe just happen to be the ones discovered in the last two centuries by Scientists... who did not know that they were the only two constants where relativity did not apply? Since relativity had not yet been discovered yet when they discovered them? Talk about coincidence.

The speed of light, and mass were only recently discovered. They were discovered by scientists using other constants, which have since been disproved and junked. How can you separate two new constants from the Universe, and magically turn them into absolutes in order to prove that everything else in the Universe is relative?... When you do not even know what the hell these two things called constants are?

It makes no sense. Why is it that after Einstein proved scientifically to all the world: that everything in the Universe is Relative: ... literally everyone, including himself, and all his fellow Scientists: blithely ignored his amazing discovery, and went on using absolute constants as if nothing had happened.

And what are these two holy Constants. Why are they so sacred? They are holy and sacred because they are unknown mysteries. No scientist to this day can explain what Light, or Mass actually is. Light seems to be able to travel unchanged indefinitely in Space; and the instant it encounters anything in its path, it slows down and transforms itself. All plants live off Light coming from our Sun. Most of the solid matter created by plants comes from Light-Energy being transformed into organic material. If you took all of the clippings from your lawn: their weight would exceed the weight of the water and soil they are supposedly made of... by over a hundred-fold. Scientists still do not understand how plants do this. They cannot prove that the speed of Light is actually a Constant. This is merely: a convenient assumption: a given... used, so scientists can measure things by it.

What about this Mass? The unfortunate thing about mass is; that scientists can't find it. They don't even know what it is: never mind where it is.... They are searching for it as I write this book; and desperately hoping that it actually exists inside one of the subatomic particles they have managed to discover. Because if it doesn't exist inside any of their subatomic particles: then they will have to throw away literally all of their scientific theories. They will have to publicly admit that their theories were not only all wrong... but that their measurements were wrong also. They will have to admit that every equation ever used in mathematics, in technology, in Physics, in Astronomy, in Biology, in Particle Physics is wrong... They will have to admit that all Science, all mathematics, all measurement is based upon a lie... the lie of Constants, the lie of the absolute, the lie of abstraction, the lie of objectivity, the lie of dissociation, the lie of one-sided separation.

The same applies to the speed of Light. If Science finds that this is not a Constant; then their entire pack of theoretical cards will come crashing down, and they will have to invent some new Constant to use and sanctify. Either that, or they will have to declare all measurements are uncertain and general... and throw away all of their expensive cyclotrons and laboratories. They will have to give up all of their government grants, all of their University professorships, all of their comfortable desk jobs, all of their safe, secure careers and jobs. They will no longer be able to make sacred pronouncements that the public swallows blindly. They will no longer be worth listening to. No government will give them access to trillions of dollars to waste in pointless experiments. Governments will no longer trust anything they say, or claim... because their integrity will be destroyed. They will have no status, no fame, no wealth... because all of their supposed knowledge will have been exposed to be a complete fraud. And their scientific abstract reality will come crashing to the ground... And our new-fangled science will join all of the other superstitious realities of the old alchemy sorcerers... along with the superstitious realities of the old witch doctors, the superstitious realities of the old medicine men, the old prophets, the old wizards, the old gurus, the old sages... With a few specks of truth in it just enough to make it mildly interesting.

The entire semantic use of the word: Constant by Science, and scientists is a garbled hoax. Planck's famous Constant' is not a Constant at all... it is merely a relative, fractional equivalent... as any scientist will confess, if pressed. That is... only if they decide to be honest about it. The entire usage of Constants, the use of mass, momentum, the speed of light, is one long series of semantic lies and hoaxes. Now there are new hoaxes being invented on top of the old ones:... First there is the idiocy of calling Time a fourth dimension... when it is only the third, not the fourth. Then there is hyperspace, ten dimensions, eleven dimensions, string theory, membrane theory, etc... All of them based upon a semantic trick of calling something a constant... regarding and using every fractional equivalent as if it were a Universal Constant. Which every competent scientist knows damn well that is not the case. If you ask them about it they will just laugh at you... and ignore you because you are not holding the purse strings to their funding... But ask a scientist that has nothing to lose from being intellectually honest with you, and you will go away so shocked and angry that you will start a committee to publicize the truth to all the Media. But will they use your story? Never. Because they dare not use anything that has not been scientifically sanctified by the scientific community... and your truths will gather dust like all the other truths that gathered dust because it was not expedient to release them to the public by the powers that be.

The fact that there is no such thing as an absolute anything, or any such thing as an absolute constant; is not deemed relevant to peoples lives. The fact that all absolute constants originate from the idea of absolute separation is not thought to be important to people's lives. Yet, it is a crucial truth which all humans need to understand. And that truth is:

Whatever you take for granted as Normal, you become a victim-of. Whatever you accept unquestioningly as being Constant... Absolute... Sacred... Traditional... is precisely what you become a victim-of. .

Today in modern civilization, billions of people have become victims of Science. Science has managed to poison the idea of questioning itself into a dead, boring mechanical drudgery; and has successfully killed all questioning itself. Scientific questioning is a dead kind of questioning. It is a sick, inhuman kind of questioning: done without any Sense of Pure Wonder. Done without trying to connect anything together and make sense out of it.. People accept its insane dead ideas and practices of Science without questioning them at all... They accept everything that is civilized without questioning it at all. The result? The effect of civilization upon Humans is turning 6 billion people into victims of Science, victims of everything they take for granted. Turning 6 billion people into victims of Technology. Turning 6 billion people into victims of Progress. All because they take it for granted, and do not question it. Why is progress evil? Because it refuses to learn from the past. Because it refuses to look back. It only looks forwards. It is the blind stupid hope that tomorrow will be better than yesterday. When the exact opposite of all energy is true. Yesterday was better than tomorrow. The older Energy gets: the weaker it becomes.

There is no absolute point of separation where the root of a tree becomes its trunk, or where its trunk becomes a branch, or a branch becomes a leaf. In the Actual Universe, there is no such thing as an absolute separation. There is no absolute point that you can find to differentiate between anything. The energy flow involved in living organisms is far too complex, subtle, and interconnected for us to ever be able to fully understand and explain by purely mechanical measurement. The better our mechanical measurement becomes, the more kinds of energies and more levels of energies we find, and the more connections we find between them.

Another huge hoax and lie about Science is it's exactness of measurement... be it Time, distance, size, weight, Space, Volume, Power, Energy, etc... This is all a fractional sleight-of-hand that is done in many ways... and people are not only taken in by it, they want to be taken in by it. The want to believe in the magical absolute exactness of Science. It is one of the biggest, the worst and the most destructive lies that Science has ever come up with. All the civilized world uses this lie every day in countless ways. Literally everything that is measured scientifically, or precisely, or exactly is a total hoax and a lie.

The only reason anything seems exact or precise, is because people use machines and tools to produce similar objects, with similar materials so well, that you cannot see the actual diversity and rough, non-exact variation with your naked eye. Tools try to destroy diversity as much as possible. They try to make things as identically as possible. They never succeed. All they can do is destroy that diversity so much that you cannot see it with your naked eye. That is all. That is why the concept of identity is pure bullshit.

The fallacy of all Science is blatantly obvious: measurement is finite... Science is finite. It attempts to measure something that is Infinite... and always comes up with the wrong answers, the wrong conclusions and the wrong theories. Science is simply mechanically measured phenomenon trying to justify and explain a mechanical model of existence. A dipping into the infinite reservoir of knowledge, which is part-of the infinite Universe... and then by some strange alchemy, deeming the knowledge garnered from that bottomless well as being finite and totally separate from that Infinity. But that is a poor, inadequate basis for the understanding of anything. That is why any mathematical model of the actual universe is hopelessly inadequate. Trying to explain the Universe only in terms of mechanical measurement is one of the fundamental fallacies of all Science. The worship of measurement, or the worship of exactness, is basically the worship of the concept of the absolute. The popular phrase of being exactly right means that there is absolutely no error. Of course there is no such thing. There are merely different kinds of general agreement to things that we perceive as being generally true. But since human perception itself is not infinite in nature, except its sense of pure wonder, and since there is no such thing as an absolute except as an abstract concept: the idea of being exactly right is absurd. The only reason Science works and can be used by humans is not because of its exactness, but because of the general principle of dynamic balance. All functioning Science or what we call technology works only because the scientific equations that are employed happen to balance generally.

But Science does not use these equations to balance anything. That is the primal sin of all human technology. By discovering and taking out-of-context some of the infinite examples of dynamic balance in the Universe, Science and technology uses these balanced equations to create an imbalance... where there never was before. A classic example is the equation for Electricity:  $E=IR$  That is a balanced equation. But technology only uses this equation to create a massive disparity of imbalanced electrons, and then uses this imbalance to create power. All one-sided separation results in imbalance: which in turn results in power...

More specifically: destructive power. All imbalanced power is destructive. The only way humans can obtain power is through the creation of imbalance, not balance. So: separation with no connection, imbalance, destructive power; are all part of the same process, are all the same thing. The most obvious example of this is the splitting of the atom. The only thing humans can do with any natural dynamic balance that is not destructive is to leave it alone; which goes against all human training as tool-users. To a civilized human, any natural dynamic balance is useless, valueless; unless humans can unbalance it and thereby create power, or some kind of advantage.

Modern Science is based upon the Greek tradition of objectified, emotionless, schizoid one-sided, numb, non-feeling scientific inquiry. Where and when was the birth of Western Civilization? When true Science was born in Greece over 2,000 years ago. What were Archimedes's most famous discoveries? The dynamics of mechanical advantage... the dynamic of the lever, the dynamic of the screw. Mechanical advantage became sanctified over 2,000 years ago by the Greeks; who used it mainly to invent better and more powerful instruments of War. The Romans used these dynamics of mechanical advantage even better... to create an Empire based upon conquest, oppression, plunder, and stealing all kinds of wealth...

History books fawn upon this... and admire it. But no historian has never critically examined just how the Romans became so powerful. One aspect about Roman culture that is interesting, is their incredibly expedient use of all sacred customs, traditions and religions. They never believed in anything except what they wanted to believe-in at the moment. Which is exactly the case in today's modern world. But the one thing Romans always worshipped and revered was advantage. Any kind of advantage. Western Civilization is built on over 2,500 years of people trying to find for their own self-gratification, some kind of mechanical advantage... over others, over Nature, over almost anything.

The religion of mechanical advantage has existed unquestioned, unexamined, uncomparing for all this time. Mechanical advantage is merely an imbalance created by a tool in order to make something mechanically easier for humans. It is a religion of the advantages of mechanical power; which has been blindly worshipped ever since civilization began over 10,000 years ago. Tools that have a mechanical advantage are used mostly to cut, pound, flatten, pulverize, bend, turn, twist something that could not be done by your hands alone. Mechanical advantage is the Godhead of all civilized destructiveness, all civilized power, all civilized oppression. It is also the unspoken religion of Science. The endless evil and destruction that tools and machines create by becoming more powerful is merely the ongoing evolution of the religion of mechanical advantage. All human ease, all modern technology is based upon developing every possible kind of dead mechanical advantage as opposed to developing any kind of living human advantage. Rather than develop our ability to love and laugh: we only develop our tool-brain to get some kind of mechanical advantage.

There is no way to escape the obviousness of this truth. The short-lived 10,000 year-old phenomenon of civilization is based upon developing and manipulating all kinds of imbalances. The dynamic of accumulation, or Imbalanced Splitness: can be seen in cancer cells: because they never stop splitting-accumulating. The exact same dynamic of one-sided accumulation, or Imbalanced Splitness of civilization; makes it a cancerous growth that destroys everything else around it and in it. To expect a human to live a balanced existence inside the context of civilization is a contradiction in terms. Any balance humans practice inside civilization is ultimately out-of-context, segmental and unconnected to the ecosystem they live in. Any balance humans practice inside the Imbalanced Splitness of civilization is out of balance.

Science has already proven that the effect of observation itself prevents any possible absolute objectivity. In trying to observe subatomic particles, the effect of the observation itself upon what we observe, becomes magnified to the point where we really do not know what we are actually observing, so we can only make inspired guesses as to the actual nature of what it is that we are looking at. The result is: the nature of the observation affects the nature of the properties which are observed. This tells us that we are looking at, or observing phenomenon in the wrong way: that all scientific objectivity is a fraud. But... if we are looking at phenomenon in the wrong way: in what manner should we observe them? In what context?

This question is an open field of speculation-exploration-experimentation-mystery-discovery-wonder. Are we using the wrong tools? Or the wrong process? Or the wrong goals? Or the wrong assumptions? Or the wrong attitude? Or the wrong kind of awareness? Are we asking the wrong questions? Are we looking in the wrong places? What are the questions that we should ask? In what way? Science is only a methodical form of curiosity. If you take scientific exploration out of its narrow context, you end up with the same question I have been asking throughout this book. What should we be looking at? What should we spend our lives doing? How should we live? Staring at quarks? Or trying to raise our children better? Should we spend more time using tools, or trying to become more human?

All humans can do is intuit the nature of the Universe by what little evidence around them they are capable of sensing. Science has discovered that the Universe is non-identical simply by the power of magnification. Whatever may look the same from a lesser magnification is always revealed to be different when more closely examined. Why is every snowflake, every grain of sand unique? Surely once you get down to the smallest-simplest of phenomenon; there must be some mathematical chance of a phenomenon repeating itself? But that is not the case. Why? How can the smallest-simplest phenomenon be non-identical? If the Universe were finite, then we should be able to reach some absolute-finite limit to how small or how large it is. If for instance, the smallest thing in existence were quarks: then all quarks would have to be absolutely identical to each other. They could not possess any differentiating characteristics because there could be no smaller characteristics to differentiate them by in the first place. If that were true, then each proton would be identical to every other proton, each atom would be identical to every other similarly structured atom, every molecule would be identical to every other similarly structured molecule, and so on... But that is not true...

This simple scientific fact has been overlooked and not noted. This simple little fact is not considered meaningful. Yet this simple fact destroys all modern civilized values. It makes the entire concept of trying to duplicate anything not only absurd, meaningless, pointless... but it reveals why the more mass-production we have, the more boring our lives become, the more meaningless they become.

This means that the Universe is not only actually Infinite in how large it is; it is also Infinite in how small it is. But Science is based upon finite measurement; all that science can do is measure general, limited, similarities and dissimilarities by ignoring whatever contextual uniqueness it is looking at. The very act of measuring anything finitely automatically discounts the context of Actual Infinity, which it is observing. As far as everyday Science is concerned: Actual Infinity does not even exist....

Except admitting that the Universe actually is Infinite as a general truth: and then never applying, or using, or including this scientific truth in anything which it does scientifically. It does so for a very good reason. If Science were to admit that what it was trying to observe is Actually Infinite: it would have to throw up its hands and admit that there is no possible way of accurately measuring anything in its true context: because the context that everything exists in is unmeasurable. And then where would Science be? Voluntarily admitting the futility of its own endeavor? What scientist would freely admit that? That the attempt to find the smallest particle is just a finite attempt to measure Infinity? That the attempt to explore the largest possible volume of space is just a finite attempt to measure Infinity?

In this context: the very idea of measurement itself becomes absurd. Why? Because measurement itself is meaningless unless put into its proper relative context and connected into a relevant format. Mechanical Measurement cannot span the connective relevancy between finiteness and Infinity; only Pure Wonder can do that. The best any measurement can do is measure things roughly, generally... and unless you put that comparative measurement into a larger context, it is still useless. And unless you put that measurement into the widest context possible, you will be excluding what is crucially relevant to your general, rough initial measurement.

Science cannot put its knowledge into any relevant human context: it merely puts it into a mechanical context, which has almost no human relevancy. The only conclusion that can be drawn from Science, is that the more it tries to contextually connect what it observes: the more it finds that what is observing is Infinitely Complex, Infinitely Interconnected and Infinitely Creative. The trouble with Science is that whatever it cannot measure, it deems worthless... and since it cannot measure life or living things; they become worthless.

All Science can do is explore and discover how the Universe works-balances: dynamically-generally in a mechanical fashion. But that is totally self-serving since science is mechanical, tool-based, specialized and finite. As a result the only kind of model it can formulate or hypothesize is a finite mechanical one. This is fine if you are a machine... but not if you are a human. The models of Science are horrible distortions of Actuality.... They are a total distortion of how the Universe actually works. Science is a repulsive, mechanical distortion of the Actual Universe. Most people have a very understandable, instinctive revulsion towards Science... simply because they have not managed to objectify their own level of awareness to the dehumanized, abstract level of a scientist.

By removing all of the infinite diversity-creativity-beauty-uniqueness of the Universe, by removing the fact that the Universe is Actually Infinite: Science is essentially propagating a huge lie and selling that lie to the rest of humanity. The lie of finite-mechanical-dehumanized-identity. This distorted view has evolved simply because we choose to worship our own tools. Science is merely a form of tool worship. What does this mean? It means that if you worship Science; you are a worshipper of your own tools: and you will become a victim of your own tools.. You will come to believe unquestioningly in the power of your own tools. You will believe that all tools are good, not evil. Your answer to any human problem will be just more tool-use. You will become a victim of your own beliefs, your own myths. Yet all civilized societies glorify their own Myths and praise people for believing in them... while staring in disbelief at the insane Myths and beliefs of other civilized societies.

Any belief that is false and can be proven false if you are honest and logical: is a destructive negative belief. Any belief that is based upon an absolute is a false, destructive negative belief. Any belief that is proven true if you are honest and logical, is a constructive positive belief. All negative beliefs have irrational, illogical, conflicting absolute answers. All positive beliefs have rational, sane, balanced, harmonious relative answers.

Negative believers are envied because they do not have to doubt or question anything. All they have to do is: believe, and suddenly... they have all the answers. Suddenly their life gets better, their stress levels go down and they feel much better. Civilization is based upon negative belief systems. Take away those negative beliefs and what is left? Only positive beliefs... only proven, practical beliefs that actually work. Only what is actually better, healthier, saner, more rational, more loving, more honest, more courageous is left. But these positive beliefs have no absolute answers. If you use positive beliefs: you have to work at finding your own answer to anything. That is hard. Time consuming... difficult. People would much rather have their answers given to them. Rather than go through the long arduous process of thinking out everything through for themselves, they prefer others to do their thinking for them. The effect of ease... not wanting to think critically, or feel critically, or have a sense of Pure Wonder about anything is how and why Science has gotten away with murder for two thousand years. That is just one effect civilization has had: the inability to think critically and honestly about anything.

What should humans worship?

Their own tools?
Or the dead products of their own tools?
Should we worship our own creativity?
Or the dead products that creativity?
None of this makes any logical sense.

If the Universe is infinitely creative, then what aspect of its creativity should we worship? Our own creativity, or the creativity of the entire Universe? Humans are merely one tiny by-product of that Infinite Creativity. Are we arrogant enough to think ourselves superior to that which created us? Why? Because we are more connected to our own creativity than the creativity of the Universe? Because our own creativity outdistances all other creations including the creation of ourselves and the creation of the Universe? As tools outdistance those who make them? How can a by-product of Infinite Creativity; deem itself to be more creative than that which created it? It just doesn't make sense. But since human reality is almost completely reflective, we remain comfortably blind to the absurdity of our own value systems and the insane notions that are religiously upheld and assumed unquestioningly under the term called: Science.

The only things that can be effectively worshipped are the things we do not understand. Once we understand something, we cannot worship it any longer because it has lost its mystique of the unknown. In earlier cultures, people worshipped and believed all kinds of things that they did not understand: fire, mountains, animals, the sky, amulets, magic potions, witch doctors, spells, omens, prophets, spirits, dead people, rulers, images, Gods, statues of gods, the priests who represented these gods on earth, visions, prophecies, relics, tombs... today we worship what we do not understand: our own technology. Worshipping is a way of preserving ignorance. Belief is a form of pure ignorance. It is a refusal to understand. It is an attempt to preserve mystery and the unknown by refusing to question or explore something.

The second you started worshipping anything; you lose all perspective on yourself and what you are worshipping. All worship is actually a distorted pyramidal sense of Wonder. The real reason why scientists will never understand the true nature of subatomic particles is because they are looking at them too closely. But no scientist wants to admit this. Do we have to spend the next thousand years staring at subatomic particles before we realize that there is no end to the smallness of the universe? Why should we explore a mystery only because of its physical size? When will we realize that the mystery of a quark is no different from all of the other mysteries that we have yet to uncover? Should only a select few be allowed to delve into these mechanical mysteries of Science? Or should we build a cyclotron for every child? Why must we only explore mechanical mysteries and not human ones?

Why not explore mysteries that are more directly relevant to us? Mysteries that are more meaningful, and more accessible. Like: why are people unhappy. Why are people starving? Why are people oppressed? Staring at quarks does not solve unhappiness; nor does it help heal human suffering. What sense is there in spending millions, even trillions of dollars trying to find new astronomical objects, new energy particles, new chemicals, new gadgets: when humans are unable to find happiness or love? Human problems cannot be solved by technology: technology can only solve mechanical problems. But Science sells the obscene lie that it's technology can actually discover things that can be used to make human lives mechanically better. And so it does. It makes the life of the high-paid astronaut mechanically better. By sucking millions of man-hours of labor from thousands of other workers just to create his exclusive, elitist advantage.

The problem with all over-intensive tool use is that it automatically creates all kinds of inequality and inequity among humans. You simply cannot supply intensive care for all of the premature babies born into this world. There are not enough hospitals, not enough intensive care units, and not enough trained staff. There is not enough money for it. Just as there is not enough money in the world for everyone to own a car. When people start to use tools in too concentrated a fashion: then who owns a car and who doesn't... Whose baby lives and whose baby dies, becomes a question of class, geography, wealth, luck, timing, and all of the other arbitrary factors which people living inside civilization have no control over. Then there is the question of why are more babies being born prematurely in the first place. Is it because of pollution? The toxic residues in our food and environment? Stress? Our industrialized, unhealthy, sedentary lifestyles?

The act of birth is literally the cutting-off point where we are separated from our instinctual, instinctive past. Having a miscarriage is the body's last instinctive way of controlling and regulating which babies are ready to be born, and which are not. Now: over-intensive tool-use is seeking to replace the instinctive decisions of our own bodies. We are seeking to control and manipulate our own instinctive balances and functions at the cellular level... even at the level of our DNA. What are the motives for this? Fear of death, power, arrogance, self-gratification, ego, the insulated separateness of the self. Rather than just living; we are continually trying to conquer death. If people were not afraid of dying; then none of this ridiculous technology would exist.

But no abstract human value system can rationalize the arbitrary giving and taking of life; because these abstract values are all unconnected to each other: they are all segmented. To hold all human life sacrosanct and not allow abortion makes no sense when we destroy all other forms of life. If you want to hold life sacred and do it sanely: you cannot compartmentalize your values, or your rationalizations, or your actions. But the root issue of life-value, and what value life itself has... and why humans treat other life forms as being worthless, is never discussed or debated. For an obvious reason: because there is no sane, logical justification for these values. They simply make no sense.

Throughout history, the over-intensive use of tools has been the hallmark of every privileged class. It signifies the basic human inequity where one person acquires more human life energy from others than they bestow upon others. It is a straightforward exchange of human life translated into time, energy, effort, skill, and training. When one person enjoys the benefits of other human lives, in thousands, if not millions of man-hrs: they have effectively stolen that time, that life-energy from other human beings... they in effect have stolen the lives of those people who serve them and work for them; who otherwise could have used all of those wasted, unrecompensed years to live their own lives, follow their own dreams, raise their own families, spend time with their own children... and enjoy the fruits of their own labors: instead of a few, rich, privileged elite enjoying the fruits of thousands of laborers who work for them and not for themselves. It makes no difference what names you assign to the players: pharaohs, kings, nobles, gentry, astronauts, bankers, billionaires, landowners, executives, stockholders... or subjects, slaves, peasants, subjects, laborers, workers, taxpayers, customers, consumers, artisans... the basic inequity of the system is the same.

A major reason Science has no actual human relevancy, is because it refuses to connect its information to human concerns. Its only interest is mechanically measuring something: the world of the machine. Science tries to keep its mechanical world pristine and free of all human emotional involvement, values and ideas. By removing all ethics and morals from knowledge, this knowledge becomes an amoral prostitute to be sold to the highest bidder. The result is information which is for all intents and purposes humanly useless: except as it pertains to tool-use: technology. This schizoid split can be seen in all fields of Science.

Until you have the unbelievable statement made by an anthropologist studying stone-age tribes in the Amazon jungle, that:

‘Reciprocity and generosity are important in all cultures.’

Because for him: these attributes stand out as important values in the stone-age culture he was studying.

Yet this same anthropologist does not have the wherewithal to connect this statement to his own culture, or to himself. His job of studying these people gives him an income. He does not perform this study to be generous or reciprocate anything. He makes a tidy sum of profit from his studies on these cultures. If he were not paid money for his endeavor, he would not be there in the first place. How can an anthropologist study attributes that are lacking in his own culture? This anthropologist does not make the obvious connection that he comes from a global economy based upon profit and not generosity or reciprocity. If the university funding his work were to change its values to that of a stone age culture, it would go bankrupt and there would be no money to pay the anthropologist.

So: what is the purpose of studying how generosity and reciprocity work in a stone age culture... when that information is never used or applied to your own culture? His observations become worthless and irrelevant: simply because Science does not choose to connect this information morally, ethically, culturally or humanly. What use is any information, when you do not connect it to yourself and your own culture? Unless the only reason for acquiring that knowledge is to get an advantage or make a profit? What good is it to scientifically observe something and do nothing about it? What good is it to observe something and feel nothing...? So you make no connections, no sense, no understanding of what you observe...? Somebody explain this to me: I do not understand.

There is a famous research experiment in Germany called: Biosphere. Where some of the most famous scientists got together and in their Scientific arrogance and blindness: claimed that they would, and could: successfully erect a completely insulated natural eco-system; sealed-off from the rest of the Planet That this Biosphere would hopefully function by itself... independent of the Earth-energy it exists inside, and on...

Like no Gravity? No Sunlight? No Water? No Earth? No Plants? No Animals? No Living Organisms? No. All that was stolen from other places, and put into this exclusive sealed huge bunch of super-expensive buildings... Why did they perpetrate this colossally expensive experiment?

Because they already knew that Science was destroying the Earth. They were thinking ahead. Thinking that even if they destroyed the entire planet, they could still get away with it; by stealing enough things from Nature; and erecting a civilized insulated bubble of walled buildings to live-in. As a 100% insulated natural eco-system. Where humans could still survive, even after all the rest of the Earth was too poisoned by Science to live-in and-on.

There are so many semantic levels of instinctive-subconscious-conscious selective irrational lies and self delusions in their logic of how they evolved their insane notions, and their official semantic scientific code-words and terms... it would take a thousand books to fully describe the pure idiocy of the process and formation of the project itself. Anyways, the experiment failed. It failed in so many ways, and so badly. They had so much egg on their faces after their first arrogant media announcement... that this huge project had to change it's stated goals.

Instead of announcing that the experiment was indeed a failure. They simply managed not to bother to make that media announcement... With the coincidence of not losing their 100's of millions of dollars of funding. And also not having to face the public jeers and laughter of public shame. This taught all future Science projects around the World to never state their goals in public beforehand. So if they failed, they would not suffer the biosphere's terrible media P-R problems. Now wasn't that a convenient way to keep it going? Try to destroy a high-level elite bureaucracy and power-structure once it has found its sources of secret funding and power? It will fight and kick and kill and lie and scream against its own demise

And... what was a crucial part of the basic failure?

A small species somehow sneaked into the experiment. Nobody knew quite how it got in. Inside the cracks of a tree, or under a leaf. Anyways, this tiny, insignificant species went about slowly eating up all the other animal's eggs. And systematically killed and destroyed all the other living species that had any eggs to be eaten. Guaranteeing that most of the species in the Biosphere' would die out, go extinct and slowly turned the inner shell of this huge Biosphere' into a dead desert.

Oops. I forgot. This huge set of greenhouse buildings was powered by huge amounts of electric power. Running in from the outside. With huge complicated pipes and hydraulic pumps. Just to balance the air every morning. Because that warming air which had never been planned for; threatened to burst all the airtight buildings. The buildings were too absolutely separated from the rest of the world. They were too rigid.. So, they had to build a huge tunnel leading into a breathable flexible air-easer building: that kept the morning sun from destroying the entire project.

Then they found that there was too much Co2 being created. Not enough plants were eating that byproduct. Because they did not have a convenient appending Biosphere' ocean to absorb it... oops. So, they fought day and night in a state of continual crisis just to try and handle the Co2 levels in the atmosphere. Then they found there was too much living matter being created. They were forced to dump the extra organic material out of that insulated, absolutely sealed set of Biosphere buildings. Oops. An entire scientific experiment down the drain. The entire myth-culture and set of superstitions based upon the human assumptions of scarcity was faced with the practical hard-nosed evidence that all Nature functions on a basis of abundance and works on the basis of over-abundance. Not scarcity. Oops.

Any biologist can selectively spout this fact about abundance. But somehow, these scientists never seem to include this little truism in their actual experiments. Nor do Scientists ever scientifically explore exactly how and why this inconvenient fact which they never account for in their experiments happens to be so.

So... Their entire set of scientific goals were cancelled. They had been forced to build, and rebuild, and revamp that set of obscenely expensive exclusive Biosphere' buildings so often: that they ran out of money.

Oops. The natural cultures of over-abundance of the Earth ecosystems slams into the artificial civilized culture of money-scarcity. Which all good-intentioned humans selectively choose to remain unaware of as well. The fact of the matter is that the Earth is actually an single, indivisible, interconnected working system. That if we kill and destroy this Earth... there is no way that we are somehow going to survive. Something Scientists love to pay lip service-to, but ignore completely in their own experiments, and in their own lives.

These Scientists have still not faced or realized what that insane experiment showed them. That the artificial destructive system called Science, or Technology, or Civilization... cannot co-exist with any natural ecosystems. Civilization cannot exist on this Earth without killing it.

The only way civilization can exist, is by civilization killing the Earth. As long as civilization is stronger than Nature it will kill Nature. As long as civilized mechanized humans build machines; they will kill all living things that are not machines.

Another reason... a tiny flaw in the entire system of the Biosphere that killed the experiment dead; was because of a species that should never have been let in. What was this forbidden evil species? That destroyed this experiment because the humans themselves in the biosphere could not kill it even after they identified it??

It was a common garden ant. What did that innocent ant species do? It took up the role that was missing in this attempt to replicate the macrocosmic ecosystems of the Earth in the microcosm of these sealed buildings. It took up the function which was missing in this micro-cost of the earth. It took up the role of humans. In case you do not know: the only species in the animal Kingdom whose survival tactics are based upon species specialization, and the one species that mirrors the scavenger-diet of the original walking apes who were our ancestors is the common ant. They were the ones we supplanted; when we began stealing their marrow from them. And because we ate their food. We have all been turned into human ants. That is how connected, and unavoidable the consequences of energy-displacement are. You become what you eat. And if you steal the food of another species that had a better right to that food: you become them also.

Why did the common ant become the killer of the entire experiment, and killed all the other living things inside that Biosphere? Because inside the Biosphere... humans were not doing their usual, rationalized, normal destructive ant-function of killing everything they could lay their hands on.. Which is what ants do in Nature: except they are balanced by natural predators which the idiots forgot to include. In fact these human scientists ended up as visitors to the Biosphere they had originally planned to live-in.. They were not fulfilling their usual life-role inside it. They were fulfilling their role as wasters and destroyers outside; in the outer world... as destructive animals in the context of the greater context of the earth. Wasting millions of man-dollars on a meaningless pointless stupid experiment... but not inside that Biosphere... but not inside the Biosphere. So the ants merely took over their role.

Hypocritically, the Scientists themselves slipped in-and-out of the 'sealed' buildings. Thereby destroying the parameters of their own stated goal of having humans actually live inside this monstrosity day-and night-for the rest of their lives. A similar experiment had been already attempted with another smaller set of buildings in America. It was shut down in a few months because the humans found they could not drink the poisoned water, or breathe the poisoned air.

So they slipped hypocritically in and out of this obscene ecological prison called a Biosphere. Thinking that maybe if they could control the living environment inside at a safe distance... that eventually, maybe some humans might be able to actually live inside it. But because they could not stand this sense of suffocation, and boredom and feral power of life growing out of their control so fast... they ended up running from machine-to machine, trying to manipulate and control their artificial environment... and met with disaster after disaster... As the living plants destroyed all of their high-priced equipment.

Sound a little like all of the history of civilized humans so far? Sound a bit like all the news media reports of crises and disasters so far? What these scientific asses have still not realized...or found out; is that the obscene unfeeling separation of scientific probing observation has affected every scientific experiment ever done in the annals of Science. Not just in the observation of subatomic particles. We are still so blind about this fact. It was the presence of the scientists themselves that made this innocent species of garden ant run berserk throughout the entire experiment. It was the imbalanced insanity of their entire plan that made the eco-systems malfunction so badly. Planting species next to each other that in Nature lived on different continents? These scientists imported, and created a re-living of the destruction of the Earth's ecosystem by technology on a small scale. And even after the entire act, the entire play came to a crashing halt. They remained completely blind to what they had witnessed and seen and experienced.

This obscene project continues to run. Wasting hundreds of millions of dollars every year. What is its new purpose? It is a tourist stop. Kept alive merely to awe people about the wonders of Science. So the public will never dare question why this insane waste of their money is being spent on a useless piece of crap that should be shut down. Or at least given to a farmer who could grow something edible and useful in it.

The, new, changed set of goals? Was to study the effects of global warming and global pollution. To see just how much poison and imbalance this artificial biosphere can take before it destroys itself. While this same Science' is the precise self-same engine that is responsible in the global warming and pollution of the Earth, and prefers not to ... notice that it is merely blindly observing the effects of its own insane destructive effects of the Earth itself.

So this wonderful system of objective one-sided blindness. This wonderful demonstration in human stupidity and destruction called Science... is still being carried on in Germany. Instead of studying anything that is useful it started to study the effects of its own experiment. Studying the effects of its own stupid mistakes. Studying itself. Like doing a film about doing a film...And not even realizing that they are doing so, or admitting to it in public or even to themselves.

Except now; the Biosphere scientists have switched goals yet again. Now they are now manipulating their new mistakes to cover up their old mistakes. Remember: Scientists are not happy unless they can manipulate something objectively and unfeelingly. Like Old Testament Biblical Gods: they are not satisfied unless they can feel all-powerful and are manipulating the forces of nature, and bending them to the will. Now their purpose is to study tiny small selective effects of certain selective imbalances and pollutions on certain plants and species. The entire grandiose structure and goal has been scaled down to an ordinary lab-experiment. Except with the tiny, er, um, difference: that instead of costing mere thousands of dollars a day... like on ordinary wasteful, pointless, scientific experiments. The Biosphere is costing hundreds of thousands of dollars a day. Now the Biosphere keeps a low profile. No more media fanfare. Downplayed. Another official listing on the national budgets of countless scientific and government organizations... Does anyone care a damn about this? No. It's Science. It must be good. They must have an intelligent reason for doing it... I mean... aren't scientists supposed to be intelligent? Aren't they supposed to be the smartest people around?

The entire experiment has become an encapsulated bible and object lesson on the destruction of Natural ecosystems caused by human intervention. A fount of evidence and truth for anyone who cares to notice. Showing in Microcosm: how Humans affect eco-systems. How the population of an insignificant species suddenly exploded; killing every other living species-plant-animal-organic creature-organism it could lay its hands on. On an evolutionary time-line in microcosm. The biosphere project is a microcosm of human civilization's attempt to separate itself from Nature. The attempt was an utter failure. Which is exactly the reason why we should get rid of civilization. Human beings are animals born from Nature and we should live in Nature and not try to insulate ourselves by insane insular bubbles which do not work.. The human animal was not designed to insulate itself from Nature: we are designed specifically to touch every living creature with our naked skin and let them touch us.

Why is Science so hard to understand? Because it is illogical. It is irrational. It goes against all common sense.

The only thing Science is good at is duplication. And even there, its duplication is a hoax and a lie.

Science is filled with hoaxes and lies
Take the scientific obsession with digging up dead things and studying them.

This is supposed to give us a better understanding of all kinds of things by supposedly analyzing its past history. However, they do not tell you that 99.9999999999 % of everything that once existed in the past... no longer exists today. They do not tell you that they are trying to piece together this supposedly valid understanding of the past: by digging up .0000000000000001% of that still-existent .000000000001% of leftover evidence that somehow managed to escape the natural course of evolutionary-biologic decay-regeneration-rebirth. And that they find this completely non-representative evidence... in the weirdest, most unnatural, unique, nooks, and crannies. Which makes whatever they do find to be basically useless because it has been found and taken completely out of its original organic connected context...

Find a dead fossil. And there is nothing it can be connected to. You cannot connect it to an ecosystem. You cannot even pretend to know what the world was like when it was alive... Except by assuming that the conditions that existed then: are basically like the conditions that exist now. This unspoken assumption makes scientists to come up with crap that so irrational, illogical: that none of their theories, models or explanations fit the evidence and the facts they unearth.

Their digging up these dead things to understand the past; is equivalent of one million years from now, digging up a speck of dust from the Hearst Castle in California; and by analyzing this speck of dust...trying to understand what kind of Culture humans had in California back then... Only there would be no way for you to know that the speck of dust came from a huge monolithic one-of-a-kind architectural monstrosity... and that there existed millions of other homes that were much more representative of that Time-period. But then... studying this one speck of dust would not tell you that it even came from the Hearst castle, or that there were millions of expensive houses in California, and that all the people spent a good half of their lives working to afford to live in them... never mind about Hearst and his Robber Baron exploits. This speck of dust could never, ever tell you anything about what it was actually like to live in California. You would be studying something you could never put into any relevant context: because the context you are trying to connect it to: itself no longer exists.

Yet, this kind of gibberish is precisely what most scientists spend their entire lives on. This is precisely what nearly all field Archeology, all field Paleontology all field Geology, all field Meteorology, all field Astronomy... all of the supposed field research of nearly all Science is. The efforts and research of scientists are wasted in this manner and spent on arcane, weird, specialized, insane questions, topics and subject that no sane person ever gives a damn about or cares about: because it has completely nothing to do with their lives and has no relevance to it. None of it serves any useful purpose...

Except what is called: Practical Science. Or more accurately: the Science of the Oil Corporations, the Science of the Chemical and Textile Corporations... And there it is used mainly to invent, create and produce more toxic, more poisonous, more expensive substances to sell to the richest businesses, to make more unnecessary consumer products, that are lousier than the old ones, and that nobody really needs.

Pure Science... and Pure Research... is not concerned with human things or human interests, or anything that is relevant to humans. Trying to find out why dinosaurs went extinct... This is an intelligent use of your time? Trying to find out why Woolly Mammoths went extinct? Going around the planet looking for signs of a massive meteor hitting the Earth to 'explain' things that they cannot explain otherwise... simply because there will never be enough evidence to make any useable sense out of in the first place?... Science is obsessed with the effects of death and destruction... it is not interested in the effects of life and living at all. Whether or not a catastrophic climatic effect was caused by a volcano, or a comet, of an asteroid in the sixth century A.D.... Who cares. What difference does it make? What use is the information... even if you manage to find the answer? Yet, this is precisely kind of scientific junk that scientists spend millions and millions of dollars on. This is precisely the kind of useless junk they spend their lives on and all their energy on.

A perfect example of the obscene waste of money and human resources by what is called as pure Science... or pure research is the famous Human Genome Project. A huge amount of publicity was created merely in order to force the Government to fund only one of the two business companies that were competing against each other to be the first one to crack the entire code.... Crack? They would have done it easily in a few more years and found out much more about our genes if they had had the patience to do it methodically and slowly. But they needed the publicity for a very good reason. Because after they cracked that code.... Then they said to the public in effect... in carefully coded euphemisms so as not to lose their funding.

'Oh. That information is completely useless to us. We need more millions of dollars to continue this research so that gradually... we can accumulate and build-up a genetic pool of information. You see... the information we get out of only one human genome is completely useless to us. We need to accumulate and study literally all... and they do mean; all of the human genomes living today. And compare them with all of the human genomes that ever lived.'

Of course the fact that this is absurdly impossible is not leaked out to the press. Why? Because if it were... then the entire project would stopped and cancelled for lack of funds. Why do they need all this information; just for it to be ever of any practical use? Mutation. Mutation only occurs once in a 100 million times. And only one of those mutations are ever any kind of breakthrough to evolving an improved species... These mutations are occurring all the time. We use these natural mutations by interbreeding animals and plants unnaturally trying to get the results we want... Not the mutations s plant or animal wants and needs to stay healthy; but also improve itself as much as it can all the time.

The total uselessness of the human genome project is merely a practical demonstration of the fact that the usefulness of any information is only as good as the context you put it into. Science has created that obscenity of thinking that since there is no other God than Science. Then Science becomes God and does whatever it damn well pleases. Why? Because humans with their tools have done anything they damn well please since we first invented our own tools. We think doing whatever we damn well please is actually good for us... and never mind what it is doing to every living thing on Earth.

The only way you can put any genetic information of any species into a useful context is to compare and evaluate literally all or most of the genes in that species. A single test tells you nothing. A single test-result tells you nothing. But the insane idea of wasting trillions of dollars in the hope, the dream, of finding something useful in gene research... has been so successfully sold by the Media that almost everyone has bought it hook, line, and sinker.

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

Even though nothing has been found so far.

So they mapped an entire genome of one person... so what?!. They don't even know what the fucking things are there for. They don't even know what they do, or why they do it.

Oh. You mean now they can start manipulating them better? And get what? Do you mean in order to understand our own humanity: we have to perform millions of laboratory experiments on millions of people, so we can see what kind of genetic freaks happen when scientists start playing with DNA like insane children with a new dangerous toy? That is what the Nazis tried to do. They thought they could create a better race of humans. Now Science is trying to sell this same idea as a sacred good for humanity. Trying to pretend that they actually know what the fuck they are doing.

The public has a weird assumption of Scientific Research. They think these morons and idiots actually know what they are doing. They think that if Science has not found a cure for Cancer after spending Three and a Half Trillion Dollars on it... then the only answer... is to throw more money at it. And waste more trillions of dollars, more billions of dollars.

Does anyone care that this money could be used in thousands of other ways with better results?

'But it's Scientific Research. It's for a Good Cause'. The sacredness of Scientific Research is so unquestioned... you will be lucky to find one person in a hundred who does not believe in it. Yet, if anyone bothers to investigate just why it is done, how, who gets the money, why they get the money, or the grant. What that grant is for... then you will see for yourself just how insane and unscientific scientific research actually is. The fact is: money does not solve problems. Cooperation and goodwill between people who want to help each other solves problems. Not money. Money only corrupts people into becoming more selfish and more greedy than they already are. To even understand which mutation was key to our evolution, we need all past and present genetic codes to be painstakingly analyzed and compared to each other. What good would that do? It would allow us to go:

'Oh, so: that's how we happened to become human. Oh.'

Of course we're already human. So all this hindsight is a waste of time and interest since each person already holds their entire 4 billion year-old genetic memory locked in their own genes. It's called instinct... reason... logic, common sense, common ancestry, common genes, common DNA, common genetic design, common habits, common urges. Science chooses to ignore human instincts. If any person can access their own genetic wisdom and instincts without Science telling them that it is all right to listen to your instincts: then what use is all this? And what is the point is finding out which gateway gene controls which other genes? What good is it except as a chance to manipulate our Life-codes into unnatural mutations... when we have no understanding of the possible repercussions and consequences? But the Media and Science are screaming that genetic engineering is the newest, latest best thing since sliced bread. Why? Because all this hocus-pocus gives them more grant money, more scientific toys to play with, and more fancy gizmos to charge billions of dollars for, and feel important, smart, powerful, modern, and more Scientific.

And since it is all so complicated it takes years to understand all of the pointless gibberish they force their information into. Once you get the thrill of possessing privileged information you are hooked on it. That is why the CIA and NASA refuse to be dismantled. Every elitist organization that has no responsibility to its donors and no transparency and lives off of tax dollars, has gotten bigger and more powerful as time goes on. The same has been true of the Scientific establishment. But who are they?

Where is their power-base? They are invisible... they have no corporate offices that you can even picket. They are the most invisible and irresponsible powers of modern civilization. And as long as nobody investigates them... all of their secret corruptions and goings-on, and deals will remain invisible until what they are doing finally blows up so badly; that Chernobyl will look like a firecracker compared to the death they are selling with their latest discoveries and techniques... working as technological observers and researchers for every weapons manufacturer and chemical plant, and high-tech labs that spew out their products and tests to make them as much money as possible.

The idea that commercialized Science is benign, and actually good for you; has destructively been sold so convincingly... that most civilized people actually believe it. That is, until they find out the truth... For example: Monsanto manufactured personnel bomblets or bommys: by the millions in Minnesota for the Vietnam War. And over 300,000 bombs were inadvertently dropped on the neighboring country of Laos because a part of the Vietcong supply trails ran through its borders. Even after the media found out that they were bombing civilians in Vietnam, and public pressure forced them to stop bombing the north Vietnamese civilians: they continued bombing Laos. Simply because they had not been explicitly ordered to stop the civilian bombing in Laos also. Laos was used as a bomb dumping landfill. Any pilot with unused bombs left on any mission, systematically dumped the bombs on Laos just so they wouldn't have to be worried about the slightly higher hazard factor of landing on a moving aircraft Carrier with live bombs still under your wings and fuselage. One carpet bomb holds thousands of tiny individual bomblets, or bommys. By weight alone: they dropped more bombs on this tiny defenseless country than all the bombs dropped in the Second World War. 200 million tons of bombs. That averages out to one B-52 bomb load of anti-personnel bomblets every two minutes for nine years. Roughly 10 to 15% of them never exploded. There are still roughly 300,000 unexploded bombs lying everywhere in the soil, in trees, in rivers, lakes, cities, villages, fields, forests all over Laos. The entire country has a bomb retrieval program that manages to find, isolate and safely explode about 10,000 of these bombs every year... While children die from picking them up and playing with them every day. At this rate: the poorest country in the world, Laos, will finally get rid of this new-fangled technology in about 300 years.

Why was Laos targeted so insanely? Because it was the most defenseless nation, the weakest, the smallest, the least industrialized, the least civilized nation near a civilized war-zone. The basic instinct of all cowardice, of attacking the weakest and most defenseless, is true for all predators and killers: whether they be lions on the Serengeti plains of Africa, or modern military armies.

Does anyone fault Monsanto for being so scientifically effective and advanced for producing these new military marvels that are designed only to kill civilians in mass carpet-bombing? No. Monsanto is a respected name in the chemical industry, and is a regular contributor to both the democratic and republican parties. They are an honored member of the entire system of legalized bribery influence peddling, and corruption in Washington. They have had their lobbyists there for decades now. Just try to accuse a highly respected institution like Monsanto of anything and see how much publicity you get. Nobody will listen to you at all. Chemical and weapons manufacturers, and the worst corporate polluters in world all use the sacred cloak of Science to hide under. They all use it as a lying smoke-screen. Telling the public that all this new stuff is being scientifically done for the good of all man kind.

Science can't hurt you? What is the invention of the atomic bomb but Science gone insane? Just exactly what is good about an atomic bomb? An atomic bomb is pure death. An atomic bomb is pure evil. Science created the atomic bomb: is this good? No: it is evil. Does anyone blame Science for this? Do people blame scientists for creating pure death? Why not? Because humans have been brainwashed into believing that Science is not evil. Science is nothing but insane evil. Atomic bombs are the next new improved scientific weapon of mass destruction to be used in the next world war. That is not good: that is evil gone rampantly insane... so insane it, will destroy not only the entire earth, but itself into the bargain as well. Now that Science is pulling slightly back from the brink of that insanity: is it any less insane to invent and manufacture weapons of mass destruction that are not pure radioactive poison, but only designed to kill civilians en masse by the thousands instead of by the millions? But I forgot. Nations that do not have these weapons are insane... Because they are trying to get them. The Nations that already are them, are all supposed to be beyond reproach, all perfectly sane, and controlled in how they use their military weapons of mass destruction. The countries that have these carpet bombs are still using them. They have been regularly used on the poorest countries in the world: Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, Somalia, Afghanistan, Iraq, Ethiopia, Nigeria. The Germans tested their own new-fangled weapons in the Spanish rebellion. Because then Spain was the poorest and most defenseless country in Europe.

Has anything changed? Yes. The countries that manufacture weapons have changed. The countries that are bombed have changed. The weapons have gotten better. Otherwise: basically nothing has changed; except that today, the unquestioning belief in Science is increasing.

But concerning mutations...

Another famous myth created by Darwin's book: The Evolution of Species: is his model and hypothesis of Natural Selection. But... how does one select anything naturally? What, or who is doing the selecting? Why are they selected? He did not dare to publicly state what his logic shows: That there has never been any such thing as a God until humans created him. His entire discourse was written in the context of an 19th century Christian Englishman trying to fit Nature into the larger context of a Creator... an absolute God. Trying to squeeze two opposing dynamics and assumptions into the same model at the same time. His assumptions have never been questioned completely. To this day, scientists do not bother to readjust his writing or re-evaluate his conclusions.

Scientists never bother to understand their own Science in the proper historical context. Neither do Historians. Every new generation in every culture, in every neighborhood has a different set of changed values and outlooks. You cannot truly understand what any person in the past ever meant unless you find out what their Normality was. You cannot understand anyone in the past unless you understand all of the thousands of things they took for granted. Historians do not bother with this. Neither do Scientists. There is no comparison of Normalities between the past and the present. Every generation has different fashions, different ideas, different attitudes, different assumptions. Unless you present their writings in a sane, comparative relative context: then you will misinterpret whatever is said because you will not know what was actually semantically meant. If a ancient Greek historian reads from a modern book that someone is cool: he would be mystified. Because he has no idea of where that words meaning comes from. The same is true with any modern historian trying to decipher the meaning of the Dionysus cults, who had their own special words. So too is the prose of Darwin set in a convoluted political doublespeak... simply because he could not afford to insult the Church of England. All English Scientists in his day were members of a sacred religious order. They were religious Scientists. Unless you want to go back and decipher the political and cultural times of his era: most of his writing will seem weird to you.

But Science does not expect you to do this. They expect you to believe what they think Darwin meant when he wrote that book. That is called Empirical knowledge. Taking something on faith simply because someone tells you it is so. Which is the opposite of the Scientific credo that you must present your proof, before you can be believed. Only Science does not abide by its own rules. It tries to teach by rote: and then later if anyone wants to; they can test the dogma in a controlled experiment in a scientific laboratory using the same old equipment used hundreds of years ago. And what are you allowed to test to see if Science is indeed true? Only what has already been tested before. Any other kind of test is only allowed to be done by research scientists... not by you. I mean: what would the world be coming to if anyone did their own research and came to their own conclusions. Who do they think they are? Some old religious scientist from the 18th century?

Science tries to teach each part of its scientific logic, or knowledge as it was first written... Without ever re-evaluating it, or redefining it, or modifying it. It tries to teach Euclidian geometry exactly as it was taught In Greece in the 6th century B.C. It tries to teach Newtonian physics exactly how it was taught by Newton to his peers in the 19th century. Science does not bother to put Science into any historical context. Science does not bother to explain why any historical pieces of information are scientifically important. It never bothers to put Science into any Historical, or Social, or Moral, or Ethical, or Human context. Science never explains its own mistakes and fallacies in any historical, or understandable perspective. In other words... Scientists never talk to historians and Historians never talk to Scientists. They have never done so... and never will. Because they are different fields of knowledge. Because one does not concern the other. Because they are too specialized. Because they have no valid connections to be made between each other. Huh?

Scientists never bother to explain why Darwin wrote: The Origin of Species in the first place. Every Naturalist before him and after him has tried to explain animal behavior by the assumption that all animals fear death. Darwin had the belief that all living things do not want to die, and will do anything to keep from dying or going extinct.

He assumed the entire animal kingdom was terrified of going extinct, or dying. He based his entire explanation of why they went extinct upon the assumption that they were competing against each other. He tried to explain all animal behavior by competition. This is still how most Naturalists study and view animals today.

He assumed that every living thing on this entire planet instead of cooperating with each other harmoniously: is competing against each other in a savage, brutal, bloody, unending battle for selfish survival and to hell with every other living thing on this planet. If that is the case: then why do all living things, why do all water-air-earth exist in an interconnected, cooperative manner? Darwin believed that living things exist only to fight each other for what he termed: limited resources. And that the entire purpose of Life is an unending competitive battle for survival. That all living things are naturally in mortal conflict against each other. That Nature is merely a field of competition. That Nature is in a continual state of battle against itself. That there is no peace, no harmony, no love and no cooperation anywhere in the Natural World. That if you want peace and cooperation, you can find it only in humans... ?

The basic bullshit lie that Darwin sold, and that has been printed, as religious Scientific Gospel, is his credo that: all organisms must compete in order to survive.

This idea is a total, complete, fucking ecological lie.

The actual truth, which all modern Biologists have studied and proven and printed, is the truth that all

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

living organisms must cooperate with each other in order to survive. Whether they cooperate knowingly or unknowingly is totally irrelevant. The fields of ecology and eco-systems is based upon the fact that there are no exceptions to this principle.

Today: Modern Science preaches both of these doctrines without explaining or admitting this illogical paradox. You don't believe it? Go to any University and try to interview any professor in the living sciences. Try to ask them about this. We ignore the insane dichotomy of mixed messages that all Biological Science teaches and preaches. To try to make you understand the insanity and stupidity of this Scientific obscenity. Preaching that the survival of all organisms is based upon competition and cooperation... is the same as if all Christian Churches preached that it is Good and Holy to love and hate God. Yet nobody notices this Scientific two-faced insane rationalization. Nobody dares to question it, or even challenge it.

Just as Christian preachers preach hate while espousing love. Jesus never preached hate. Jesus only preached love. Scientists preach the poisonous, insidious lie that organisms must compete in order to survive: when the actual truth is that all living organisms that cooperate with each other survive, and all living organisms that try to compete with each other go extinct.

Take Nature films. Ordinary animal existence is not exciting enough to be filmed. We need to watch animals in crisis. We need to watch animals in Conflict. We need to watch animals in Danger. We need to watch animals in Fear. We need to give animals a human story. We need to attribute human qualities to each animal. We need to give animals a human name and give them a human personality. And Leave all truth and honesty about how animals actually live on the cutting room floor. This stereotypical portrayal of nature as being savage, brutal, and uncaring has been used to sell Nature films ever since films were first invented.

If every life-form ever created on this planet has been fighting for limited resources, then why hasn't any species or order of species gained permanent dominance? Why did the microbes allow higher forms to even evolve then? They should have recognized any newcomers as a threat to their limited resources and ganged up on them and exterminated them on the spot. Before they ever had a chance to take any of these limited resources away from their own insatiable need to consume these limited resources.

Darwin's entire book is a pathological obsessive attempt to try and explain killing and eating living things as a process of Natural Selection in the context of a Natural World that hates itself, fears itself, and will do anything in order to survive. That is his unspoken assumption. In fact that is the unspoken assumption and attitude towards Nature of nearly all civilized humans.

His last book: The Survival of Species; explains life as organisms whose only goal in life is trying not to die. Darwin did not concern himself with why, and how they lived. He had already made his subconscious assumption of why living organisms lived. And nobody since then has seriously questioned his assumptions. Today: most scientists base their models on Darwin's model. Most of Science does not concern itself with questions about the why and how of life... except under the assumption of not wanting to die... not wanting to go extinct.

In that case: all living species ever born are abysmal failures. Because they all eventually go extinct. Even microbes go extinct. We worship dinosaurs... why? Because they didn't go extinct as fast as other species. This is the same reason we worship and revere any old species that has somehow managed to not go extinct. In this category; Science is nothing more than a thinly veiled obsession with killing, dying, death... extinction... and destruction. Science is not supposed to be emotional. Instead it has abstracted the subconscious emotional fear of death; into a sick, cold, unemotional morgue of preserving dead fossils, dead tissues, dead organs, dead species... Trying to find out why they died... Why they went extinct. The latest media selling of this kind of Science on American Public Television is something called: Secrets of the Dead. It carries the unspoken assumption: that the only way that you can learn anything ... is from something that is dead. Can any scientist explain the reason for this assumption? I don't understand.

How living organisms actually live... why they are even alive... how this incredibly subtle dynamic of cooperation manages to keep on creating more living things... creating more 'limited resources'... more diversity... more beauty... is mostly ignored: except as a statistical curiosity. Which no scientist... nor any civilized person is in the least bit interested in; except in idle curiosity. Civilized Religion has been replaced with a civilized Scientific belief-system that believes that everything in Nature... and everything in the entire Universe is out to kill us... destroy us... And we can only survive... we can only not be killed if we kill them first. We must destroy all threats to our survival real or imagined first. This belief has escalated into an accepted, unspoken assumption. If any other living thing is inconveniently taking up limited resources from us, we humans have the perfect evolutionary right to destroy them. Why? Because by being in competition with us: they are trying to kill us. So of course, we must kill them first in order to survive. Then killing anything is perfectly okay. Then all human existence is based upon killing. As long as it is Scientific. Killing for Survival becomes the be-all and ethical end-all of all Scientific Evolutionary Theory.

So, plants and animal are not trying to live. They're only living in order to kill other living organisms. Living things only live to kill. So we must kill them, and eat them, and destroy them first. In that case: basing the rationale and justification of Life upon death, killing and eating: is perfectly logical. All civilized sacred texts give us the right to kill everything we want to. Why? Because we are the only species alive that is actually afraid of dying and afraid of going extinct. But we are civilized. We don't do such horrible nasty things like killing living things in order to live. Oh. We do. Let's not dwell on that. What?

Every other living species whether you believe it or not; has never given a damn about whether it went extinct, whether it survived a million years... or three billion years. And none of them were trying to survive either. Nor were they trying to kill each other. The gruesome myth of Natural Selection and survival of the fittest held by Science only helps to foster a fear of all living things. This sick fear-based assumption makes people develop a revulsion to all living things. A xenophobic fear of every living thing on Earth. It makes them kill every living thing near them. People go around killing things not because these living things even pose a threat, or are inconvenient to them... but simply out of pure icky revulsion at any other living thing they are not used-to. This is the basis of humane Science.

In the 18th and 19th century in Europe: people killed any bats they found in their church towers because the preachers cursed them as agents of the devil. on the super-sensitized ears of a bat that can hear the hum of a flying insect many feet away e the huge crashing noise of the bells drove the bats out of the towers where they slept... only because the bells were used so infrequently; that the bats took up residence without realizing that the nature of their new-found caves was not what it seemed. Bats kept the insect populations down to normal levels. After the bats were killed; the resulting overpopulation of insects feeding on human refuse spread disease and plague.

Towns that kept bats in their church towers escaped many plagues and diseases They were thought to be cursed with evil spirits, because they prospered far better than the sicker, more disease-ridden towns. The entire nation went into a killing spree. Killing every bat they could find. And suffered even more epidemics and catastrophes.

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

Much like the ranchers suffering even more vermin problems after they had killed virtually all the natural predators in their area for fear of their cattle being eaten by wolves. Because their cattle is a limited resource. The Darwinian Law of Natural Selection justifies their wiping out any animal they feel like killing... And still be proud of themselves as decent, rational scientific, God-fearing folk: obeying Darwin's famous Law of Natural Selection... or God's Will, or the sacredness of all human life over all other life, or the greater good of civilization, or whatever rationalization they happen to have .

What difference is there between a bat-killing frenzy, and a wolf-killing frenzy? This simply demonstrates the hypocrisy of civilization's Myth that as we become more educated, and more enlightened, we are becoming more humane towards other living things as civilization progresses. The fact which civilized humans do not want to look at; is that all Science, all Scientific Laws, all Scientific concepts, all Scientific theories are used to destroy Nature. They are used to kill living things. They are constantly in use as a rationalized form of Scientific Humanity. Only... this Scientific Humanity just happens to be the most perfect, convenient, expedient, justification for all kinds of killing, destruction and torture. Scientific principles and ideas are basically used to destroy everything on the Earth that is not Scientific, that is not man-made... that is not a machine... including living humans.

Nature is alien to most civilized people because it so different from their usual civilized environments of conflict-stress-distraction-abstraction-violence-busyness etc... They instinctively dislike it simply because they are not used to its peaceful quietness. How can you explain to civilized people, that their own attitudes towards Nature; are not mirrored by Nature and reflected back at them? What they sense outside of them is merely their own projected attitudes and assumptions. Nature is not reflecting this back at them. They are reflecting their own projections back at themselves. How can you explain the dynamic of the reflectivity of human awareness; so people will understand that much of what they perceive is their own reflection reflected back at them? So people not delude themselves into seeing their own inner reflected beliefs and assumptions projected out, and reflected back in everything they see outside of themselves? So people can separate the Actuality Outer world from their Inner Normality-Reality?

The amount of money, time, effort and resources spent on any one aerospace job could easily create dozens, if not hundreds of other less tool-intensive jobs. However: since people worship these tools more than they care about the poverty of others; this fact is not considered relevant. The other flaw this example reveals is that no society, no nation, ever tries to comprehensively evaluate and list its limited resources and match them to any sane, balanced list of priorities. Each allotment of funds is never placed side-by-side with all other allotments in order to decide which of them actually are the most humanly important. They are all hopelessly segmented, disconnected from each other, in a jumbled up mess of specialized, special interests. The pharmaceutical lobby, the automobile lobby, the corporations that thrive as huge wealth-power structures are not concerned about the overall balance of the budget or the greater good of the environment or the well being of the public.

For decades, the U.S.S.R. spent untold trillions of dollars and untold resources trying to build an operating Space station orbiting around the Earth. All the units malfunctioned badly. It pushed them into bankruptcy. The U.S.A. tried to build a space station also. They ran out of money. Now they still have an insane notion of a bipartisan, bi-National effort to build it. Only they need private money from corporations to fund it. Because the combined budgets of the USSR and the USA cannot afford the expense of building a single Space station around our Planet. However, that does not stop them trying. Why?

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

482

Prestige. Competitive Status. Bragging Rights based on Competition. National Pride.
Pride in human Technology. Technological Arrogance. Stupidity.

Spouting untold billions of dollars out into Space for over fifty years. And the result of all this? Has there been any research that resulted in a beneficial effect for humans? No. There has not. Zero beneficial effect. 100% pure waste of money and resources. Except for a few pictures. And the astronauts going up. Seeing the Earth as a single totality having spiritual experiences of exclusive, elite privileged Wonder. The idea that you can distance yourself from the earth you live on is a symptom of the insanity of human abstraction. You cannot distance yourself from the air you breathe the water you need to live and the land you need to live on..

So now; all we have to do is rocket up all six billion humans into orbit; just so we can all have the same technological wonder as they did: of physically seeing the planet as a single totality, and the Space effort will end up having a beneficial effect of humans. Oops. Impossible. Then you would need 300,00 billion more humans on Earth to build all of the rockets for the 6 billion fortunate humans. The idiotic idea of somehow creating a tool-intensive, technological utopia in Space while billions of humans on earth continue to starve is not even laughable. It is pathetic in its complete dream-fantasy. Humans have to learn how to crawl before they can walk. If the human race could ever manage to feed itself properly: then it might be capable of taking on more ambitious projects. The foolish dream of humans living somewhere else in space is the arrogance of tools trying to not only destroy life, but completely supplant it: so humans will no longer need the earth or anything else except their own tools in order to survive. The cost of this single vainglorious enterprise alone could be used to eliminate all starvation and poverty on earth. But of course; putting humans before machines is an unthinkable concept for any tool-based society.

The Space Race is merely another blind tool-crazed drive to separate ourselves further from all living things: even from the planet we were designed to live on. We choose to completely discount and ignore the huge sums of money, the huge waste of resources and energy and man-hours needed to keep one astronaut alive in space. Humans were not designed to survive in that environment. Why should people spend 100's of millions of hard-earned dollars trying to keep one astronaut alive in space for a few days; while billions of poor people starve and suffer because not enough money has been spent on their welfare? Yet, to the distorted value systems of civilization, this is a perfectly justifiable and rational expenditure. We use resources to make and use more expensive, fancy machines; rather than using them for some more practical usefulness like housing, or schools, or decent jobs.

The expansion of technology into Space, developing a mechanical tool-culture based upon the worship of technology; is just one more example of how we humans prefer to ignore our own actual problems and imbalances in favor of creating new toys-tools. As long as technology is worshiped, as long as tool-use is glorified, as long as civilization is the condition in which humans live: this blind mechanized explosion will continue to wreak havoc upon our planet.

So yes... Technology does work: segmentially, out-of-context. In spite of the imbalances it creates, at what cost to the Earth and its living inhabitants, at what cost to the humans who use it; no one can say. Because we have no way of comparing or evaluating the difference between the use and non-use of technology. Since we have never lived inside anything else.

Just as a fish has no way of comparing the difference between swimming in water or air. The fish only knows water as its medium of survival and existence. Humans only know tool-use as their medium of survival and existence. What if all the resources and money used for Space were used to improve life for all six billion people on Earth? Then every human on earth would be so affluent that that world would be transformed beyond recognition. Of course, this never happened. Because it is unthinkable. Because billions of people worshipping rockets is more important than improving the lives of billions of humans. Huh? Someone explain this to me.

What is Science good for? What does it actually do for us? Has anyone ever asked this question? Has this question ever been explored, investigated, compared, evaluated? That is the curse of all sacred, holy institutions. There is too much power, wealth, status and knowledge at stake to ever allow them to be scrutinized and stripped naked of all their false myths and misconceptions. Could it be that Science is only good for mechanical measurement without any human interpretation of these mechanical facts... and that the validity of these mechanical measurements is a complete hoax?

That is one fatal flaw in all hierarchical institutions and organizations. They have no recycling feedback. All orders come down from the top. The top carefully filters out anything it does not want to hear. Creating its own culture. And being genuinely surprised when they go outside of their exclusive little cliques and are not met with total affirmation. So they scoot back, lock the doors, barricade themselves in, and enjoy their little privileges, and do everything they can to get more privileges. More funding. More power. More influence. Etc.

One redeeming feature of Science has; is some cooperative sharing of knowledge in certain fields. But even that is badly flawed. The Dead Sea Scrolls were left to molder for decades in the hands of a single, jealous archeologist. Until the Institute he worked in, finally forced him to make the scrolls available to other scholars. Even then, his niggardly sharing of facts that has no relevance or use to the everyday life of anyone. Try to find any scientific research or data that you can actually use in your everyday life; and you will be disappointed.

Scientific knowledge is couched in the most complex, specialized jargon possible. It is jealously guarded. It is used only by a small exclusive clique of 'specialists. Their pet theories are only shared between a few fellow-scientists who are like-minded, and most inclined to agree with whatever they expound. Only when a certain theory gains enough popular support among this specialized community is it ever published for the public to read. In effect, most of the scientific information you read is actually the result of a popularity contest that is determined mostly by the media, and the fickle public. Not by the scientists themselves.

As a result: only the most popular scientific theories are ever published. Then the most popular ones that the masses like: get even more public exposure. Until it becomes a 'popular belief'. Even though 99% of the people who believe it have never studied Science, and have no true understanding of what any theory is actually based upon. So the theory itself becomes merely a catch-phrase. A meaningless term misused and misunderstood. Based upon pure ignorance. Not Science. Just as the belief of the Earth being flat. Modern Science is a result of mass-popularity. Just like popular politicians, or popular foods, or popular culture. Any scientific information that is not liked by the masses is simply not published. This careful self-censoring is supposedly done to sift out flawed and mistaken theories. Actually, it is done to give the pronouncements of their precious theories as much sanctified weight and authority as possible. So they will not be laughed at and sneered at if their precious theories turn out to be completely wrong. This does not stop the scientific community from being a rabble of gossipmongers and rumor-spreaders... ready to destroy the credibility of anyone they don't like, or anyone who threatens the sanctity of their own precious theories.

In order to buttress themselves against common sense, Scientists erect a system of sanctified knowledge that is not allowed to be questioned by a non-scientific authority. . Any theory or idea... any data or information that is not approved by the Scientific Community is considered to be unscientific, and is totally disregarded. No scientific theory is allowed to be published unless it has already been censored and weeded to fit whatever orthodox belief the orthodox scientific establishment holds. This constantly changing scientific base is so convoluted, so filled with half-truths, distortions, exaggerations and outright false data: that nobody could ever untangle the mess to get to the bottom of it all.

If all the scientific data that was collected were compared and evaluated: then Science might actually have produced some useful conclusions. But it is so pigeon-holed, so specialized, so obsessed by the exploration of useless knowledge that this almost never happens. Most scientists spend their entire lives studying some abstruse topic or phenomenon, and die without any of their data ever being read, compared, or evaluated to any other data. Their entire life's work is left to rot inside voluminous journals. Their whole life wasted on something so specialized, so narrow-minded and inane, that any unscientific person would be in disbelief that anyone could be so stupid as to throw away their whole life on such meaningless junk. As a result; many people generally ignore the latest Scientific Proclamations of the Day and regard them with justified skepticism. Science is no carrier of the sacred flame of truth. Rather, it is merely a convenient tool used by corporations and governments to sanctify their own policies and tool-use.

A perfect example of how Science attacks and denigrates its own findings was Rachel Carlson's groundbreaking, meticulously researched book on the poisonous effects of DDT called: "Silent Spring." It was too revolutionary for its time. The entire scientific community attacked it as False Science. They publicly denounced her and destroyed her reputation as a reputable scientist. She died in disgrace, unknown, forgotten and a failure. Only for the federal government later to belatedly admit after her death; that the book was not a scam, and what she had published was completely accurate. That DDT was indeed destroying and poisoning the farmlands and woodlands of the nation. And also poisoning the entire eating public by its indiscriminate use.

So: they banned DDT. But only in America. Food imported into America today is still being sprayed with DDT. The only reason the American government allowed DDT to be banned was that the American chemical companies by then had found enough new overseas markets; that the American DDT market was no longer crucial to their profit margins. Plus, they had by then, developed an alternative, supposedly less toxic poison to spray American crops with, but are actually more toxic and poisonous than DDT. These scientific facts are carefully kept from the public. Does the public heed any scientific proof that they are being systematically poisoned by literally all of the chemical companies on this planet?

No. First: most people couldn't care less what is in their food. If they like it, they eat it: regardless of how healthy or unhealthy it is. The entire debacle of Rachel Carlson's book has gone unnoticed, and unlearned from. The public is still unaware how Big Government Big Business, and Big Science all carefully scratch each other's back and censor everything of scientific importance. The public is kept as ignorant of the true facts as possible. People swallow Scientific claims or statements as Gospel Truth.

They swallow it as unthinkingly and as blindly as they swallow their chemically laced processed foods. The consumer motto is: Never question anything that feels good, sounds good, looks good or tastes good. The scientific farce of keeping all of its facts and conclusions, and data unconnected from each other continues to this day. Scientists are still scientifically studying the poisonous effects of pesticides. Only... they are carefully not examining these poisonous effects on humans. Instead they are studying the poisonous effects of pesticides on seabirds.

As one example: Scientists have found that the effect of pesticides on some seabirds in some areas: is producing testicular cancers in their growing genitals while still in the egg. In many cases their genitals become deformed and cancerous, and grow so big: that the chick breaks its own shell before it has developed lungs to breathe and dies prematurely, because all its growth spurt has been sucked up into its cancerous genitals swelling into a cancerous growth so huge: that its swelling genitals crack the chicks shell before it is ready to live. These dead, cancer-ridden fetus corpses are found in abandoned nests. Their huge, deformed, swollen genitals, so cancerously grown and swollen... that the diseased genitals of the dead fetus are actually bigger than the entire body and head. Even the seabird chicks that do not develop testicular cancer while still inside their shells; are found to be chemically neutered and sterilized, by the pesticides that their mother ate before laying her eggs. Even the chicks that are not chemically neutered by the pesticide levels in their bodies, they found have no desire to breed. All of these observed effects are a result of different levels of toxicity of pesticides in the egg of a growing chick inside its shell. And all of these effects come from the pesticides the mother birds ingest from the fish they eat. All of the fish they eat are also the same fish we eat also.

All the industrial farms in the world have ignored the scientific findings of Rachel Carlson's scientifically researched book: Silent Spring. The Scientific Community has carefully avoided studying the effects of known pesticides in our food on mothers and their fetus, and the health of these growing fetuses, and the babies, and the health these growing children develop, as they become adults. Science has carefully avoided studying the huge explosion in birth defects, and birth problems, and fertility problems, and the huge increase of deformations, mutations, growths, stillbirths, and unexplained spontaneous abortions in the womb in all the industrialized countries that eat food filled with pesticides.

Why?

Because it would raise too many unpleasant questions. It would raise too many doubts. It might affect the profits of the huge agri-business international corporations. It might affect the cushy jobs of the Scientific laboratory worker and technicians who make a handsome living by producing more, new, even more poisonous chemicals for the corporations and factories and businesses that use them to manufacture, package, and grow things on a mass scale.

All the Scientific Community, the Chemical Industry, and all farming business and farmers around the world have easily ignored Rachel Carlson's one small bit of scientific research back in the 1930's and 40's.

But here is the damning irony and hypocrisy, and criminality of Science. After Rachel Carlson's book was belatedly found to be scientifically accurate. And after DDT was banned only as a pesticide on mass-produced agricultural plants... Not in homes, or roach sprays, or garden pesticides used by homeowners; just commercially, industrially and in farms... The Scientific community very carefully and quietly... with the full collaboration of the Governments and Corporations and Universities all around the world... banned all further research and study of all the other deadlier pesticides that the scientific laboratories have been inventing and spewing out, and selling to the chemical corporations, who sell them to the agro-corporations, who use them in all of the industrial pesticides and chemical fertilizers they sell to all of the farmers around the world... So: for over seventy years and still counting... There has been no research on the effects of pesticides on humans at all. Only on a few species like seabirds, in certain small areas. And the Scientific community has also conveniently avoided studying the effects of all the chemical poisoning of our drinking water from agricultural runoff, from the chemicals and minerals leached from the exposed soil of industrially exposed bare earth.

Every pesticide that is sprayed on bare earth, every artificial fertilizer used in farming leaks into the groundwater, into the aquifers, into our rivers, lakes and reservoirs is poisoning humans. Never mind the residues found in our food. Take the natural mineral selenium found in healthy soil. All it takes, is a very slight increase of selenium in ordinary soil, to change it from a deficiency, into a poisonous, deadly, toxicity capable of killing wildlife and destroying entire ecosystems.

This applies to its natural level found in water. Scientists found a small area where the selenium of farmland had been leached into the wetlands and waters migrating birds used on their seasonal routes, and found the birds dying in huge droves because they were ingesting all kinds of small organisms in those wetlands that had too much selenium in them. What was the government's answer to this problem? To spend millions of dollars digging up this one tiny wetland pond, and store all of the poisoned earth, and muck in a landfill used for poisonous chemicals. They conveniently did not even look at why the selenium was being leached from the farmlands around this small pond. They conveniently did not study just what artificial chemicals and fertilizers the farmers in that area were using to produce this deadly effect on migrating birds using this one small pond. They conveniently did not study the effects of these chemical fertilizers and pesticides on living humans at all.

Gee. Gosh. How conveniently unscientific. Now... we really must fund scientific research mustn't we? I mean; it's for the Common Good of Humanity. The fact is that the more money, the more time, the more specialized Science throws into any kind of research... the less it learns. Scientific knowledge consists of unconnected information that is 99.99% useless. If a true effect of this scientific accumulation of knowledge is ever evaluated: it will destroy the entire basis of Science itself. Science tries to justify that huge waste of time and focus by a less than .001% positive return on its investments of research. Any sane businessman would fire every Scientist on the spot. Modern Human Civilization is a curious schizoid split of Polarized opposites. Trying to save and accumulate as much money as possible. And trying to waste and throw away as much saved money as fast and as uselessly as possible.

Would you be willing to study for thirty years just so you could manage to recite the alphabet? That is the kind of Negative feedback that Science thrives on. Spending five years to piece together a few fragments of bone. Spending months to go through mathematical permutations mixing chemicals. Science is the most non-learning human endeavor in all human history. More millions of man-hours have been wasted with no result, no learning, literally nothing, by Science: than any other human occupation. Science is one of the dullest, most boring occupations you can find. And it attracts the dullest, most boring people you can find also. It has already been Scientifically proven that the more useless unconnected information you accumulate. The more useless, unconnected experiences you accumulate. The more stupid, the unhappier and the more fearful you become. Which is a perfect description of the typical scientist.

The dynamics of diminishing returns has been scientifically proven in countless studies. When an animal learns at a rate of diminishing return: they get stupider and stop wanting to live. Yet these scientists who learn at a diminishing rate of return. These scientists who get progressively stupider and more boring: continue to be worshipped as wizards who will; eventually find a pill, or a cure, or have a new breakthrough, etc, ad nauseam.

For example the human body produces thousands of different kinds of a certain protein molecule. This does not include the millions of other molecules your body is creating every second. Only one class of protein molecule is creating thousands of different kinds of protein molecules every minute and every second of your life. And unbelievably: there is one jackass of a scientist who is spending his entire fucking life studying only two of them.

Do you think, that after spending his entire fucking life studying two of the thousands of different kinds of a certain class of protein molecules the human body creates every minute of your life: he or you will understand life any better? At this rate the sun will go extinct before we figure out how Life works. Do you think after spending his entire fucking life studying two protein molecules of a certain class: this scientist will understand anything about how the human body lives and functions any better? He could take one of his own turds and stare at it until he dies: and he will have learned just as much from it as he will learn from studying two certain protein molecules of a certain class all of his stupid life.

We religiously respect scientific idiots doing scientific things like this. Why? Because we have been brainwashed into believing that Science is Truth. Science is supposed to be honest. Science is supposed to be Logical. The religious brainwashed belief in the truthfulness, and honesty and logic of Science is pure bullshit. Once people realize how much they have been lied-to and hoodwinked by Science. All scientists will be killed on the spot as evil messengers of dangerous insane religious superstitions that are the worst poisonous lies a human can possibly believe-in.

The one-sided imbalanced insanity of Science is not even noticed by people. Outer curiosity... no inner curiosity. Huh? Outer Exploration... with completely no Inner Exploration. Outer focus... with no Inner Focus. The whore of Science worshipping the God of destructive mechanical advantage... so it can get more expensive toys to play-with. No human qualities, no human God, no human values... just this obsession with machines and facts.

Nowhere in the lexicon of human morals or ethics is there listed the lust for useless information and knowledge. Yet that is exactly what all gathering, research, and accumulation of human knowledge is. This addiction to useless knowledge is glorified, pursued even more addictively, more irrationally, and more insanely; because it is seen as an unquestioned good. It is taken for granted. An unquestioned force for the greater good of civilization. Nobody dares to investigate this lie and expose its total fallacy.

Modern civilized societies consider the addiction to memorizing trivia, or meaningless facts to be a hobby. Game shows glorify it. Civilization is addicted to accumulating useless information. Give anyone truly useful information; and they turn up their noses at it, because it is too unpleasant. Try to show anyone the truth about the why and how of anything; and most people will carefully avoid you, and never raise the subject ever again. Humans hate true logic. They hate truths they cannot get around and manipulate to suit themselves. Science is the most destructive, poisonous, toxic, wasteful accumulation of useless knowledge ever invented by civilized humans. Only when we stop worshipping this pointless accumulation of facts, will we discover that only the knowledge we ourselves personally accumulate, and digest, and assimilate into concentrated essences of useful wisdom: is positive and useful... Not the lies of Science.

488

Science is based upon championing the assumption that our animal instincts are not intelligent. That we should not live instinctively, or emotionally. That we should only live as mindless machines, using our brains to accumulate useless facts. That we should live irrationally by using scientific irrational assumptions and irrational logic to base our lives upon. This is the same irrational rationalization that civilization has for glorifying itself and expecting humans to worship it.

The Three Holy Constants of Western Science: Mass, Gravity, and the Speed of Light... are merely Christian cultural superstitions; abstracted to hide their origins and unconsciously expressed on a subconscious level.

It is merely the re-enactment, and sanctification of going to Church every Sunday. The day the Son, er the Sun is supposed to shine... Going to church En Masse... Listening to the Mass with all due Gravity... The Masses not allowed to smile or cough, or say a word. They are shown The Light... As the Scientists, er Priests; preach to them with all due Gravity...about the unquestioned Truths of the Holy Trinity. The masses sitting in darkened gloom. As they gaze up in awe at The Light shining through the colored glass of the church windows. The colored glass refracting natural sunlight and using it to glorify Christian Saints, Christian Myths, er Truths. The masses not allowed to go outside and worship the Sun... er, Son directly... Because it is too bright and would blind them if they gazed at Him, er it too long...

To give you an historical perspective on how sick and corrupt the origins of Science are: In Latin, the word 'fact' derives from the Latin word 'Feces': which means: shit. In Latin: the verb: 'to think', and the verb: 'to excrete' are the same word. Thoughts are just mental excretions. Nothing else. Should you worship all facts as being holy? Should you sanctify mental excretions and pieces of mental shit called facts? If you agree with that: then you are scientific. You are a scientist.

Unless you understand the history of the accumulation of these mental excretions of pure shit: you will not understand where they came from, what they are and what effect they have. Modern Western civilization is mostly a piled-up accumulation of mental shit that has been piling up for over two thousand years. Science is mostly a piled-up accumulation of facts that has been piling up for over two thousand years. To a large extent: the effect of civilization upon humans is the accumulation of the piled-up mental shit called 'Science'.

What is a religion? A religion is worshipping something unknown, mysterious. What does Science worship? What they do not understand. What they cannot explain. What they cannot find. Mysterious unknowns called mass, gravity, the speed of light. Science is nothing more than a 2,000 yr-old superstitious religion. Period.

Science obsesses over cancer because it does not understand it. How does Science try to explain and understand cancer?

'Oh. You're sick? Dying? What did you eat all your life? What kind of toxic polluted air did you breath all your life? What kind of toxic poisonous social environment did you live-in all your life? How sick and unhealthy were your parents? How toxic was their effect on you? What kind of sick, toxic attitudes and beliefs and superstitions did you live your life by? How sick was your emotional life? How sick was your mental life? How sick was your sexual life? How poisoned and polluted was everything you touched, ate, breathed-in, saw, felt, thought, did, said, etc?'

488

‘Oh.... Lets not look at all that.... That might make too much fucking common sense’
‘Lets blame it on some special nasty molecules. It’s certain teeny-tiny molecules inside your body, which are making you sick, nothing else.’

‘Why?’

‘Er, well... because we don’t want to look at any other possible explanation.’

‘Oh.’

‘You see: you are not responsible for your own health. you did not ruin your own health. The food you ate did not ruin your health. The parents who never gave you love; did not ruin your health. The poison brainwashing you swallowed and accepted unquestioningly; did not ruin your health. The millions of artificial chemicals, which you swallowed unknowingly by living inside an artificial thing called modern civilization; did not make you sick. No...’

‘It’s these pesky, mysterious molecules. It’s certain teeny-tiny evil cells inside your own body that are killing you. What you were born into and how you lived had nothing to do with it. The poison-filled industrial consumer society you live in is not killing you at all. Nooo!’

Talk about blatant, pathetic, stupid, blind denial of the obvious. What is this, except superstitious, religious hypocrisy? If you do not buy into religious pronouncements of scientific priests like doctors. If you tell them to go fuck themselves. If you take responsibility for your own health. If you take the time to do your own research with a critical awareness. If you bother to sift lies from truths. You can heal yourself of any cancer; period. In a billion creative different ways.

Proven cases of completely getting rid of cancer fill medical reports by the millions.

Only... there is no universal, duplicable, identical method or process of how to do it. That’s because every person is different, stupid! Every person has different things that are wrong with them! Every person has a different medical history. Every person has a different kind of cancer! There is no such thing as universal cure for any human ‘cancer’! It is a scientific hoax. Millions of different kinds of diseases and imbalances... that happen to have one... only one symptom in common. The multiplying of sick cells. Sick duplicate cells.

It is duplication itself that is the disease you scientific idiots. It is the disease of human civilization duplicating itself and overpopulating itself that is the disease. They duplicate for different unique reasons, in different ways in every case of this universal symptom; but the universal root cause is civilization itself. Mass manufacturing and duplication is a human cultural disease! Not just in human cells: in everything!

And yet these assholes, these imbeciles go on... trying to find a duplicable, identical pill or drug which is then duplicated by the millions and mass-manufactured...to cure cancer? Bullshit. And oh, by the way, sell these duplicated pills and make the corporations who fund this crap tons of money.

How fucking stupid can they be? Nevertheless, Scientists are that stupid. They are idiotic imbeciles. They are insane superstitious idiots. Labeling one symptom of duplication as a disease called ‘cancer’, and then trying to cure it by a duplicating chemical drugs. Without putting any of the actual facts and symptoms into any sane connected context. Peering into microscopes for some imaginary culprit. When it is the scientifically artificially mass-manufactured and duplicated chemicals which these insane asses invent and sell to the food and agricultural industries that are creating cancer in the first place.

But oh, we must never question Scientific research! We must never look at Sciences with any critical awareness. Horrors, we can't have that now; can we? Questioning the questioners. To find out that they are not questioning anything. The only reason people believe in Science; is because they have never studied it fully enough to fully understand it. The only reason people believe in Science; is because they swallow bullshit scientific explanations about things which they do not understand.

If you do not swallow shit you do not understand: you cannot be scientific. Because Science is pure shit.

Take Einstein's famous equation:  $E = M C^2$

E is supposed to stand for Energy. How much Energy is in something.

That is complete bullshit. E stands for Explosion. Not Energy. For thousands of years: Greek scientists and Roman Engineers used destructive explosions; and called it 'Energy'. The only 'Energy' they ever tried to measure was the energy of explosions.

As far as Science is concerned: all other kinds of energy do not exist. The only energy that exists is the energy of an explosion. Einstein was not trying to find out what Energy was. He was trying to measure the destructive of an explosion that was traveling at the speed of light away from the center of that explosion... on both sides. That is why the speed of light is 'squared' in his equation. Because that equation only describes the mass of an object exploding away from itself on both sides as a destructive explosion.

His famous equation merely describes the dynamics of an explosion; nothing else.

There are other scientific equations describing the explosion of things that do not explode away from a center at the speed of light. They use the same equation. Only they have completely different symbols-different values, and fractional relations to each other. The equation for the explosive force of dynamite is written using the same exact equation Einstein used. He never discovered or invented anything new. He was using the same equation that was used for explosion of dynamite: only he was using it not to explode chemicals: he was using it to explode atoms.

For 2000 years: the Greeks and Romans used the Science of Engineering to destroy things with. European scientists finally managed to harness the explosive energy of steam by trapping it inside a metal cylinder. Then American Engineers used that same metal cylinder to trap the destructive explosion of gasoline. The Einstein came up with the idea of destroying atoms: to unleash its destructive energy.

Only... um, er, gosh... nobody has found a cylinder strong enough to trap the destructive explosion of an atom. In fact: Einstein's equation is useless. It can't be used.

Except as a destructive explosion called the Atomic Bomb.

So; we are all supposed to worship and admire this imbecile, because he gave us the Atomic Bomb and nuclear weapons of mass destruction?

What else can Einstein's famous equation be used for? Nuclear reactors poisoning the Earth. Nuclear missiles, nuclear radiation, Three-Mile Island. Nuclear reactors melting down. Chernobyl. Heavy water. Water so poisoned with radioactive waste that it is pure death.

Humans have been worshipping the idea of being able to harness energy for 12,000 years. Humans have been worshipping Science for 2,000 years. The only Energy Science knows how to measure and use: is the energy of a destructive explosion.

The reason  $V$  the velocity of an object falling is squared... is the same reason Einstein's  $C$ ; the speed of light: is squared: except the two objects: the Earth and the falling object are traveling towards each other instead of away from each other...

Like this       $\longrightarrow$        $\longleftarrow$

Also... the mass of the Earth is so huge: that all of the motion is transferred to the small object, like this:

$\longrightarrow$        $\longleftarrow$

Does Science ever bother to explain its abstract bullshit so the ordinary person can understand it? No. Otherwise ordinary people might realize that Science is pure destruction.

Science is an insane accumulation of useless knowledge. Just like the first civilizations piled up stone blocks into temples and pyramids, and ziggurats... And just like these piled up pyramids of stone... the piled up facts of Science are useless. They only accumulate and rot. They are of no human use to anyone.

Look at what happened when electrostatic charges were found... they were put into Leyden jars... Jars, laden with an electrical charge that could jar you loose from your dulled deadened awareness by giving you a slight electric shock that is not harmful. It was used as a parlor trick to excite the ladies.

What kind of electrical charge was found first? Static electricity. Dead electricity. Electricity that could be accumulated.

Since then, Science has found ways to pile up huge massive energy potential differences... by building dams across rivers. So the water in the river becomes static. So it stops flowing. So the water becomes deadened and dull. So we only drink deadened water from a dam, not sprightly bubbling water from a free-flowing river, or stream. All this is done: so people can accumulate artificial power, and manipulate it. All this is done: for self-gratification and ease. All this is done: to make their lives physically easier...

Science is supposed to be good. Science is supposed to be progress. Take any innovation invented by science. Take any new invention of Science. Take all the innovations and inventions that Science touts and is proud of... and examine them critically. Examine the benefits of Science. What has Science done for mankind? Look at every single benefit it is supposed to have given humans... and then look at the other side of the equation... Look at the cost.

At what cost?

At what cost did the Belsen Burner help mankind? Why the cost of the cutting down of entire forests and pollution of the air of course. How much did the Belsen Burner destroy the Earth? England's entire land and people were poisoned by the black fumes which destroyed entire valleys until the rivers and streams ran black with coke and coal dust. At what cost did the Nuclear reactor help mankind? Why the cost of poisoning groundwater and rivers and creating nuclear waste we don't know what to do with of course. What good did the Nuclear reactor give to the Earth? Nothing except death. At what cost did the plow help mankind? Why turning the fertile Crescent into a desert and a permanent dustbowl of course. At what cost did mechanized farming help mankind? Why creating too much food so unwanted, unneeded billions of extra humans could overpopulate the Earth even more than before. At what cost has mechanized farming ravaged and destroyed the Earth? Why the cost of the destruction of living soil and all the eco-systems and plants and animals and insects and birds of course. What was the cost of all this Science and technology to the Earth? Look at every benefit scientific technology has given to humans... and then look at the cost of that benefit. Look at ALL of the hidden, covered up costs. At what cost was the benefit of dynamite to the Earth? And to mankind? What has Science cost the Earth? What has Science cost all living creatures on the Earth? Then look at the meager, puny benefit compared to the huge cost. Tally up all the benefits on one side... then tally up all the costs on the other side.

The root reasons for scientific invention and innovation has been to increase mankind's ability to kill and destroy not only the earth, but each other also. The main tactic used to destroy the Earth is the overpopulation of humans. The root reason for the most recent explosion of human overpopulation in the last century can be traced back to the inventions of Science and technology. Without William Mulholland's engineering/scientific miracle of stealing an entire river's water from the Owen's Valley and transferring it 419 miles south to Los Angeles, and then stealing water from the Colorado River and sending it 137 miles to Los Angeles: Los Angeles could have not grown to a population of more than 1-2 million people. As it is... similar scientific engineering feats around the world were and still are responsible of the overpopulation of the world's cities. These supposed altruistic use of Science and engineering earned both of these fields the common misperception that Science, and engineering, nay, all of Science and Engineering is done solely for the good of mankind. The exact opposite is true. The human species was never meant to live in overpopulated cities and it was never designed to overpopulate the Earth. The result in this overpopulation has been a steady accelerating deterioration and degradation in both the quality and health of all Life on Earth, which also unavoidably includes the human species. By continually robbing Peter to pay Paul:... by this very idea! The total insane arrogance, that all the limited resources of the entire earth should rightly be stolen and exploited by us... and all the rest of the living creatures on Earth can go to hell or into extinction... is such a mind-boggling irrational bit of smug, insane hubris I cannot begin to describe how totally crazy this idea is. The very use of the term; 'Exploitation of natural resources... once a common term, has been replaced with the politically correct term: 'allocation of natural resources'... to make sure that educated people will not become aware of just truly monstrous this exploitation. which is going on all over the world by humans. actually is.

Here is another example of the evil which Science is guilty of: One major reason for the population explosion of the last century was the invention of the 'Haber-Bosch process' which enabled industrialized farming to explode and feed more people than ever before. Without the use of chemical fertilizers: nitrates to be specific: international globalist agri-business corporations would never have been created: in fact they couldn't have been created because that couldn't have artificially fertilized their huge tracts of land with cheap, nitrate-based man-made chemical fertilizer. Without this huge sudden increase in the food supplies of the world, human overpopulation of the Earth would never have risen from 1.6 billion to 6 billion in such a short time. But that was only a byproduct of the Bosch process after WW2. The Haber-Bosch process fueled the German WW1 war effort by making them able to keep producing high-grade explosive munitions and was used by both sides in WW2 to manufacture their explosive armaments. It was not until after WW2 that this process was switched to manufacture chemical fertilizer. As usual... mankind used this new scientific process in the most destructive way possible just like Nobel's invention of dynamite was used; first to kill humans with... and only later to kill other living organisms. The fact is using chemical fertilizer destroys living organisms in the soil. It allows farmers and huge agri-business to overplant, and over-use and plant the same crops without paying the price of soil exhaustion, without being forced into conserving all the natural habitats and insects and organisms of the living soil. All the soil in these industrialized farms is dead: as dead and as empty of life-giving energy as the chemicals and pesticides they use to kill all life with on these farming lands. The food produced by this industrialized method became so empty of nutritional value that the organic farming movement as a counter-culture to the malnutrition caused by using chemical fertilizer in an attempt to bring back people to a healthier way farming and living.

The whitewashing of Science's true destructiveness was cunningly reversed by Nobel creating a public relations gimmick, an award ritual that is now a household name: the Nobel Prize Awards hailing the worst inventions of hell as greatest leaps forward for the benefit of all mankind. The fact is, that without the Haber-Bosch process: WW1 would have ended years sooner and WW2 would never have destroyed all of Europe. But that's only the tip of the iceberg when it comes to producing ammonium which is the main ingredient used to produce nitrates. In order to produce one lb of chemical fertilizer, it takes 5 lbs of oil to make it because of the enormous heat and pressure which is needed to make it. In fact the industrial process for creating nitrates alone takes up 1% of all the world's energy today. And that doesn't even include the nitrates used in weapons manufacturing. By continually robbing Peter to pay Paul, and sweeping the actual horrible cost and waste of these scientific horrors under the carpet, the Haber-Bosch process was one of the main reasons for the sudden need for oil after WW2. By wasting 5lbs of oil to get 1 lb of artificial fertilizer; we are depleting all the limited natural resources of the world, killing the soil of all its living organisms, creating huge international corporations whose agenda is the bottom-line; the lowest form of human greed in existence, creating huge stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction, destroying the small farmers of the world, putting them out of business so they are forced to move into huge overpopulated cities in order o make a living, leaking trillions of excess tons greenhouses gases into the atmosphere which has caused the Global Warming crisis which now threatens to destroy the entire world including human civilization while depleting all the natural gas reserves and oil reserves of the world... and for what!? Just to add an extra 2 more billion humans on this planet? Gee... that makes a lot of sense..

But that is only the tip of the iceberg when it comes to the pure insane destructiveness of Science... The high explosives of WW1 and WW2 was bad enough... but then at the end of WW2 came the invention of the atomic bomb.

How did we ever get to the point of worshipping and admiring our ability to blow up the entire Earth by nuclear bombs? How insane is this human ape who actually worships and admires only the power to destroy and nothing else? The utter insanity of stockpiling nuclear weapons of mass destruction which if used... will guarantee the complete end not only of all human life on earth, but nearly every other living creature on earth as well? Whose decision was it to make the inventor of this thing, the most famous, revered, worshipped, admired, pre-eminent scientist ever born? The very fact that Science has glorified Albert Einstein to the point of sainthood speaks of their utter evilness and the utter evilness what Science actually is. The inventors of death and destruction: the inventors of nuclear holocaust and nuclear death, the inventors of the global extinction of all life on earth, the inventors of this ability... should by rights be consigned to the pits of Hell and be held up as examples of the worst human monsters ever born in the history of the Earth. These people can be and should be held individually responsible for what they created. Would you want to be responsible for the destruction of the earth? Would you be proud if the only thing you contributed to the well-being of humanity is the ability to wipe out life on earth? What is this insane worship of the power of destruction and the inventors of mass death? Why do humans even tolerate the existence of these things from hell?

Every artificial chemical invented and manufactured by Dow Corp and Monsanto Corp produces only one thing: corpses. Dead poisoned bodies which otherwise might have led a healthy life without exposure to the abominations Science is frantically spewing out into the waters of the Earth, the soils of the Earth and the atmosphere of the Earth... All thanks to the great god of Science. When the exact opposite is true. Without Science: without all the abominations and inventions of scientific minds: we would never have been saddled with the problems of nuclear waste dumps and the stark impossibility of dumping the waste into the oceans and lakes and rivers as we have been doing for untold thousands of years; We would not be saddled with superpower military empires and nuclear weapons which nobody dares to use. Without Science we would not have the abomination of 14 million people crammed into one overpopulated area called a city. Without Science we would not have 90% of all the arable land on earth totally destroyed and covered by concrete and asphalt. We would not have the overfishing and trawling of the oceans of the world which is rapidly creating total death. We would not have the thousands of new diseases created by hospitals trying to kill microbes and viruses which mutate and become a hundred times more deadly, we would not have all the toxins and poisons in our food which make us sick and fat and addicted to these poisoned products, we would not have the industrialized slaughter of 100's of millions of animals in feedlots and the creation of yet more diseases and plagues from this inhuman abomination of depersonalized butchery. We would not have most of the forests of the world totally destroyed by the mass rape of logging companies so billions of overpopulated humans can have paper which they throw away into landfills. Without Science we would not have created all the billion's of problems we are now stuck with because the machinery and process which created these problems would never have been invented in the first place. The fact is you can trace every problem human's face today to an individual root-source of scientific invention. The insanity of the human race is that instead of vilifying and denouncing these individuals; they actually glorify these unspeakable things called scientists.

In order to understand why Science is evil you need to put Science into a larger understandable context: you need to put Science into a wider perspective which makes logical, practical sense. As one example of why all of Science is evil; take Galileo... His crime was to take all attention away from the Earth we live on and point the focus of Scientific attention out to the stars and the solar system. Because of him: Science changed to focus and has wasted its energy staring out at the Universe while ignoring what is going on here on Earth. The point is, there is a huge difference between believing the Universe rotates around the Earth and believing that the Earth is only one tiny insignificant speck floating amongst the infinite emptiness of Outer Space. The point is: whether you believe one way or the other: it is of no practical use whatsoever: It is useless knowledge, it has no practical application. In fact it would have been much better if the entire human race were still convinced that the sun revolves around the Earth. If Galileo had never discovered the relative facts of Astronomy, we humans would never have despoiled the Earth we live on with such blithe unfeeling abandon. If Galileo had never discovered that the sun does not revolve around the Earth: the Earth would be kept as the most sacred, the most important place in the Universe, and mankind would never have spent untold hundreds of trillions of dollars upon useless pointless scientific projects and ventures which have not returned one single useful; thing back to their investors except useless tidbits of useless facts which have no application and no use to any human ever born. We humans are born on Earth and we live on Earth and we die here on Earth: and any waste of energy or interest which does not address the problems here on Earth are an evil, a waste of time and money. Without Galileo: scientists would never have become worshipped as a religion, scientists would never have become this religious sect of crazy people who are wedded-to and bought and owned by the most evil elite of the world, used exclusively to innovate more horror and death on this Earth. Without Galileo discovering the sun did not revolve around the Earth, mankind would not have been able to invent all of the insane distractions and technology which is designed only to avoid facing the actual problems humans have here on Earth. Galileo's discovery should never have been discovered... Unless mankind learns to feed itself without starving most of its members, unless mankind learns how to live on Earth without destroying it, unless mankind learns how to get along with each other without creating atomic bombs and blowing up the entire planet, unless mankind puts its own house in order: it has no business whatsoever peering up into the skies and screwing around with pointless idiotic toys which cost hundreds of billions of precious dollars which could be put to far better use on this Earth. It is only when you look at what mankind and Science hasn't done and compare it to what mankind and Science has done, only when you look at the huge emptiness of what Science should have done and didn't do can you see how totally evil Science actually is. Both the telescope and the microscope have been used to avoid the real world we live in and avoid the real issues all humans face. By this trick of hocus-pocus: Science has hidden itself away from human society and barricaded itself inside its arcane jargon and insanities of detached mentalities detaching themselves from what they study to the point of madness. The entire hoax of science being the savior of mankind and its altruistic role in human society is complete and utter bunkum. Only now do we discover that humans are not designed to eat any dairy products and especially not milk. If Pasteur had never invented his process for sterilizing milk: humans would today be a thousand times healthier and the entire industry of mass manufactured food products would not have exploded leaving us with hundreds of new diseases which never existed in Pasteur's time. The fact of the matter is: there is no such thing as a good scientific invention: they are all inventions of the devil. None of them have improved the lot of mankind. Instead every single scientific innovation and invention has been used almost exclusively for war, mass death, mass destruction, killing and poisoning all living things on Earth... Does this sound like an extreme point of view? It is too extreme? No it is not. The history of what Science has actually invented and what science actually does stares you in the face. Without agriculture becoming industrialized, the human species, already severely overpopulating this planet, would never have increased this insane overpopulation by an extra four billion people in the last century. Without Science now turned into a worldwide religious belief system> human societies would never have invented the horrors of modern industrialized warfare, never mind the unused, waiting-to-be-exploded nuclear holocaust which awaits this planet, and will extinguish all Life on Earth. The idea that some culture, some religion which has invented the ability of a few madmen to destroy the entire fucking planet being good!? Is so insane a misperception of the actual truth; words cannot describe it. To be plain and logical: put all of the so-called advantages which science has given us... and weigh them against the nuclear bomb: which one weighs more in your conscience? Which one matters more? Which one outweighs the other? What good are paper napkins if the entire fucking planet is a radioactive gravesite? Killing trees so you can have paper napkins is not an intelligent way to live. When will human beings learn to develop an awareness large enough so they will realize the true consequences of their actions? How do we get rid of nuclear waste dumps without killing ourselves and poisoning the entire planet? Putting off these burning issues and questions as more and more nuclear waste accumulates by the hundreds of tons every year is totally fucking insane. And we have science to thank for this; nobody else.

Personally, I would rather do without Science, I would rather do without the ability to destroy the entire planet, in fact I would trade every single refrigerator and car and machine and gadget and gismo which Science has invented for a planet that cannot be destroyed by humans. If it comes to a fucking choice between frozen TV dinners and the planet: my logic tells me the Earth is more important than any fucking artificial advantage or luxury which science has provided. As far as I am concerned; anyone who tries to argue that we can have our cake and eat it too should have their heads cut off because they are completely full of shit and they are completely irrational and illogical. The health of the Earth comes before any miniscule fucking species living on it : if you can't understand that, you shouldn't be reading this book. Yet human beings are so irrational and illogical that nobody wants to even discuss this issue never mind face it and actually do something about it.

The Pyramidal Absolute

Every human culture ever formed has some kind of creation myth. The idea of a beginning, the concept of creation, assumes that something begins from or comes into being literally, magically from nothing... Without any prior history, or previous continuation. This is a complete fallacy. There is no such thing as something coming out of nothing. There is no such thing as an absolute beginning, or an absolute end to anything. The concept of any Original Creation of the Universe comes from the perception of absolute separation: which is also the perception of finiteness. You cannot possess the idea of the existence of an Original Creator, or Original Creation without the assumption of finiteness. This means that the idea of a Creator, the idea of an Absolute Origin, and the idea of a God: is all based upon the human perception of finiteness. Absolute separation-finiteness-the concept of the absolute-the perception of separateness: is all the same thing. It is purely a subjective human distortion of actuality. In essence: all creativity is merely an inevitable outcome of Actual Infinity. Creativity is not finite, it cannot come from a finite origin: it is merely one aspect of Actual Infinity. Infinite creativity cannot be finite. It cannot possess a finite beginning or end. There can be no Original Creation, no Original Creator, no God. The concept of any Absolute... much less the concept of any pyramidal absolute; is only a result of human awareness evolving to become a reflective, self-aware, pyramidally focused tool-brain.

All that needs to be done to prove the non-existence of a God or a Creator: is to prove that any human perception of absolute separation is false. All that needs to be done to disprove the concept of any absolute deity: is to prove that there is not, and never has been; an absolute beginning, or end to anything in our Universe.

The idea of finiteness can be demonstrated quite simply by a piece of string: if you have an absolute beginning to that string, and an absolute end to that piece of string, then there must be something that began, or started that string, along with an absolute end to it. However. If that string was something else before it was made into a string.

Then where is its absolute separateness?

If it was a hemp plant, or a piece of bark that was shredded, and woven into a piece of string: then if you want to establish any kind of finiteness, you have to assume that Time is finite. You have to assume that that Time had an absolute beginning, and will also have an absolute end. Unless you can prove that Time is finite: every idea of an original beginning, or end, or Original Creation, or Final Judgment is impossible. It cannot exist. Science has already proven that the Universe is Infinite. Everything in the Universe is Infinite. How can you have an Infinite Universe, with Infinite Energy, and Infinite Space....

And suddenly have Time be finite? Huh? It just does not make any sense. It is too silly and too absurd to even try and imagine such an impossibility.

Everything is connected to everything else. There is no such thing as an absolute separation. Science has proven this truth over and over again. We prove this each time we discover a connection where before, we only perceived separations. Actual Infinity automatically excludes finiteness. You cannot have anything finite within Actual Infinity,; unless it is absolutely separated from that Infinity.

Science is finally coming to the unanimous and correct conclusion that the Universe is indeed Infinite. But human thinking is still based upon finite logic, which cannot include the intuitive fact of Infinity. If God created the Universe: then who created God? Who created the act of creation? The fact is obvious: in order for there to be an Absolute Beginning, you must also have an Absolute Separation, and an Absolute End; you must have a Finite Logic. But in this context, Infinity cannot exist. If you want to posit an Absolute Beginning or an Absolute Creator: you must refute anything that is Infinite. If God exists, then Infinity cannot exist. Each definition excludes the other. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. If you wish to have a Creator who created something from a finite-absolute origin; and whose creation has a finite-absolute end: then you must rip this Creator and whatever it created... out of the Infinite Universe; and have Him exist separately, and absolutely from the Universe: and that is absurd.

If the Universe is Infinite, and God is also Infinite: then how can you separate these two kinds of Infinity? By anthropomorphizing God? By making him human? By turning him into an old man, giving orders to his people? Chastising all who disobey him, and demanding that they love him? That sounds like every bad father who ever raised a child in every dysfunctional family. Do you want to call Infinity: God? And claim that He has no beginning, and no end, but somehow this Infinite God created a finite Universe? But we already know the Universe is not finite. Or do you want to label God as a dysfunctionally bad parent? Or else: you have to believe in the idea of God as a non-human, abstract, unknowable, absolute: that is absolutely meaningless, inhuman and insane.

This is the insane contradiction that all Western Philosophy and Religion has tried to unsuccessfully make sense-of and rationalize. The idea of God cannot be both an unknowable meaningless abstract absolute, and an anthropomorphic Finite Father Authority figure.

Read the history of Western philosophy and Religion. It reaches its complete bankruptcy in Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, Sartre, Camus and Kafka. First came the realization that idea of a God is dead. Then the idea of a God was replaced with the idea of Superman as a God. Then all meaning in human existence quickly became meaningless and absurd. This evolution of thought happened in the 18th and 19th century in Europe. Once European Philosophy and Religion had rationally self-destructed itself into the insanity of absurd meaninglessness; the entire European civilization tried to destroy itself in two self-destroying World Wars. This is how powerful ideas are. This is how powerful the truth is. Even when they are only expressed by a small cultural elite at the top, and the rest of the masses only absorb it on an unconscious level and express it on a subconscious level, and project it on an unspoken, insane conscious level.

America is still trying to preserve their obsolete belief that God is a White man trying to kill everything. American Capitalism is trying to define the meaning of life in terms of greed, fear, hate, violence and dishonesty. As a result: every child born into that culture grows up deeply disturbed and deeply damaged.

The idea of God has merely become another consumer convenience. Whatever idea of God you want to imagine or believe-in: Hey-Presto! You have just instantly created your own personally rationalized versions of Absolute Truth that is right, and True, and no other human on Earth has the right to even disagree with your ideas of what is moral or right, or what your idea of God, or a Higher Power is. The result is a complete polar reversal. Immorality becomes moral. Unethical behavior becomes ethical. Evil becomes Good. Good becomes Evil. Black becomes White. White becomes Black. Up becomes Down, etc.

This is one problem with all religion and all abstract ideas: you can label anything as a God. No matter how you try to ask questions of this belief, you arrive at the same truth. There is no such thing as something coming out of nothing. This kind of hocus-pocus simply does not exist.

The fact of the matter is, that worshipping anything pyramidally to the exclusion of all else is an illogical absurdity. There is no such thing as any kind of infinite authority or infinite power that is pyramidalized in our Universe. It does not exist in the Universe. It only exists in civilization. The Universe does not work that way. Pyramidal Power and Pyramidal Authority are purely human concepts. The concept of an absolute end or beginning to anything, including any magical acts of creation originates from the concept of the absolute... from the concept of absolute separation: which is only a mistaken distortion of human perception and thinking.

This destroys every religious belief in existence. But there are very good, healthy, reasons why every creation-myth ever invented should be totally destroyed. It also destroys many cultural, religious, ethnic, national and racial barriers erected between people. It destroys human pride, arrogance and smugness. It destroys prejudice, it destroys bigotry, it destroys hypocrisy, it destroys racism, it destroys hate, it destroys fear. And it destroys all the excuses that believers use to wreak destruction upon others in the name of righteousness... or being more right than your enemy. It destroys the power to sanctify evil by any religious means. It destroys all institutionalized religious power. It reduces human awareness to a universal perception of pure, open, questioning, infinite Wonder. It reduces humans to a wondering-questioning-uncertain animal. It makes us more human.

It is only in the imagined condition of human finiteness that there can be any such thing as Immortality. The idea of something never changing comes from human awareness being unable to imagine any other condition except itself. Humans cannot imagine themselves not being human. They cannot imagine their own self-awareness ever changing into any other condition of existence or any other kind of energy. Immortality: the idea of an eternal unchanging deadness is not only anti-life, it not only flies in the face of everything we know about the universe, it reveals the universal human fear of death, i.e. Fear of separation, fear of the unknown, fear of change, fear of the Universe. It reveals that all humans exist in a condition of reflective fear. We are supposed to believe that after the sun has exploded and the Earth is no more: we will still float around somewhere as spirits, being immortal. Unchanged... Forever.

Doing what? Existing why? What for? While the rest of the Universe keeps on changing, leaving us behind in some insane, frozen time warp? If this were true: then we would all inevitably go stark, raving mad. Humans should be thankful that their souls are not immortal. The desire for some kind of immortality comes from purely a fear-based motivation. It makes no sense. It is not only a reflexive fear of dying, it is a reflexive fear of living. If everyone on Earth never died, then we could no longer have any more children. Then we would all be a bunch of ancient, thousand year-old relics with no new ideas, no new life, no new babies or children. We would become so boring and bored with each other;

there would no longer be any point to living except the fear of dying.

This is one example of the absurd rationalizations, and destructive self-delusions a mindless belief in God creates. How can you have an original, finite, absolute beginning of an Original Creation that must also have a finite, absolute end; and also have Immortality?... How can you have a finite piece of string that has a finite beginning, but conveniently has no end? How can that piece of string be finite and Infinite at the same time? It makes no sense because you are mixing up two different contexts. Our awareness makes everything around us seem to be finite. But when we explore this seeming finiteness: we find out that we cannot find any end, or beginning. So we just imagine that there had to be a beginning. Well: if you use your brain, and have a sense of Pure Wonder, this assumption is easily proven to be untrue. If you refuse to be honestly logical, and accept whatever is told you, or written in a book: you can be persuaded that black is white, and up is down.

Since we are mostly perceptually blind to the existence of Actual Infinity, except through our genetically programmed Sense of Pure Wonder: no matter how many times we discover that our finite ability to measure-separate something is only a false image-perception-condition, we keep on trying to do so. So we arbitrarily jumble up our abstractive ideas, pyramidalize them, project them out onto the Universe and believe that there is a God.

Anything which humans put their time-energy-thoughts-feelings into develops a life of its own. If people work to develop and sustain a certain belief: then that belief comes to exist in-and-of-itself. This does not mean a belief is actually true, it merely means that enough energy has been poured into it for it to exist. The old saying of: 'people believe what they want to believe', has always been true because human beliefs can be created out of pure imagination. If you pour all of your energy into a certain belief, if you connect-to, identify-with that belief: then whatever that belief does not include: you must reject. By this exclusion: any form of belief forces people to limit their own awareness and experience. Belief and Pure Wonder are totally different animals. Belief does not question. The very act of questioning, the slightest doubt can destroy any belief instantly. That is why believers cannot tolerate unbelievers. They are too threatened by them. On the other hand: Pure wonder never stops questioning. Belief is pyramidal: it worships-values-focuses pyramidally. Pure wonder does not focus pyramidally. It does not worship-value things pyramidally. To have faith in something is to refuse to question it. Belief is frozen-unchanging. Pure Wonder is always changing-learning-growing. All need for any kind of faith originates from fear: the fear of death. Without the Fear of Death, and the Fear of Dying, there would be no need or reason to have any kind of blind, unquestioning faith about anything. Faith is merely a pyramidalized, corrupted, selective Sense Of Wonder that accepts a finite limit to any understanding. Essentially faith means giving up on trying to understand anything in a larger context and settling for some blind, unexamined, unquestioned answer. It is a sanctification of ignorance and the refusal to explore or question beyond what is given as a pyramidal answer. And the basic reason any faith refuses to question its own constants, precepts, dogmas, assumptions, rationalizations, justifications, is because of fear... fear of the unknown, fear of the Universe, fear of not knowing, fear of uncertainty. Faith of a form of unawareness, a form of ignorance that is rooted in fears of all kinds.

Faith cannot exist in a state of Pure Wonder because there is no fear in such a state of awareness. A person existing in a state of pure wonder does not believe or disbelieve anything. When you exist in a state of Pure Wonder; the word 'belief' has no meaning whatsoever. Because then; you exist inside Actuality, you exist in the Actual Universe: you are not trapped inside any frozen, inner, abstract construct. You do not regard your own abstractions as being more real than what is actual. Then; you only perceive the Universe in categories of what you actually understand, and what you actually do not understand... what you have experienced and digested, and what you have not experienced and digested: not in absolute categories of belief.

But there is a huge gray area between these two actualities. If a person is continually learning in a state of Pure Wonder: then what they actually know and what they do not know is constantly changing: and also changing is the make-up of that gray in-between area. If you exist in a state of pure wonder: there can be no such thing as an absolute value-idea of anything. Any absolute concept which is pyramidal is opposed to the Sense of Pure Wonder.

The bottom line is that whatever particular culture or religion you have, just happens to be the one you grew up in and got used to. Your own particular beliefs or religion is an accident of geography and locale. If you were born anywhere else, you would end up having a completely different set of beliefs and values.

Because our entire training and teaching tells us to worship and obey our elders, our schools, our church, and our religion; we try to hold onto whatever what is comfortable for us. Anyone with any accumulated power, authority, status, knowledge or wealth, anyone who is an authority-figure is listened-to, valued, revered, respected, worshipped, etc. Besides: any kind of doubting, questioning, comparing, learning, changing, is difficult, hard, scary, painful, even terrifying. Change what you feel comfortable with? Change what you have been taught from birth, what you have supposedly learned from others? Then you would have to question your entire life... and who wants to do that willingly? Then you would have to question every book, every opinion, every authority and every authority figure. Then you would have to question not only your own parents, but you would have to question and doubt yourself continually, without letup... and who wants to do that willingly?

Religious beliefs are based upon conforming to your social norm. Religion is based upon the fear of dying, the fear of going to hell and the fear of being punished by some kind of angry, almighty authority figure. Religion and religious beliefs are based upon fears of all kinds. Once you remove those fears, you lose any need to be religious. Once you lose your need to conform, you also lose your need to believe the same things as others. Once you lose your fear of any authority, once you stop revering, worshipping any authority, you lose any need to be religious or have any religious values. If you do not fear others, if you do not care what they think: why should you get upset about what others believe or don't believe? Why not simply compare them, evaluate them and put them into as many perspectives as you can so you can understand it all better? But if you do that, then you threaten not only one belief, you threaten all of them. You threaten all culture, all religions, all authority, all governments, all power groups, all people who are comfortable with not bothering to ask, or doubt, or question, or challenge anything.

Religious conformity comes from intimidation, power, authority, fear, cowardice and dishonesty. It comes from the lack of wonder, the lack of honesty, the lack of courage to ask your own questions and make up your own mind regardless of what anyone else may tell you, or any book may tell you. Why should any religious text be regarded as the last word? Because it is old? Because it has stayed unchanged? How many books even older than the Hindu Upanishads, or the Jewish-Christian-Mohammedan Bible have been dumped and regarded as pure trash? Age alone is not a guarantor of knowledge, wisdom, or truth... or relevancy, or worth, or sanctity.

In fact the opposite is true. The older any idea-value-religious system is, the longer it does not change: the less relevant or useful it is in our ever-changing world. Until it takes religious scholars to study these books for years and somehow interpret them to the masses. And even then their knowledge is mostly useless and irrelevant. Unless you put that writing into its proper historical perspective and context. In which case: it becomes something that is relevant to the people who wrote it at that time, and the society they lived in.

How relevant is the way they once lived to how you live today? Can you find anything in this writing that is universally true? Is what was written thousands of years ago just as relevant to humans today as it was then? Was the writing even relevant at all to the people who lived at that time? Are they alive so you can ask them what they think of it? What if what was written thousands of years ago was written by some idiot who was mentally retarded? What if it was written by a religious fanatic who would be regarded today as a mentally insane weirdo? Would you still worship every word this nut case simply because by accident his writing was the only writing that survived?

Every library that held the wisest, most sacred texts of the ancient world was completely destroyed. Every book that was ever in those libraries was burned. We have no idea at all what the wisest people of that time believed or wrote. The few tiny scraps, which have survived, cannot ever reveal what was in these hundreds of destroyed thousands of books. The actual truth of our past is still a complete unknown. If you ever begin to research History, you will discover the abysmal lack of writing, and evidence from which modern historians base their reasoning upon. Always seeking the easiest, most convenient explanations that have nothing to do with the actual truth, or the actual historical past. So why believe anything they say?

Each person interprets everything differently; including books, and what they are supposed to mean. So why try to force a single, conformed interpretation down other people's throats? If any intelligent person understands the relativity of different people's interpretations; then why not admit that there is no such thing as an absolute anything....? Because if there are no absolutes then anyone can challenge and question anyone else's interpretation, anyone else's authority, anyone else's opinions: that's why.

And there goes the whole ball of wax, there goes all sacred social norms, sacred traditions, sacred customs, sacred beliefs, sacred institutions, sacred power structures, sacred hierarchies, etc.. There goes civilization down the drain. And we can't have that, now; can we? Then there would be chaos, change, upheaval... All conservatives constantly rave about the unseemly changes happening in their once-comfortable, unquestioned existence. But has this fear ever been proved true? Has it ever been tested? No. All that people have to do to stop any kind of change is hold up countless fears to galvanize reactionary masses to reject whatever they are not comfortable with.

Throughout human history: what has been the fate of the few, brave souls who were honest enough to question, or doubt, or challenge not everything, but only one small thing...? They were attacked, vilified, hated, feared, oppressed, censored, persecuted, jailed, killed, shot, hung and nailed to a cross. Does this mean that only if you are nailed to a cross, martyred and worshipped for 2 thousand years; that only then, are your dissenting values, views or ideas considered to be valid, or true? What if you are not nailed to a cross? Does this make your views any less valid and any less true than the ideas of Jesus? How many years do you have to be dead; before somebody realizes that you had a valid criticism or better idea that is not 2,000 years old?

For Westerners: Belief is mostly a matter of convenience. It has become just another one of their consumer choices. Picking a religion is like picking which cereal you want to eat. People believe what they feel comfortable believing. They believe whatever they want to. They believe whatever is most convenient, most expedient. Whatever justifies and rationalizes their own lives, whatever justifies and rationalizes their own egos. It is a spiritual-mental comfort addiction of the worst kind. How many people are willing to accept or admit anything they are not comfortable with? Regardless if it is true? How much time, effort, questioning, or wondering does anyone willingly undertake to reconsider, re-evaluate, compare, or put anything they are not completely certain of in a different light, a different perspective, and try to understand it better?

We pyramidalize our perception of the world in all kinds of ways, we pyramidalize our values and how we look at people. We glorify a baseball player because he can mechanically hit a ball with a bat, but blithely ignore the fact of him being divorced from his wife. Why? Because we value his mechanical tool-skills much more than any human skills he may have. In glorifying such people it does not matter what kind of person they actually are. So he's a lousy husband: but he's a great baseball player. Just because he isn't perfect is no reason for people not to worship him. The fact that there are millions of wiser, kinder, more intelligent, more decent people living in total obscurity is never focused on. The attempt to worship and glorify any abstract idea or any reflection of human power-authority is an example of the pyramidity of civilization. Whether it is an abstract idea, a culture, a religion, a football team, a supermodel, a national identity, or a 5,000 year-old Hindu god or a movie star; the attempt to glorify and worship anything pyramidally is universally prevalent in all civilized cultures and societies:.

Heroic Sagas are mirrors of civilization. They are full of all the civilized vices of selfishness, greed, hate, egoism, pride, and revenge, and hate. What we call History Books were mostly the accounts of the winners who recorded their triumphs by burying the truth. If the rulers did not like what had been written about him, then they simply killed the writer, threw the Book into the garbage, hired or ordered some other vassal to write a better version of propaganda. Historians have never changed their culture of servile hypocrisy...of only writing what is culturally expedient and popular at the time. Whatever is not in vogue, is not written about.

There is a reason for everything that exists inside civilization. The gratuitous violence of mass media mirrors the violence civilization is wreaking upon the living earth. Rather than throw up our hands in horror, we should understand it: not refuse to even look at it. The appetite for vicarious violence has existed ever since people could gather to watch some form of cruelty or brutality being done as it had been to them in some manner... or as they wished they could do it to others in some manner. You can never escape these cultural truths-myths unless you face it, heal it, and experience it: not reflect-it, or project-it. When people crave excitement because they are bored, they will watch anything that excites them. And what is more exciting is what you fear the most? Cowards are vicariously excited by watching what they do not have the courage to face.

The idea that in order to be properly, religiously, moral and ethical one must be an honest, God-fearing person... that one must fear God; is absurd. To believe that honesty originates from fear; is an obscene fallacy. Honesty comes from Courage: not hate cowardice or fear. Fear cannot force people to be honest: it can only force them into dishonesty. Whether absolute power is translated into the absolute authority of a dictator like Stalin, or the absolute spiritual authority of a God; one common result is that it demands to be feared. If you remove the concept of fear from spirituality, you must also remove the concepts of hate, dishonesty and worship also... and you must also remove the idea of an all-powerful God. There are no exceptions to the dynamics of power, authority, or any pyramidal, hierarchical structure, concept, or belief-system: they are all intrinsically corrupt. The fundamental sin of any form of worship is: by valuing anything or anybody more than yourself, you de-value your own humanity.

Conversely, by valuing your own life more than all of Life: you de-value all living things. The only logical form of valuing life which makes sense is to value all of life equally. If what you value is life, and not death: then it makes no sense to die for something unless it promotes life. But not just one life or the life of only one species: all of Life.

The practical question of ethics is simple. Do you separate more than you connect? Or do you connect more than you separate? If you promote and help to create more life than you destroy: then you are being good. If you help destroy more life than you help create: you are being evil. If you neither promote nor destroy life, then you are not good or evil: you are merely useless. If your values are life-oriented, you will have no need or urge to worship anything. Then you will just try to live as fully and as well as you can: without doing any harm to other living things. Your ethics depends upon your level of awareness, your level of Pure Wonder and how honest and logical you are.

All sanctity, all sacredness, all holiness; is merely a Pyramidalized form of Wonder. It is a distorted, stunted sense of Wonder that is selective, misleading and false. It is a poisoned, twisted, irrational sense of Wonder that creates lies, destructive self-delusions and insane belief systems. If you critically examine any Pyramidal form of holiness: you find that its logic has thousands of holes in it that leak so badly, it is not even funny. Why do you think all organized Religions cannot stand to be criticized? Because if they allowed people to point out the fallacies of their dogmas, their churches would collapse, and they would be laughed out of existence. Their defense is to create so much artificial awe, and pyramidal wonder, and holiness: that nobody is allowed to smile or laugh inside a holy place of worship. That is one sickness all pyramidal holiness creates. It creates dull, serious people who do not know how to smile or laugh at whatever they deem holy and sacred. It creates blindness in the worshipper. It dehumanizes them by killing all fun. It makes all fun, and smiling, and laughter, and happiness forbidden. Unless you are possessed by some Spirit. Have you ever seen a person possessed by a Holy Spirit be aware of anything around them except their own holiness? What is the sense in walking around thinking: "Oh... How Holy I am. Nobody can feel how holy I feel. I am better than everyone else, because I am possessed of the Holy Spirit."

Why do you think born-again Christians are so despised, and shunned by other religious people? Why do you think other people pity their fanatical blindness? Because other people see how stupid, boring, unintelligent, and silly they actually are; simply because they have no sense of humor about their own sacred beliefs. Others see how born-again Christians are blind to their own silliness and their stupidities. Simply because they are unable to laugh at themselves and their own holiness and their own idiotic dogmas. Simply because they have no perspective, on their own beliefs they have lost all critical awareness, and cannot think for themselves, or feel for themselves. They have to be told what to think, and told what to feel. The human selective sense of sacredness is simply a lack of reflective intelligence. If you can put something: into perspective, it stops being sacred.

What has the pyramidal sense of Wonder has created? Ten Thousand years of people being told what to do, what to think, and what to feel. Ten thousand years of being told exactly how to do something, exactly how to think about something, being told exactly how to feel about something... and doing exactly as they are told. That is what human pyramidal focus creates: a pyramidal structure with an elite who must be worshipped and revered. Civilization creates Pyramidal belief systems that are sanctified pyramidally, and worshipped pyramidally... these pyramidal aspects are all reflections of each other. They are all duplicated dynamics that work the same way... only they exist under different conditions, in different structures, on different energy levels... that make them only superficially different. But the basic dynamic is the same.

Abstraction and Actuality

The problem with civilization is the abstraction of values: taking anything of value and translating it into a symbol. By using our tool-brains to re-reflect between what is abstract, and what is actual, we become caught up in all of this manipulation; until we lose sight of the causal root of this process. We lose sight of where the symbol originally came from and what it first actually meant. And what it actually originally symbolized. The result is: humans living by values, which are represented by symbols: until the symbol itself becomes the value. Until what is actually valuable is lost, forgotten, ignored: not valued. Until only the abstraction is left.

A perfect example of this is money. Money is an abstract symbol representing actual wealth, actual power, actual physical things. It can be translated into owning a house, a car: but what is being valued? A symbol? A symbol that represents a potential of something to be owned or used? The possible translation into an actual car, and actual house? Or the power of choice it represents: of choosing which car, which house? Or both? Or merely the freedom of choice? As yet unrealized? So... what does that produce? The urge to amass more money, to possess a larger potential of power, of choice, of freedom, of wealth? But that potential of wealth or power is not actual power or wealth unless it is translated into something that is actual: by acting, by wielding that power, by making a choice, performing an action, by buying and driving the car. If that potential power or wealth is not used, not realized: it remains only a piece of paper, a symbol that is actually completely worthless. And therein lies the entire mess and problem of human abstraction and human civilization: translating actual things into symbols, and then back again. Why? Because people are driven by the fear of poverty, the need to accumulate: greed.

If properly used: money increases self-confidence and self-esteem. It increases a person's range of choices, power, wealth. Yet improperly used, or not used at all: it becomes a corrupting influence or worthless. It is how you use it or don't use it that determines its effect. When you do not use that wealth beneficially for others and yourself; the hoarding of wealth is not beneficial to others or to you. Yet that is precisely what all business, and capitalism is about: the hoarding of wealth and power. So what ends up being valued? Something actual? A car? A house? The potential of power or wealth? Or merely the symbol itself and not what it represents? Or merely the idea of safety and security that this accumulation represents? Or merely the idea of Accumulation itself as a mindless, dogmatic belief system? And why? Fear of poverty? Fear of powerlessness? Fear of others? The only reason this dynamic of hoarding exists, the only reason it is corrupt, is because it is based upon the principle of tool-use... one-sided splitting: i.e. Accumulation.

If wealth is a fluid energy-flow and can be translated into a host of choices-things-power-social status-security-self confidence-self esteem... what does that mean? That it supposedly becomes a symbol for all things, all values? How closely is money allied to the growth of confidence, power, self-esteem? Does money produce these actual benefits? Or does it merely represent a fear? The fear of being poor? Or the need for security? Does it represent the true level of one's own actual self-esteem? Or merely a fake self-esteem? An artificial value-system representing how much a human being is worth? Which of these does money represent? Does money represent the actual worth of a human being? The actual worth of a human life?

What does money represent? The answer is different for different reasons for different people. And how that works, and why it works is different also: at different times, in different situations, with different motives, urges, beliefs, values, assumptions, cultures, realities, norms, etc... Here you have a sliding scale of vague, subtle, non-measurable factors... beginning from one end of the spectrum to the other; of what is abstract and what is actual.

How and why is an abstraction translated into an actuality? And vice versa? What is the process? The dynamic? What are the effects? The consequences? How and why does money work as the main value-system of human civilization? And what does it produce?

Does a millionaire have a higher level of self-confidence and self-esteem than a homeless person because he has more money? Or is it the other way around? And if so: why? How are the human values of worth, self-confidence and self-esteem translated into money? How are the human values of worth, confidence and self-esteem translated into the stock market? How is hate-fear-greed translated into money? How is greed translated into the stock market? Which is driving which? In what ways? Which factors influence which other factors?

Actual physical catastrophes can cripple an economy and traumatize a Nation's well-being. But that trauma does not have to be a physical blow to the infrastructure of that system like a hurricane, or a flood. It can also be a mental-emotional trauma of its psyche. It can be a single catastrophic event that is magnified out of proportion to its actual significance. Like the failure of a large financial venture, or a bank... or a scandal of corruption, or a terrorist attack on New York. Triggering fear...resulting in a loss of confidence in the market. The human element can trigger a wave of panic that catches and spreads: which can lead to a collapse of the market.

If the economy is based upon ephemeral human factors of self-confidence, fear, greed, courage, panic... and regardless of any actual wealth or power: it depends on human values in order to survive; then what does money represent? A symbol of human confidence, self-esteem? A symbol that represents an actual car, a house? A symbol of potential growth, potential confidence? Does it represent human feelings, outlooks? Or does it represent dead machines and houses and things? Does the possession of more money represent a higher self-esteem? Or does a higher self-esteem end up being represented by more money? In the stock market: does money represent confidence, or does confidence represent money? Does fear represent a lack of money, or does a lack of money represent fear? What is being represented by what? Which is reflecting the other? In which order? How does this all work?... Why? How does the reflecting dynamic of creative potential-abstraction-actualization-concretion work? How and why is abstraction turned into something that is actual? And vice versa? These are some of the questions that need to be asked if we want to understand ourselves and the civilization we exist in. Because the main energy flow-conduit for this re-re-reflection between the abstract and the actual in civilization is money. And unless we understand how and why it works, we will remain victims of our own abstractions.

This re-reflection between the abstract and the actual is so intricate, so mixed together, so inseparable from each other: that it becomes irrelevant if money represents something actual or only the potential of what could be actual... or whether it represents an abstraction or merely the potential of an abstraction. Money itself becomes the main conduit for most of the energy-flow of human life-energy and human lives. Until human worth becomes secondary to tool worth. Until money becomes more important than people.

Then what do you have? You have people whose lives and value-systems are determined not by the blood that flows through their veins: but the health of their bank accounts. Money becomes the blood of life. Money replaces blood as being more necessary for survival. Until money comes to replace other human factors in this energy-flow. Until money becomes the main vehicle for human confidence, self-esteem, fear, greed, panic, self-worth. Until tool-energy... all of the man-hours poured into the making of money becomes more powerful than life-energy. Because each person has poured most of his life into tool-energy. He has spent more of his time-life-energy being a tool than being human. He has developed his tool-potential of being a good machine rather than being a good human. He has failed to develop his human attributes of the ability to love, to give, his courage, his honesty, his sense of wonder. Until the tool-value of money becomes more important than the life-value of living. Until you get stockbrokers jumping out of windows because their financial health has been destroyed. And that produces the human travesty of people being valued only for how much money they can make or how much money they have. Not how loving, how honest or how courageous they are. Not how good they are as parents, how helpful they are, how much fun they are, how much of a joy to be with, or how wise they are, how intelligent they are, how skilled they are at anything... or how much others need them, like them, value them, love them. The dehumanization of modern capitalistic civilization is obvious: in the main validation you get for being alive is a paycheck... money for work, if the only positive feedback you get is from receiving money instead of love... then being human will take second priority every time.

That is the imbalance of over-intensive tool-use. That is the imbalance of people being more tool-like than human-like. That is the basic corruption of human values that comes from using tools, from using our brains only as tools, from the dominance of abstraction in our lives, from people translating abstractions into actuality and vice versa. And why? Because inside the norms of any civilized society, human awareness is not sensitized or expanded enough to become fully aware of itself, of its own self-corruption. People do not even understand that they live in two different worlds simultaneously: the world of the abstract and the world of the actual. And these two worlds are being constantly re-reflected between each other. Producing what is called reality, normality... producing a distorted, blind non-awareness of what is happening and why it is happening and how.

The catastrophe of this non-awareness is that if you cannot differentiate between what is abstract and what is actual: you lose perspective on what it means to be human; you lose sight of your own humanity. Then you have people valuing their own life and the lives of others based upon how much money they have. Until you get a dehumanized society that cares more about money than human lives. Until you get a capitalistic engine of pure greed overtaking the entire human race. Until greed and constant, unending accumulation becomes the life-blood of every human economy on the face of the Earth.

But ultimately, the fact remains that you cannot separate Abstraction from Actuality. You cannot separate the abstract values people possess from the actual Universe we all live in. You cannot separate the actual confidence and self-esteem you possess from how much money you have or earn: each affects the other. You cannot separate being useful as a tool from how useful you are as a human. Each value-system of inner and outer worth reflects and re-reflects back and forth between each other... giving you the puzzle of what-affects-what. Does poverty produce low self-esteem? Or does low self-esteem produce poverty? If lack of love, caring nurturing, produces poor self-esteem: then people need to spend more time caring for their children and more time developing their humanity. But if the self-esteem of a poor person is inextricably linked to how useful they are at a tool-job: how do you improve their self-esteem? By making single parents work 50 hrs a week so they cannot properly look after their own children? Only when both inner and outer values balance and coincide harmoniously with each other can people live without conflict: at peace with themselves and with others.

So: how do you get the tool-values of civilization i.e. money, to coincide with the human values of love-courage-honesty-wonder-fun? How do you balance using tools with being human? By giving children videogames and computers, so they can be trained to become perfect little machines themselves? By having both parents working so the children never get enough guidance, or attention, or love, or nurturing? By turning most adult of existence into the drudgery of non-creative work? Why should we turn ourselves into tools?

It is clear what global capitalization in the name of the World Bank, NAFTA, and World Trade Agreements are doing: more and more wealth is being sucked out of local economies to feed the multinational corporations: as they try to garner every last cent of profit, using every political, legal, quasi-legal, illegal, and corrupt advantage possible. As a result, with less money in circulation: there is less money to go around. And so the huge majority of the human population keeps on accumulating and getting poorer: while the corporations get fatter and keep on merging into bigger, richer concentrations of wealth. This reverse pyramidal dynamic of the concentration of wealth, power, knowledge and social standing being accumulated at the top of civilization's structures has not changed, and will not change as long as the entire human race takes this state of affairs for granted.

The curse of all greed; from ancient Kings, to Robber Barons, to multinational corporations is that it sucks most of the wealth out of any economy: the life-blood of that economy is not allowed to recycle-flow back, thus it cannot regenerate itself as natural ecosystems do. Until you get the inevitable results of all that money-sucking... sucking people's life-energy in the form of goods, or services, or dollars, or resources, materials, houses, land etc... until you get poorer people, lower living standards, wide-spread poverty, strikes, lay-offs, recessions, starving masses, and massive, global, economic, human suffering. As I said before; the dynamic of accumulation is not cyclic: it never balances, it never regenerates.

It is only when you study the entire economic process, all of its ramifications, effects and consequences that you can get a true perspective on the true worth and cost of anything. The cost of having a global consumer culture is all pervading... from the cost of mediocritized minds and cultures, the cost of consumers being brainwashed to spend money. To the cost of lost human potential and creativity, the cost in loss of choice and diversity, the cost in global environmental destruction, in saddling future generations with the horrific problems of pollution, landfills, polluted groundwater, toxic waste that cannot be recycled, the cost of future recycling, waste cleanup, the cost of all the gradual environmental degradation which takes years to be noticed, the cost of the poverty and misery of billions of human souls, the cost of comfort-addicted arrogance, smugness, the cost of the total indifference and disconnect between the rich and the poor; just to name a few aspects that must be included into the cost of anything that is manufactured and sold on a mass basis in our capitalistic system. However, in a few upscale American communities like Ithaca, New York; a local currency has been introduced to prevent the flow of money-wealth-man-hours from leaving the community. It has been increasingly accepted, and used: mainly due to the obvious benefits for all the local people who use it. Economic systems should be designed to work just like eco-systems: as dynamically balanced, regenerating structures; not as wastelands of opportunity to be vacuumed up so all the available wealth can be sucked into the fewest hands and sent elsewhere.

However, this exception to the capitalistic rule and norm of how the world does business is only an incremental watering down of the reverse pyramidal flow of capital in all of civilization. It is only an exception in an elite area, of an elite nation, which has managed to slightly slow down in one small town: the steady draining of its wealth out into the global pyramidal economy. For the encroaching monster of globalized corporate power and wealth to ever be brought under control, it would take far more intelligent, integrated, and coordinated business practices by literally all the people in the world to consciously live in a non-pyramidal fiscal lifestyle. There are simply too many monopolized industries that have a stranglehold on their market niche to ever effectively decentralize any economy.

The trend towards globalization, the race for market share, for consumer dollars, for profits, will never be stopped by a few slightly enlightened rich communities. Only when everybody on this Earth is both fiscally and ethically educated, and knows exactly where their hard-earned dollars are going; and how they are being used, and why they are being used; can there ever be a consumer revolution against what consumers think are the cheapest, most technologically advanced, most convenient goods and services. The fact is, that all profit systems, all monetary systems, all economic systems are designed and geared to concentrate and funnel as much human life-energy, man-hours, expertise, wealth, resources into the fewest, most expensive goods, products, and services for the benefit of the fewest people so they can make a maximum profit. Why sell a million individual garnets, when you can make even more profit much faster and far easier by selling only one, huge, expensive diamond? Why build HUD apartments when you can make more profit faster and easier building suburban homes? Why build affordable, cheap housing for dozens of middle-income families when you can make more profit easier and faster by building more expensive houses for richer people? Why bother trying to price your goods or services for the billions of poor when it is the rich and wealthy who have all the money? And why are they wealthy? Because they don't want to be poor. The reason for poverty is wealth. The reason for wealth is poverty. The engine driving this profit-greed-fear-advantage dynamic is basically only one thing: accumulation.

Like any other form of energy, human life-energy should be studied just as openly and thoroughly as solar energy or atomic energy; and that means studying the entire process, not just bits and pieces of it. But whatever humans spend their lives-hours on... when the products of all that life-energy is converted into money: the trail disappears. Nobody is allowed to trace what happens to all this energy, how it is used, or its effects on human societies, or the Earth. Scientists spend their whole lives examining the energy flows of the Outer Universe; but we refuse to examine the energy flow our own monetary practices. Instead, all monetary accumulation is shrouded in secrecy.

Human-Worth, And Tool-Worth

In order to become human. In order to not become a machine. You must separate your human activities from your tool activities. You must separate your human usefulness from your tool usefulness. You must separate how you use your mind-body-heart-soul... mechanically, or humanly. Then after you do that: you must separate all the values and usefulness in each of these two categories: and give them all relative priorities. And make clear distinctions between the two categories. So you set your own values, and your own self-image, and your self esteem into proper perspective. And have your entire society do the same. So all personal and public and social values are clearly marked, and rated, and measured against each other. Only then can you ever separate your tool self-esteem from your human self-esteem.

Identity vs. Diversity

The evolution of the human tool-brain can be seen as a process of increasing abstraction. The more humans are surrounded by the tool environment of civilization, the less contact they have with nature-life and other living things. The more they develop their tool-brain, the less they develop their ability to integrate and balance themselves. The more segmentive their awareness becomes, the less they develop their sense of wonder. This has been going on in all levels, in all ways, for at least 10,000 Years.

One flaw of human abstract perception has to do with the effect of humans acquiring language. By being able to use abstract symbols-sounds-words in order to represent something, this automatically presupposes that whatever is represented is absolutely separate from anything else in its environment, (hand, arm, shoulder) and that these symbols-words come to signify all other similar objects-phenomenon. The word chair comes to mean any and all chairs. The word lion comes to mean any and all lions. The verb: to jump, comes to mean all kinds of jumping. This ability of abstract identification has steeped human awareness in the perception of identity. If you can call anything with three or four legs that you can sit on a chair, then you can easily ignore any actual differences involved. Then there are the limitations of our own senses. If something looks the same, we assume that it is. Science has proven this to be a fallacy. No two blades of grasses are the same. No two snowflakes are the same. No two grains of sand are the same. No two atoms are the same. They are all expressions and examples of Actual Infinity. They are all examples of Infinite Diversity and Infinite Creativity. Simply because symbols can be generally used to mean roughly the same thing; human perception is degraded enough to think-perceive that all air is the same, all apples are the same, all leaves are the same.

Human language is a very general, very broad, very vague, imperfect form of communication. It is very easy to misuse the meaning of words. Merely the inflection of a word, emphasizing a certain point, the slightest exaggeration, a change in the wording, can easily be misconstrued. This book is no exception. In order to underline contrasts and stress differences: throughout this book, I myself use words like: Life, Death, Normality, Reality in an absolute fashion or manner. But the fact remains, that the only absolute statement that can be made: is that there are no absolutes. There is no such thing as an absolute. It does not exist. It has never existed. It will never exist. It cannot exist.

There is no such thing as an absolute difference between something that is living, and something that is dead. The human body itself is not 100 percent alive. Our tooth enamel is quite dead. Our bone structure is semi-dead. Our skin is partially dead, our nails and hair are dead... we are full of dead and dying cells. It is only generally, that we can call ourselves alive.

All Science is based upon the same fallacy of identity: it attempts to create identical conditions so it can measure something accurately. What science actually does is to create similar conditions to the limit of its physical abilities. This allows science to differentiate certain effects-energies, and get to understand roughly how and why these isolated phenomenon work... out-of-context... instead of how they actually work in context to all that they are usually connected-to.

A perfect example is strands of DNA molecules. When they are dead, and inspected under a microscope; they have molecular bonds at regular intervals holding the two matching helix spirals together. But... there are no molecular bonds holding two living strands of DNA together. These bonds only appear when the DNA is dead, and disappear when it is back inside a living cell. In fact: Science does not even know this.

Why?

Because the only way they can study DNA is by taking the living DNA out of the living cell and killing it before they can put it under their microscopes. Science can never fully understand the bonding structures of any living cell because they must first kill it so they can study it. The result is that they wind up understanding only dead things... not living things. Science is only good for studying dead things. Its attempts to study living things are mostly a hashed up mix of superstitions, crazy theories and specialized studies that produce meaningless unconnected, useless facts. The only thing Science is good for, is a rough-crude-general understanding of certain mechanical-dead phenomenon.

The only time a scientific experiment is successful is when it can be duplicated: and recorded as an abstraction. Then this knowledge is used in an attempt to mirror the abstractive symbol itself. If a successful experiment results in x distance covered in y period of time; then every other scientist tries to see if they can get the same symbol, the same x, the same y value in a duplicated experiment. Of course, scientific experiments never produce identical results. Why? Because they are never done with identical materials, or in identical conditions, or identical substances, or chemicals, or molecules, or atoms. So all of the results are different. All they can get are just results that agree generally-closely enough to posit a particular generally balanced equation. But being driven by the obsession for exactness, Science keeps on splitting up things to a finer and finer degree... only to find finer and finer variables and imponderables which do not balance out exactly.

But then: it always rounds them out into an absolute measurement. And tries to pretend that all the differences were some kind of mistake, some unfortunate variation... that if they were not present, the measurement would have come out all the same... huh? That has not happened since science was invented 2,000 years ago. But the superstition that things should be able to be measured precisely with absolute accuracy persists.

Even if measurements are not precise, its symbols are used absolutely: as absolute given facts. To use any scientific knowledge in the context of any absolute is a fallacy that results from the very premise of measurement itself.

This demonstrates how the two processes-dynamics of Infinity and finiteness have opposing effects and goals. The goal of Infinity is Diversity. The goal of Finiteness is Identicality. This comes from the one-sided dynamic of tool-use, i.e. separation without connection. All of the Infinite Creative Diversity of the Infinite Universe, all of the Infinite Diversity of living organisms, all of the infinite diversity of the hexagonal patterns of snowflakes comes from dynamically balanced energy-flows where all separations are balanced by connections. Once you destroy this dynamic balance, once you remove literally one-half of this dynamic, once you only separate but do not connect: you also destroy the Natural Creative Diversity of that energy-flow. Basically: tool-use destroys diversity and creates similarities, or rather: it creates less diversity. The more accurate at measurement the tool is, the better it can duplicate something. The level of accuracy-duplication inside civilization is so high today that it has created a mythic belief in identicality.

One basic evil-corruption of the over-development of tool-use, science, technology is the blind striving for identicality which has now reached the attempt to create identical humans or clones. This crude kind of regenerating process was used billions of years ago in the creation of viruses. In all later forms of regeneration, it has never been used ... simply because Life found a better way to flourish by increasing its creative diversity through sex. Now we are regressing back to a billion year-old obsolete form of regeneration and calling it the latest new wonder of modern biotechnology.

Today, the raised mechanical standard of human life is based upon mass production, i.e. the attempt to make as many things as closely identical to each other as possible. All standardization of this kind is an attempt at identicality. Mass production is the optimum form of tool-use: by using tools as many times as possible in order to make as many artifacts-tools as possible. This is simply a process of duplication. Unlike living organisms, tools cannot regenerate: they can only duplicate. The only way they can survive is by multiplying and accumulating through duplication. The evolution of all tool-technology and tools is towards increasing duplication and identicality. Look at the evolution of architecture, look at the evolution of cars, look at how people are dressed: from a distance, you can barely detect any difference between one suburb from another, or one model of car from any other... you can barely tell the difference between one jacket or set of pants from any other. Everything is becoming standardized: everything that is mass-produced steadily loses any diversity and becomes increasingly identical, mediocre and boring. From McDonalds hamburgers, to instant coffee. From tract housing to shapeless, wrinkled, baggy clothing; from suburbs to modern art forms; from factories to highways, the effect is the same: all forms of duplication, all mass production produces boring, aesthetic ugliness and sameness. .

Modern civilization has become so homogenized, standardized and duplicated; that no matter where you go: everything looks the same. Things are so similar, that even travel becomes boring. Why travel, if you end up going to the same Hilton, the same McDonald's, the same Starbucks, etc? Why move to a new place if you end up surrounded by the same asphalt, the same concrete, the same duplicated, nearly identical suburb or city environment? By destroying all natural diversity and replacing it with duplicated deadness; civilization has sucked all of the fun, joy, and wonder out of life... even traveling to new places is boring. Until you have the total spiritual bankruptcy of modern American culture and its latest product of dehumanized humanity... where teenagers constantly complain of boredom because they have nothing else to do except go to the mall, watch TV, or play video games... where the only activities available to them are vacuous, meaningless exercises in pure distraction and abstraction.

We are now so deep inside this accumulated mass of duplication; that we cannot conceive of an existence without it. We are surrounded by duplication. Just trying mentally removing anything around you that is a product of duplication, i.e.: mass production. ... and what is left? Trees, flowers, grass? Grass is a mass-planting of the same species of plant in order to give a look of uniformity-identity to a piece of earth. Trying to make that piece of Earth as uninteresting and boring as possible so that people will ignore it as much as possible and not focus on our domesticated plots of nature. We cut grass, and tend it; with only one goal in mind... so all grass looks the same, so all grass is as identical as possible... so we can ignore it as much as possible, so we can take it for granted as much as possible, so we can walk on it and destroy it without caring about it or looking at it. In how many other things, in how many other ways has human awareness and human attitudes been changed by the Industrial Revolution of mass-production and identity?

Is there anything in your surroundings that is not mass-produced? Is there anything around you that has not been mass-packaged, mass-sold, or mass-bought, or mass-consumed? A few unchanging dead, art objects?... that inevitably become boring to look at? After looking at the same painting a million times over and over: without seeing anything different? Oh. You mean the beauty of an actual cloud, an actual sunset, an actual sunrise, that changes thousands of times every second is not as beautiful as a dead abstract oil painting that some dead artist painted of a sunset hundred of years ago? Do you know one single artist that has ever managed to capture all of the actual beauty of a sunset, or a sunrise? Or even managed to capture even one second of a single sunset or sunrise? No. It is impossible. All any artist can do is wistfully try to capture a tiny general hint, or general feeling, or a teeny tiny bit of the actual beauty they see.... And try to preserve it.

The trouble is... the second you try to preserve the beauty of a living girl, all you get is the grisly horror of a dead corpse. The second you try to preserve the visual beauty of a sunset... it is gone; and a million other beautiful visual sunsets, and shades of light and color come by; which you unfortunately do not have the many hours to waste trying to preserve these thousands of other actual fleeting seconds of beauty. The idea of selective beauty. The idea that only sunsets or sunrises are beautiful and everything in-between is not; is crap. The idea that only one instant of a sunset is beautiful is crap. Beauty is all around us. Only; we are too busy working to notice the beauty around us. We have brainwashed ourselves into not seeing any beauty in Nature, or the Universe, or the world around us.

This may give you an idea of the relative kind of kind of normality we exist in today. The techniques of modern tool-duplication, mass production, mass duplication has resulted in a universal tool-culture of consumerism. Consumerism is the newest wave of civilization. It is an explosion of tool-use and accumulation... and identity. That has effectively gutted most of the older cultures, and replaced their values with a spiritual vacuum. In order to justify and validate consumption as a way of life; means that you must also regard the habits of waste and destruction as completely normal. The habits of waste and the destruction of Nature become unquestioned.

By creating a disposable society, you have to throw away things. Things that are used once, then thrown away become useless. Anything useless becomes ignored. Anything that does not gratify you becomes useless, worthless and valueless. Suddenly the Entire Universe becomes a useless, worthless annoyance that is blocked-out as much as possible and ignored as much as possible. Then everything becomes disposable, then you get the disposable society: then you can dispose of friends, people, animals, clothes... until you have rent-a-friend agencies for people who need a temporary friend they can dispose of after using them... That is a friend? That is the exact opposite of what a friend once was. A true friend was someone who would stand by you through thick and through thin, and not abandon you or dispose of you ever. This is how political correctness happens. As human society rots and deteriorates: the past is covered up simply by changing what a word is was once supposed to mean. Now, a friend means someone who is disposable. This creates a culture of uselessness. This creates the outlook of selfish practicality: whatever is useless to you has no meaning for you. Everything around you becomes increasingly meaningless. Basically the cultural effect of consumerism is the magnification of all trivialization. Anything which has any true meaning disappears from public exposure. Anything which has true meaning is never mentioned. Anything that has any true meaning is not spoken of. Instead; you get advertising logos like 'Obey Your Thirst'. The worship of self-gratification, and comfort addictions by mindless conformity and obedience any authority that tells you to do something. or the logo of 'Why Ask Why?' Sneering at any kind of curiosity while glorifying stupidity. ... as ways of selling consumption as a form of pure self-indulgence: i.e. Mindless and meaningless human behavior.

Another way TV has successfully brainwashed viewers into a religious belief in meaningless, is the tons of meaningless Trivia it airs. For instance: Double Jeopardy: has been poisoning the semantic root of the meaning of an answer, by posing the answer as a question. This is semantic reversal of meanings. An Answer is not a fucking question. The TV show Double Jeopardy has distorted the difference between a question and an answer for years now, until ordinary people on the street do not give affirmative answers any more. They respond with weak, querying questions as answers instead of firm, statements of the truth as answers.

Corporations strive to make the consumer as uncritical, and as uneducated, and as lazy, and as spoiled as possible. How can you expect to sell sugar water to children; if you have an intelligent, critically minded parent, who knows that consuming pure processed sugar is not biologically normal or healthy for their child? How can you expect the Coca Cola corporation to make trillions of dollars of profit; if intelligent educated parents refuse to allow their children to drink sugar-water that rots their children's teeth? If parents are intelligent enough to save their children from an entire lifetime of sweet-addictions; which is not good for them, and is not healthy? Not to mention a lifetime of expensive dental care. And save them from the diseases of diabetes, obesity, the dysfunctions of hyperactive children out of control from too much sugar in their veins? The truth about nutrition and health is bad for corporations. Educating the public to be critically minded is bad for corporations.

What kind of questions do the media ask the public...? Does it ask any meaningful questions? No. The media delights in asking the most meaningless questions possible. It delights in asking trivia questions. The media tries to normalize the public into believing that all questions are trivial and meaningless. What better way to sell meaningless programs with meaningless advertisements for meaningless products? Make sure the public regards all questions as meaningless. That way, the media can sell even more meaningless trivia and call it 'news'. Any person who bothers to notice; can see how the news has become more and more obsessed with meaningless trivia. The function of all mass media especially TV, is the trivialization of everything.

Today, the basic dynamic of accumulation in civilization has accelerated to a dynamic of excess-waste in order to make room for more accumulation. When almost everything you produce is bought, and either instantly consumed, or eventually thrown away; then whatever is not instantly self-gratifying, and whatever cannot be thrown away; becomes worthless. Then you develop a culture of pure greed to a normalized degree of logical insanity. You cannot have a society based upon consumption without the cultural justification of greed, worthlessness and meaninglessness. If you have the freedom to throw away whatever does not instantly please and gratify you right away: then you develop a throwaway culture. A culture of throw-away human relationships, marriages, throw-away children, throw-away bags, throw-away packages, throw-away computers, throw-away clothes, throw-away cars, throw-away half-used containers, thrown-away furniture with tiny scratches on them, thrown away broken things that were never properly maintained or cared for because they were designed to be thrown away, throw-away apartments that can be trashed and left, throw-away jobs that you can leave for another job, throw-away fashions and fads, throw-away idols and icons that you can throw away the instant some other idol or icon catches your fancy.

What if every Capitalistic company, every business was forced by Law to become ecologically responsible? What if anything you did not consume: you could bring back to where you got it: and they were forced by Law to accept it? What if every paint company was forced by Law to accept all of the returned, half-empty pant cans that consumers keep in their garages for years? What if every bottle of nail polish could be returned to, where you bought it? What if every retail store could send back every returned, half-empty, half-used, or unused product back to the factories that had originally spewed them out by the millions?

Then any factory that decides to manufacture anything. Had better find out what to do with their product... before they even begin mass-producing it. What if G.M. were forced by Law to accept every used car, every lousy lemon it ever made? What if the Tire Companies were forced by Law to accept back every worn, and used tire they ever made? Then every company that tried to mass-produce any product people did not like or want. Then every company that made a faulty product that was cheap and broke easily and fast. Would be inundated with the instant backlash of consumers driving up to their factory doorsteps, bypassing the retail stores: and dumping that company's cheap crap by the ton in front of that company's head office.

Then the boards and presidents and executives of every major corporation would have their own stupidity flung back in their faces. And they would never again make anything cheaply ever again. Or else they would be fired, and the companies would be re-tooled completely from head-to-foot. Then the Coca-Cola Company would have its billions of empty cans and bottles dumped onto its doorstep. Then all the major Corporate headquarters of the World would become huge trash-sights. Then tourists would go and gawk at the piles of shit these corporations had produced. Then these corporate headquarters would be the only places on Earth that have any pollution. Then all the Earth would be clean except for the piled shit burying every corporation's head office. Then these head offices would become avoided and despised and attacked as evil, foul places. Then every corporation stupid enough to mass-produce anything would go bankrupt. Then every corporation stupid enough to even try to mass-produce anything would have to figure out how to get rid of every single waste they produce and create in their entire production phase and packaging phase. Then they would be forced to add the costs of getting rid of all these hidden costs to the actual cost of whatever they are trying to sell. Then any mass-produced consumer product would become so expensive: no consumer on Earth would be able to afford a $200 bottle of nail polish, or a $200,000 mass-produced car. Then only the filthy rich could afford such luxuries. Then these filthy rich would be seen a mile away. Then they would not be able to hide their wealth by parading wearing the same consumer clothes and driving the same consumer cars as poor industrialized wage-slaves do. Then they would be forced to hide inside their obscene Hearst castles, because they would be killed on sight as filthy consumers; by the millions who had been forced to do without these luxuries legally. Why was the last Robber Baron castle built on Earth called the 'Hearst Castle'? Because it signaled the death of all ostentatious Robber Barons who lived in opulence. That Castle is a Hearse; carrying the dead ideas of the opulent extravagant consumption of the 1920's Robber Barons to its last grave; the last logical insane conclusion of building a house with 165 fucking rooms.. Who the fuck needs or uses 165 rooms? Nobody.

Then there would be no such thing as garbage anymore. Cities would not need to have landfills any more. Then if you have any garbage in your house: you can go back to the place where you bought it: and they would be forced by Law to accept the package it came in. Then you had better keep the receipt for every candy bar you eat: or else, the store you bought it from will refuse to accept the wrapper the candy bar came in. Then you had better keep the receipt for every single thing you ever buy: or else, you will never be able to get rid of it... or the package it came in. Then people will rather buy something that has no package because that would save them a trip back to the store that sold them that packaged product. Then landfills all over the world will not be filled with trillions of tons of useless packages and packaging materials. Then foam fillers will become obsolete. Then most of the problem of dry waste, most of the dry pollution created by Capitalist consumer society... will be dumped squarely back into the laps of the assholes who created it. Then producers and consumers will be forced to become more responsible. Then you will think twice before going out and buying fifty consumer products from fifty different stores. Because if any of them have a package, or if they break down, or you only use half of it and do not need the rest. You will be forced by Law to go back to all fifty stores, and return the fifty dried-up bottles of nail polish you have accumulated over ten years. And pray the stores are still in business. Because if they have gone out of business. Then you will be forced to drive, or fly, or sail to the original factories in Malaysia, or Singapore, to get rid of them. And pray you still have the receipts for all of them. Because if you throw away the receipt: you will be stuck with those fifty bottles of useless, dried-up nail polish for the rest of your damn life.

Then people will not know what to do with the receipts they accumulate every year. Then people will store their receipts in banks in special fire-proof vaults. Because if they have a fire and their receipts are burned: then they are fucked forever, and doomed to own every piece of useless crap they ever bought not only for the rest of their life. But all the crap they cannot legally get away with: their children will be forced by Law to take over possession of their 80 years of receipts and all the crap they still have. Then the children will be forced to hire special getting-rid-of-something specialists who can go to all the factories and stores where their parent's shit was originally made and sold, and give it back and get rid of it. And only after a person is dead, and their children have processed their last will and testament: will the receipts of everything their dead parents bought during their lifetime be ritually burned, and the leftover carbon used as ink. Then children will hate any parent who is a shopaholic. Then children will divorce their own parents before their parents die just so they will not have the sins of their parents legally and unfairly foisted upon their shoulders.

Then consuming will become not only become an open, obvious inconvenience and stupidity. Then not only will people think long and hard before they buy anything. Then not only will the consumer sickness called impulse buying; be wiped off this planet. All forms of useless conspicuous consumption will become a social taboo. Then consumers will become social pariahs, and be put into rehabilitation centers together with drug addicts and coffee drinkers. Then only the consumer products that can be consumed without polluting human society will be tolerated. Then only the bare necessities like water and food and clothing, and housing will be consumed. Then people will wear clothes that do not wear out; or go naked. Then people will only build the barest, longest-lasting houses possible, or live out in Nature without any houses at all. Then all civilized pointless, useless luxuries will not exist anymore. Then all consumer luxury goods will go extinct.

To give you an idea of how corrupt consumer culture is: Americans take better care of their pets, and feed them better: than they do their own children.

Yet they throw away their pets and abandon them the instant they become too inconvenient. Millions of stray pets are thrown away every year and abandoned secretly, anonymously and easily each year in America: by millions of pet owners. Millions more are handed over to animal shelters by pet owners who find them too inconvenient. Where are most of these animal shelters located? Next to garbage dumps, in the poorest parts of town, in the poorest ghettos. Under funded and under-staffed. This is how much Americans value their own pets: whom they feed better and take better care-of, than their own human children, er, pets... er, owned children, owned pets, owned toys.

American society has not built, or funded any shelters to take care of the epidemic of human babies being thrown into dumpsters. America has not even faced the issue of abandoned human babies and human children, and homeless human children in their own society. It is an unpleasant subject. It is an inconvenient subject. It strikes too close to home; to how American consumers actually feel about their unwanted, unpleasant, inconvenient children. So the problem is carefully never mentioned or spoken-of. It is merely another unspoken, unpleasant problem in American society; that is never dealt with, or faced.

Besides... if the throwing away of a pet is all legal and accepted... and you love your pet more than you do your children... then what is the big deal between throwing away an unwanted pet, and an unwanted baby, or child? I mean... it's normal! Maybe it wasn't so normal thirty years ago... but it's getting more normal now. Which shows you how insane the concept of normality is in the first place. Who cares about history or comparing changing normalities? Now it is legal to throw away your own baby or child. Nobody will punish you for getting pregnant and then handing your baby over for adoption. Now public funded ads on TV tell people where to go, to give their unwanted babies away to legal agencies instead of into throwing them into dumpsters. Dumping and abandoning babies and children has ceased to be a crime. Nobody is ever prosecuted or jailed for it.

Why? Because if they ever make abandoning children a crime. Then adults, and parents might be sent to jail for improper child-care. Then, adults might actually become legally responsible for how they raised their children. Then the parents of children who became drug addicts and criminals and mentally insane, and sick, might be jailed and prosecuted later... years later: for child abuse and neglect. Then 90% of the parents in all consumer societies would have reason to fear being put into jail for how they improperly treated and raised their own children; years later, after never questioning whether they raised their children well. When they never did; and know that they never did.

And then people will have to stop having families where both parents work and nobody is home to look after the children. And then Corporate America, and all the corporations in the world will lose fully one-half on their corporate wage-slaves...

Now: we don't want that, now, do we?... Why not?

So rather than open the can of worms of homeless children, and abandoned children, raped children, abused and brutalized children called 'runaways'. A politically correct term; designed to avoid looking at the truth of the sickness of consumer culture... Rather than build shelters for these thousands of children... Hell. Rather than admit these children even exist. Rather than deal with a symptom of social corruption that runs throughout the entire class structures of all consumer societies: from the poorest families to the richest families... This issue and problem is simply not spoken-of, or faced, or admitted-to. Because if we did... Some adult might have to be held responsible and accountable. Some adult might be found guilty and jailed and punished.

Now we can't have that now: can we? Actually forcing parents to be responsible?

There are too many guilty irresponsible adult parents, and adults, and corporations in consumer society: to ever risk being exposed to the threat of prison for being irresponsible for something as worthless as a thrown-away child, or pet, er, child... er baby... I mean it's all legal... isn't it? It's not a crime. Why make it a crime? Why criminalize parenting? That's ridiculous. All Parents should have the God-Given right to raise their children any way they see fit. There is no higher authority on Earth or in Heaven that should tell any parent how to raise their child.

Why?
Simple.

Because no human ever born. No culture ever created. No civilization ever built. No Nation ever founded. No government ever established. No religion ever invented. No authority ever created... No parent who ever lived... ever.... Has.... Or has ever had.... the slightest fucking knowledge or idea of what good child-rearing actually is, and what bad child-rearing actually is.

Nobody knows. And nobody cares how other people raise children or have babies. It cannot be regulated by laws. There are just too many people raising babies and children who ignore laws. It cannot be enforced. It cannot be taught. There do not exist any universal standards for the proper raising of human children. There do exist many books on how to raise pets properly and lovingly. But how to raise children properly and lovingly? There is not enough interest in the subject. The books don't sell. And the ones that do all contradict each other. Besides, any proven, scientific standard of how to raise children lovingly and properly... without abandoning them and throwing them away as unwanted garbage... without raping or abusing them... steps on too many toes. It threatens too many sacred traditions and customs and cultures and religions and adults and parents... all who claim they have the God-given right to raise their children any way they see fit, and not as somebody else tells them to. Even if their child-raising practices have been proven in courts of Law to be corrupt, evil and have irretrievably damaged thousands and millions of children...

Take the cases of rape and sodomy Catholic Priests have been convicted of recently in America. Has this stopped parents from sending their children to priests to be raised? No. Has it stopped them from still worshipping and revering these priests? No. What does this reveal? It reveals a completely uncritical attitude towards authority figures. It reveals a mental block in the mass psyche that prevents them from being logical, and doing the right thing. If Catholic Priests have been convicted of so many rapes and sodomy charges today... then what does this say of the one thousand years of Catholic Priests before today...? When such child-protection laws never existed?... Does anyone even want to think of all the enormous implications of what this small tip of the iceberg of sexual perversion exposed in a few churches by a few courageous victims implies, about one thousand years one of the most revered religions of the world? For how many hundreds of years before today: have Catholic Priests secretly raped and sodomized children? For how many years has child rape been normal in Catholic Nations, Cultures, Churches and families?

What impact have these cases in America had on Catholics around the world? Zero. Nothing. Catholics still send their children to mass and choir practice and all the other churches functions untended. They still send their children to choir practice and all the other social excuses that they use to get rid of them. They still believe in the unquestioned sanctity of their priests and their church elders and the Catholic Pope. They still regularly get rid of their unwanted children by sending them to a Catholic church. They still excuse the criminal neglect of their own children; by believing that God, and the Holy orders of Nuns and Priests of the sacred, most holy Catholic Church are looking them after. They still use the church as an excuse to get rid of their own children.

Consumer society has no monopoly on child abandonment or child rape, or child-abuse, or child-neglect... It is merely the latest, most recent symptom of this disease raising its ugly head now... For thousands of years: it was never ever mentioned or admitted-to. It was covered up. It was whitewashed. People pretended it did not exist. However... what is significant. Is that today: for the first time in civilized history... this kind of social sickness, is finally being uncovered and exposed more; than at any other time in the civilized history of mankind.

Today... every milk carton in America that is sold to families who have children: have pictures of abducted children. Pictures of abandoned, raped victim-prone children. It is a social sickness now that is screaming out the obscene truth of the corruption of consumer society in every grocery store. That children are just as disposable as the milk cartons on which the faces of these victims are printed. And not one fucking government or group of adults does one fucking intelligent thing about it. Rather; it is ignored... until the pictures of missing children on all the milk cartons in America: which should make every parent in America vomit in revulsion against the filthy uncaring nature of the society they live-in. And rage, and tear down the corrupt powers who do nothing about it... have become normal, meaningless faces on milk cartons... milk cartons discarded, and thrown away as easily as these missing children are thrown away and ignored by all the parents of the world, and all the authorities of the world.

Has any human ever understood why children are abducted? It is supposed to be a mystery why one child is abducted and killed, and others are not. Children who have never been raped or abused: are suddenly attacked by strangers. Why? Because they are too innocent, too trusting, too vulnerable, too spoiled, over-protected. They cannot sense when something wrong with any approaching rapist and run away.

Children who have already been raped by someone in their family are rarely abducted, raped and killed by strangers. Child rapists seek out the most virginal, most innocent, most trusting victims. Most of them are not interested in spoiled goods. But Children who have had their senses deadened and damaged by being brutalized by their own families: are easy victims. Children whose boundaries, and bodies, and souls, and emotions and minds have not yet been violated, are much too sensitive to any person who has any intent of violating them or attacking them or abducting them... however secretly or cunningly.

Over-protected, pampered, spoiled children. Children who are spoiled so rotten: that they do not recognize danger when it stares them in the face. These children are also easy victims and targets for rapists. Simply because all the ugly truths of life and human corruption has been hidden from them by their over-protective parents. Because they have been lied-to, and brainwashed with so much sentimental Disney-esque bullshit: that they live their entire lives in a fairytale fantasy bubble of unreality: unable to feel, or sense or understand what is actually around them.

Over-protecting and pampering your child can make them just as vulnerable to being raped and attacked: just as effectively as sexually raping them yourself would. You can create serial rapists... by spoiling them when they are young, treating them like toys, treating them like inanimate things. You can make a child grow up as deranged psychopaths who has no sense of wrong in many ways just by not raising them the right way instead of abusing them: neglect can be just as toxic as intentional abuse. You can create a serial rapist: by raping and brutalizing your child, so they re-enact and project their own rape-agony out onto their victims. Both extremes of improper child raising can be just as criminal and just as damaging.

But consumer society will never admit this; or even come close to admitting it. Because if it did: then parents would have to stop being consumers and stop gratifying their children's slightest wishes, and raising them to become spoiled brats; stupid and slow, with dulled senses, and deadened minds... easy targets for rapists. And even more pointedly: they would have to stop all of their own bad habits of self-gratification when it came to raising their own children. They would have to discipline themselves and train themselves and become educated about how to raise a child before they even think of having one. They would literally have to completely change the way they live. Their entire lifestyle would not be able to be one of pure self-gratification, because if it is: then they will give their own children the wrong examples to copy and live-by.

Instead of dealing with the problem of all abandoned and thrown-away children. Instead of making the issues of child abuse and child neglect, and especially the rampant insane pampering and spoiling of children. Parents instead... have become paranoid about child safety, and raise their children in a climate of perpetual fear. They teach their children to be afraid of everything and everybody. Consumer parents are raising their children to be not only be more spoiled, more stupid, more fearful, more cowardly, more hypocritical... raising more bullies, raising them to be more cruel, more criminally abusive to other children... allowing them to literally kick other children in public without even regarding it as an bad habit. Modern Children are being raised on such a sick TV diet of Power Rangers and Telebunnies etc; that normalizes them so early to fake violence and brutality... Nothing actual is shown to them for fear of what? That watching an actual forest and actual animals might make them want to go outside and play and have fun by themselves, without needing any suffocating over-protecting, over-paranoid parents who keep them inside and give them boring toys to play with?

Our consumer society has turned an entire generation of destructive children into dysfunctional, irresponsible, illiterate, ignorant criminals. More young children are joining criminal gangs than ever before at younger and younger ages. All these social symptoms of consumer corruption are being ignored, and under-funded, and paid lip-service-to, swept under the carpet, hidden away, in a normalized pretence that they do not exist and are not important, and do not matter.

Why?

Anything that is unpleasant is not spoken-of.
Anything that is unpleasantly true remains unspoken.
Anything that is unpleasant is unspoken.
Never say anything unpleasant
Thou shalt not say anything unpleasant
Thou shalt lie and be polite

Thou shalt keep your mouth shut about anything unpleasant
Thou shalt pretend that everything is just fine
Thou shalt answer every question-greeting: of 'Hi! How're you doing? With a lie.
Thou shalt lie and say:
'I'm doing Fine!'
Thou shalt say it a million times.
Until you believe it
Until you believe your own lies.
Until everything you say: you automatically believe.
Until you create your own packet of lies called your own reality.
Until you are brainwashed into believing that selfishly pleasing yourself makes you happy.

The only thing that actually matters in consumer society; is instant self-gratification. Everything else comes second... including how children are raised.

People do not want to admit the unpleasant truth that society is getting worse. They want to lie and believe that it is getting better. Everything that is newer is better. Everybody is upwardly mobile. Everyone is getting better. Everyone is feeling better. Nobody is allowed to say they feel worse. Nobody is allowed to say things are not fine.

Popular mass culture... Meaning any form of culture used to sell something; is essentially the selling of meaningless self-gratification, or the selling of mindless entertainment and distraction. The most popular television shows; are also the most meaningless. For example; take the Jerry Seinfeld Show... the most popular show in America for seven years. A television series literally about nothing. Showing adults acting as children and getting away with it. Showing every human sin and crime as funny. Hate is funny. Selfish petty hatred so meaningless they are about nothing but meaningless hate. There was no meaning in that series. And America loved it. because that series was as empty of meaning as their own lives were empty of meaning. That series validated their own meaningless lives. Showing that nothing inhuman society makes any sense. That everything is absurd. And all people are weird, and crazy, and nobody likes anybody else.

Take the show called 'Friends'. Again; it became one of the most popular shows of its time because it was mostly about pure meaninglessness...

Super-sexy-slim actors... doing nothing but sitting around, eating pizza, drinking coffee, and guzzling soft drinks in their tiny living rooms, making smart cracks and jokes.

Huh? So that's how they stay so fit and in shape. Oh! Sitting around all day. Hanging out at the local coffee shop, or: holing up inside their apartments doing nothing. Oh. Having dream exclusive jobs like working for Niemen Marcus, or getting huge salaries as bit actors on soap opera TV shows. Not needing any education or intelligence to be rich, or get a good job. The serious girl who slaves all her life trying to become a decent chef is ridiculed for her hard work and despised for her neurotic attention to detail. While the brainless idiot who uses her and is totally disorganized and incompetent, gets by on her looks. While having flings and getting away with being as superficial as possible. And somehow magically gets a job at Niemen Marcus. And cuts up all of her credit cards that her rich father is paying for. Huh?

The serious office worker is the nerd of the bunch and is the lowest on the totem pole because he is too responsible. He is not enough fun. He is too practical. He is too intelligent. Nobody likes him. But the brainless moron of an actor gets all the beautiful girls based on his looks... but mainly because he is incredibly stupid, shallow, and has no morals... but at the drop of a hat he becomes kind, thoughtful and generous... while being cheap, crude, unkind, and thoughtless. Meaning he is trying to be everything and everyone at the same time, while being nobody and nothing. He uses his friend shamelessly, is proud of how stupid he actually is. And gets away with all of his irresponsibility. Then there is the total bimbo blonde moron. Who is so stupid, so incompetent, so untalented, yet is actually allowed to play at the coffee shop? And earns pennies. How do any of them pay the rent? How come the stupidest actor has the biggest warmest persona? How come the dumbest bimbo has the sweetest heart of gold? And her dumbest utterances somehow magically turn out to be words of unexpected wisdom? Why do these shows try to glorify stupidity? Why should a person be proud of being stupid?

So the more stupid you are... the wiser you are? The more incompetent you are, the more selfish you are, the more successful you are...? The more friends you will have? And all of their tiffs have to be based upon things that are as meaningless as possible? Either that; or trivialize the possibility of having an illegitimate child out of wedlock as a one-liner joke? So the more superficially attractive you are; the more you will be loved? The more beautiful you are, the thinner you are, the more exclusive your job is, the dumber you are: the more friends you will have and the happier you will be? Huh?

Does this have anything to do with how people actually live? No. It is pure fantasy. But this fantasy is sold as a normality that people look up to, admire, mimic, worship and adore. They are portrayed as how everyone should be like. Everyone should be witty, funny, rich, popular, have plenty of dates, plenty of friends. Everyone should have interesting lives. Nobody should talk about anything unpleasant. Nobody should ever be serious or passionate about anything. Everyone should be flippant about everything because everything is meaningless.

So in order to wind down from a work-a-day life that is boring, dull, ugly and meaningless. People watch TV shows about interesting, funny, beautiful rich, lucky, fantasy people whose life is even more meaningless than theirs is. Since these perfect people act five times stupider, and have even more meaningless problems, and even more meaningless lives. It makes the viewers feel better than all these perfect people, and that make them feel good. The point of entertainment is to get your mind off your actual problems. To get your attention off your actual situation. So you do not face reality. Otherwise... what else is there? Face your own life? Do something constructive?

The rationale of meaninglessness; is that as long as everything is meaningless: then people can do whatever they please in order to gratify themselves: without needing a reason, or justification, or any kind of excuse whatsoever. The cult of meaninglessness has evolved out of self-gratification... merely as a defense to justify this kind of culture. The result of meaninglessness is the destruction of all sacredness. If everything is meaningless, then nothing is sacred. If nothing is sacred, then everything is allowed. If everything is allowed, then nobody has to be intelligently critical about anything.

Consumerism automatically creates this kind of norm. Consumerism creates the unthinking conditioned reflex of self-gratification. Until it becomes an unspoken religion. Whenever it is questioned at all; people turn a deaf ear, and go their merry way... indulging themselves. Consumerism glorifies stupidity. The only way advertisers can brainwash the public into buying their products; is by poisoning all forms of critical awareness, all critical thinking. They want to get to the consumer at the earliest age possible and brainwash them. They want their consumers to be as non-critical, and as stupid as possible. This plays into the hands of the technocrats who are constantly trying to make things as complex and impossible to understand as possible. As a result; the younger generation rebels blindly against all of society's meaningless complexity by indiscriminately rejecting all thinking, all information, all education, and thronging to movies like Dumb and Dumberer. Why? Because before they even graduate from grammar school; their ability to think critically has already been destroyed by watching thousands of TV shows, movies, commercials, and playing countless video and computer games.

Ever since civilization began... for thousands of years, all the teachings of human wisdom have labeled greed as one of the most poisonous of evils. But in today's culture, this Wisdom of the Ages has been cast aside and ignored. Modern man has become so smug and arrogant in his newfound wealth, that the open worship and glorification of greed has become normal. It is only when you put the values of our present culture in perspective, and compare it to 10,000 years of civilized human history, to other cultures and other values; that you can get a comparative idea of how distorted and corrupt our present values actually are. Ultimately, all greed is meaningless and destructive.

What people call consumer culture is simply the inundation of mass media and mass marketing trying to sell you something. In order to do that they have managed to drown out other cultural influences simply by sheer volume. The result is a distorted cultural environment based mainly upon greed. This huge wave of commercialism where nothing can survive unless it is sold, commercialized and corrupted; is merely the sum total of the accumulated greed of an accumulated human population: nothing more. What is there in your life and within yourself that has not been corrupted by commercialism or greed? What part of our culture or our values, has not been affected by this? How all-pervasive is the effect of living in a commercialized global economy?

As the tool-value system of business-finance-capitalism-profit-advertisement replaces nearly all other cultural values, the spiritual end-result is zero-emptiness-nothing. Capitalism tries to fill this inner vacuum with greed, selfishness, distraction, self-gratification and ego-gratification. By creating an artificial environment of the city: a boring-dead environment where nothing changes or is different: it harms the development of human awareness by desensitizing it and numbing all of our senses. Any destruction of the creative diversity of this planet is corrupt and evil because it is anti-life in its effect. Yet that is precisely what mass-production of houses-towns-cities-cars-billboards-highways-streets-tv's-clothes-images-movies does.

The inevitable consequence of all excessive duplication is waste. The poisonous result of over-accumulation is waste. The problem with this waste is that most of it cannot be recycled; it just accumulates. In modern civilization: over-accumulation has become normal. Over-consumption has become normal: making all forms of waste normal also. It is so normal that it is barely noticed. That is: until there is a direct effect of that waste upon people who are powerful enough to do something about it.

Nobody thinks twice about being given a bag, and minutes later throwing it away. The ritual of throwing out personal garbage is so commonplace that it is done daily. There is never a thought about where this garbage goes, or what affect it has on someone else, in some other place.

Then there is the massive production of industrial waste. Every poisonous chemical, material, compound... whether it ends up in our water, air, or earth is considered to be an unavoidable by-product of civilization. Just as the corruption of power and wealth being concentrated in a few hands is considered being unavoidable: so too is the creation of industrial waste. A small minority of industrialized nations produces nearly all of the toxic pollutants that plague this planet. No industry producing anything toxic is required to pay for the cost of its disposal or cleanup, or its destructive effects and consequences. Instead, the hidden cost is passed on to the public and to future generations. If the cost of disposal were factored into all consumer products, they would become so expensive that people would think twice before buying them and buy less, be more economical, and waste less. But the issue of pollution is continually swept under the carpet and ignored since all large industries are subsidized on a massive scale through preferential legislation, through tax laws being written specifically for the benefit of the rich, through countless other ways... simply because it is the nature of the capitalistic beast to do so. The true cost of whatever is mass-produced never shows up on the initial price tag.

Now this over-accumulation has developed into something called planned obsolescence. Just as it was fashionable to buy a new car every few years: now people are forced to buy a new computer every few years. The throwaway dynamic of consumerism is no longer a choice; it is compulsory. It is not feasible to take apart an old computer and recycle the basic materials; so you get the accumulation of more waste. Presumably if the speed of tool-evolution continues to accelerate: people will be forced to buy more and more things and throw them away faster. Until it doesn't really matter what you buy, as long as you can throw it away to make room for something else. What began as conspicuous consumption for an elite few, is now being sold as a lifestyle for the entire human race. Planned obsolescence comes from the need to make a profit. If cars were built to last a lifetime; then car manufacturers could not get richer. The basic function of making tools i.e. duplication: the prime force behind the vicious cycle of consuming for the sake of consuming and nothing else: the inevitable result of all meaningless consumption is waste... billions and billions of tons of useless, poisonous waste. Both duplication and profit are tool dynamics. However there is never any consideration of the inevitable effect on our lifestyle, our culture or the planet itself. Consumer culture is basically meaningless because the only motivational engines that drive this consumption are greed-profit and self-gratification. Greed in itself has no human value except that of convenience, expediency and self-gratification.

Consider the term disposable income. The more disposable income people have, the healthier an economy is. The richer you are, the more you buy, the more possessions you have, the more you accumulate, the more you consume, the more you waste, the better off you are, the higher your standard of living. The dynamic of consumerism is based upon everything being as disposable as possible. The flaw in this is that it is not cyclic. For the most part, what is used and thrown away cannot be used again.

Ultimately, the only reason to accumulate any income is to dispose of it; so that others might profit from your spending. This is the prime cultural message that is blared through the media in all kinds of advertising. There is no counterbalancing message to this prime edict, there are no other ideas or concepts given equal airtime. As a result, it is unquestioned; it becomes normal. The term "consumer culture” is a loose description of what modern society has evolved into; whatever we are born into, whatever we get used to, becomes our reality, our normality. By simply the barrage of paid mass media, consumerism has displaced other cultural norms until it has become the dominant culture throughout the world. Today, only when there is no other alternative to the culture they were raised in, do young people end up being normalized into the same cultural pattern as their elders. Now, consumer culture gives people choices that never existed before; so it is no surprise that older cultures are fading. Given a choice between stagnation and change, the younger generation will always opt for change. Unfortunately with no historical perspective or understanding of the cultures they live in, they are merely choosing between older and newer forms of corruption.

Since the entire Earth's population of humans are not willing to seriously question the fundamental principle which Capitalism is based upon: it is equally not willing to face or address the negative effects of this over-consumption: waste. No school of thought, no philosophy, no religion, no culture tries to hold up the virtue of not wasting anything. Regardless of the lip service environmentalists spout, waste is a part of every-day life on so many levels and in so many ways, it is so normalized and taken for granted; that it is not even an issue except on documentary films. Waste is the by-product of tool-use and ignorance; it is the result of accumulation. It is a result of the one-way separating process of tools. It is a product of a system whose entire process from start to finish is non-cyclic. A linear, one-way process of taking something that is useful, manipulating it, and combining it; so, it becomes not only useless, but also poisonous. The basic principle of this process is never questioned or looked at. How many more centuries of waste like the last one can this Earth sustain? This question is never raised. To the civilized mentality: all industrialized duplication (mass production) is considered normal. Because people are not trained to think outside the context of their own normality: the issue of waste is never dealt with logically or intelligently.

The result of accumulation and industrialization around the world has created a normality in which 100's of millions of people have become used to affluence. But; getting used to anything that is an imbalance, that is not good or healthy; is ultimately an addiction. People have become addicted to comfort, to ease, to laziness: which is what all over intensive tool-use produces. Yet, this affluence is an ecological and human imbalance. While ecosystems are in crisis, while most of the world's population remains poor and destitute: this affluence has become the worst addiction that humans have created for themselves as a buffer separation between them and the natural world. The less comfort-addicted people are: the healthier and happier they are, the simpler their lives, the more they are at peace, the more in balance with nature. It is the millions of comfort-addicted people who drive cars and watch TV who are destroying this planet as we speak. It the comfort-addicted culture of consumerism that is spreading all over the world that is the single most destructive force on this planet. Yet comfort and ease is glorified, valued, worshipped: not the human qualities of love, courage and honesty. That is the corruption of civilization: that is the corruption of over-intensive tool-use.

One of the most blatant miscarriages of duplication so far in biogenetics has been the loss of domesticated plant species. By mass producing hybrid and genetically altered seeds, humans are standardizing farm crops down to a dangerous level of non-diversity. This has led to the extinction of countless varieties of domesticated food plants. The inherent danger in this is that reducing the diversity of our food supply increases the possibility of global crop failure. Without a high diversity food plants to live on you get the Irish potato famine, you get the Indonesian rice crop failure. China suffered for thousands of years from repeated famines simply because everyone was using a single plant as a staple for their annual crops. Once anything goes wrong with any staple crop, you had better have backups or you will starve to death.

Hominids survived in part because they were omnivores, able to eat and digest almost anything. Without bio-diversity in our diet and in our ecosystems, we ourselves would have gone extinct long ago. Other animals that depend on a single source of sustenance go extinct the instant any thing goes wrong with their specialized food supply. The food supply may recover, but the single source mammal never does.

We were never designed to eat the same foods week in and week out. Humans were never meant to eat the same boring staple foods all year. We are designed to eat something different every day. That is why we have so many different nutrients, minerals and vitamins that are necessary in a proper balanced diet. No staple, not even three, or four staples can give you all these dietary requirements. Only a huge diversity of many different kinds of food can supply you with a balanced diet. That is because we were designed to live as foragers, nomads, hunter-gatherers... never staying long in any one area, always on the move.

Reducing all the food plants in the world to a handful of mass-produced, genetically altered seeds is begging for trouble in the long run. Eventually, we will find ourselves needing the plants we allowed to go extinct. Biotech corporations have launched huge campaigns to introduce 'patented' seeds into the market. The new biotech companies are using every legal and illegal leverage and advantage to force farmers to buy 'G.M.' plant seeds. Million and millions of dollars are spent on political contributions in the Global plot to force people to eat 'patented' food; so these biotech companies and all of their affiliated business partners and shareholders can make a quick, easy buck by monopolizing the food we eat by standardizing all plants down to such a low diversity level that if they succeed, there will be global crop failures and global starvation. But to the credit of consumers, they have rejected nearly all genetically altered foodstuffs unless they are not told about it and buy it unwittingly. Whenever the public has discovered that food companies have been doctoring and changing their products by adding genetically altered food into it, they have without exception risen up in protest or simply refused to buy the tainted products. Even the starving Nations of Africa have mostly refused to accept genetically altered corn, wheat, and other staples from the American corrupt government charity organizations who are just lackeys and pushers of the genetically altered seeds they cannot get rid of because no sane person will eat it or put it into their bodies.

Why? The consumer is concerned with the fear of being not only poisoned... but their entire food supply permanently poisoned they see no advantage to eating something potentially dangerous to their health... that if it is poisonous, can never be reversed or fixed. That is simply too much of a risk to take.

But people are mindlessly loyal to their brands and tastes... As Coca Cola found out when they tried to change the formula for their product: customers simply stopped buying it and bought other brands. Until they brought the same old beverage back and renamed it: Classic Coke. The new' coke languished on the shelves until they simply discontinued it because not enough customers were buying it. Now there is: Coke, and Classic Coke. Both with the same formula and taste. Simply because they were afraid of losing any more market share than they already had by their mistaken campaign to change a successful product that has stood the test of the capricious consumer market for over 50 years.

Now the Biotech companies are facing bankruptcy if they do not manage to show some kind of profit. So they are forcing UNICEF to take their tons of genetically altered seeds and use it as emergency relief stock for victims of drought, famine, floods and other disasters. But the governments of the crisis-struck nations have all unilaterally rejected that poisoned food and would rather let their people starve to death than risk introducing one single genetically altered seed into their country. Then the press takes up the story of how France told Uganda's black Government that if they allowed any genetically altered seed into their country, they would cut off all Aid and Relief and stop trading with Uganda altogether. The Press had a field day vilifying the French for their inhumanity and for their anti-American policies... Since nearly all big biotech corporations are American-owned.

The Path of Splittness

525

The latest obscenity concerning genetically altered foods is governments trying to hoodwink school systems into using it to feed their students more cheaply because the Biotech companies give them discounts hoping to get the younger population used to it, accept it as normal... and ultimately addicted to it. This has been successfully done earlier...with the free distribution of cigarettes, coffee and Coke in the 1st and 2nd World Wars. Only now; modern parents are slightly more informed, and are fighting this poisoning of their children to no avail: since big business is pushing this policy over the heads of local governments. What this will do, is create a new epidemic of New Age Polio... where industrialized societies raise children with all kinds of terminal defects and illnesses.

One person who experimented with a diet of 100% fast-food; not only gained 22 lbs in 3 months; but he experienced distinct physical and emotional depression after eating. Which made him crave even more fast-food, and become even more addicted to it. This revealed a fact that should be common knowledge by now:... that most fast food is not only more addictive and unhealthy for you than any other food on the planet... but it also makes you eat more of it. Normal American food portions have gotten bigger; due to a steady diet of addictive fast food, which they can never get enough-of. Today; an American small size drink or meal is equivalent to a large-size anywhere else in the world. Again: one-sided accumulation is the basic dynamic, and the basic result of civilized life.

So why has there been a virtual universal, Global ban on buying, selling, using, or eating, or growing any genetically altered foodstuff? Why have all the rich countries who refuse the poison-seed think it is alright' for their poorer cousins to take it? The horror stories of what happened to the farmers who did use it would fill dozens of volumes... but that is not the real reason every nation on Earth have refused to use or grow genetically altered foods. Including the Nations who have powerful biotech lobbyists and influence, and can pretty much write their own ticket when it comes to asking their Governments to do something for them.

The fact is; that if there is any genetic contamination of any living thing... it is permanent... it is forever. It can never be fixed or cured. No plant once it is genetically contaminated with a G.M. seed source can ever be brought back to its previous healthy, pristine genetic code.

The only way to make sure any genetic plant or seed does not spread its poisonous altered genetic code throughout all the plant kingdom is to burn every last one. If there is so much as one seed that escapes total destruction, it can spread like wild fire throughout the entire World, and do untold harm on an unheard-of scale. Risk contaminating the entire world's food supply...? Risk one genetic mistake which could spread like a cancerous cell throughout the entire plant kingdom so there is not one living plant species left that is not poisoned in some way by this unknown, untested genetically altered food? And knowing that one mistake could cost the entire World its food supply? And that there is no way to repair any harm to all the living things on this planet if a single bad seed is let loose on this Earth?

This is how obscene the Media is in its spreading of disinformation, and all people who actually support using this stuff. Experts were asked if using G.M. products is dangerous, and they all claim that the danger is merely a quibble of consumer confidence... They tried to suggest that it is only because people like the French who are stuck-in-the-mud traditionalists, unwilling to bend to the progress of new Technologies... that this is the reason all of Europe refuses to use any Genetically Modified foodstuffs.

Mass media works like an amplifier: it amplifies and magnifies whatever it focuses on. It spews out so much disinformation: that people become disinterested in all information. The mass of disinformation is so huge: the mass of meaningless facts accumulate into such a huge useless, meaningless pile: that people become information-deaf. Disinterested-numbed to all information. Like the deafening amplifiers of rock bands permanently destroying the hearing of their audience, and brainwashing them into believing only loud music is worth listening to...until they become deaf and cannot hear anything. Until people become disinterested to all truth. Until people do not give a shit whether something is true, or a lie. Because they already have been brainwashed to not being able to tell the difference.

So... the American public is easily misinformed. And the biotech companies are up against a wall that they never thought in their wildest dreams would happen... New technology is supposed to mean progress. It is supposed to be good for all people. But do they give a fig if their genetic material poisons the whole Earth? On the contrary; they keep on screaming about how safe it is. Hoping that their ads and publicity programs will win the public over to their side. People do not understand that these chemical companies are messing with their own lives, their own genetic codes. People do not understand that all of this technology spells pure death for all living things on Earth. Life only exists by diversity, not by mass duplication; and not by genetically altered plants. Life is only possible through diversity... not through mass duplication. All genetically altered plants are attempts at duplicating Life. All duplicated forms of Life are poisoned forms of Life that kill other living things.

Just because the seed manufacturers need to sell in bulk in order to make a profit, just because certain crops are in demand, and some make more money for the farmer: this does not mean that the destruction of the bio-diversity of food plants is sane, rational or justified. All profit-based farming, seed production, all mass production farming, all staple-based diets, all lack of diversity of food plants make us progressively less healthy, and prevents us from getting any healthier. But since our lifestyles normalize countless, unhealthy habits and conditions... including how, and what we are taught to eat: we never stop to ask ourselves if there is a healthier way of eating, or living.

Science is full of so many hypocrisies and irrationalities, so illogical and insane, and stupid and blind; that it is impossible to detail all of them. It is a well-known scientific fact that genetic diversity has the universal effect of improved health, improved adaptability and improved fertility on all biological levels. From the cellular level, to the organ level, to how organs inter-act with each other, to individual animals and species. Yet the same Science that knows these universal effects of genetic diversity; is busy trying to clone, and duplicate living organisms on every biological level, from the living cells, to living seeds, to living organs, to living animals, to living sperm, to living brain stem cells. Trying to make all living things on all organic and biological levels as identical as possible.

To put this kind of criminal hypocrisy into perspective. For Science to practice any duplication, or cloning, or cellular replication or artificial manipulation of living organisms: with the universal conclusions that Science already knows is actually true, and has already proven to be actually true.... is the same as if your Fire Department went around setting fires to as many buildings in your neighborhood as possible ... while publicly spouting on TV, and on educational documentaries that living in a house that is burning is a healthier way of living.

Science and Technology uses the concept of identity as a means to advance civilization, i.e. tool-use. All mathematics are based upon the idea that duplicated numerical values are absolutely identical. That is, the number 5 is absolutely identical in value to every other number 5. But, , this is never true in the Actual Universe. This is only true in your imagination. It is only an imagined, abstract, figment of your mind.

No five molecules are absolutely identical to any other five molecules in the Universe. Nothing in the Universe is absolutely identical to anything else... all the way down to the most infinitesimal particle of energy that we capable of discerning. There is no such thing as absolute identity.

One prime example of the one-sided splitting of tool-use in our technology is the trend towards digitalization. As everything becomes more modular-segmented, we are literally splitting up everything we possibly can into bits-bytes. The greatest one-sided splitting machine we have today is the computer. It splits all information into two separated, non-connected absolutes: 1 and 0... or On and Off. The computer may be more abstractively creative, but it does not make you more human: it does not develop your human awareness, potential or creativity. To exist only on a level of pure abstraction is merely another example of abstract normality: another condition of civilized dehumanized evil.

A computer can perform incredible things, but it cannot Love anything, or be Honest, or have Courage. Nothing a machine can do is actually human. No machine can possess a Sense Of Wonder. The creativity of machines is merely one tiny, small offshoot or byproduct of human creativity. Without humans; tools could not exist. Any creativity programmed into computers is of human origin. Anything that is purely abstract is of tool origin. By using these simple guidelines we can generally identify the two basic conflicting dichotomies of human existence.

The computer is a perfect example of the absolute. It is also the greatest duplicating machine of all. The computer is merely an attempt to mechanically mimic-duplicate-reflect the human tool-brain: how it works and what it does. Its functioning is based upon two values: On and Off: or 1 and 0. Which are mathematical absolutes. These two values signify absolute mechanical connection and absolute mechanical separation. And no matter how many times these values are used, or in what context: they are considered to be absolutely identical.

Then comes the abstract insanity of computer programming: connecting abstract zero's and ones... and are supposed to be absolutely separated from each other: back together... randomly... in order to achieve a desired mono-linear end-goal result. It does not matter which 'zero', or which 'one' you use to do the connecting. They are all supposed to be absolutely identical to each other. As long as they all follow the same identical labyrinth-pattern design.

Huh? You mean if you glue a bar of soap to a dog, or glue a piece of wood to your nose: it means the same thing? If you cut your finger off from your hand, or cut a piece of paper in two, it all means the same identical thing... If you glue a leaf from one tree to another tree; it is supposed to belong there and live and grow? This is the insanity of identicalization. This is the insanity that comes from the unspoken assumption that all electrons are absolutely identical to all other electrons. This is the insanity that comes from the unspoken assumption that all copper atoms are absolutely identical to each other.

The visual illusions of Digitalization only works when you reduce things down to a size so small; that the actual differences are not noticed by your naked eye. And only as an abstract simulation, or abstract representation on a two-dimensional level... and even then; what you reduce, only seems to be identical.

Every electron bombarding your computer screen is completely unique. Every digital square is actually a vague, fuzzy blob of constantly changing brightnesses. But your eye fools itself by seeing more similarities than dissimilarities in millions of small light-blobs that are too small for your eye to focus individually upon. The identity of the computer is just a parlor trick. Nothing inside that the computer is identical to anything in any other computer. Nothing on your computer screen is identical at any time to any other computer screen. It is just very similar, very two-dimensional. Very shallow. Very meaningless, and very boring.

The concept of identity opposes creativity. The concept of identity originates from the concept of the absolute. It is obvious. An environment in which most things are standardized, where everything seems to be the same... destroys human creativity and potential. All duplication destroys diversity. All forms of duplication are life-threatening. That is why incest is morally wrong. Because joining two DNA strands that are near-duplicates of each other leads to the dangers of inbreeding with countless horrific genetic diseases and ailments, and deformations of horrible ugliness. No species can survive when its gene pool is so small that there is not enough diversity to keep it healthy. Yet humans are hell-bent on cloning, and duplicating everything they possibly can. Just in order to accumulate, just to make a profit. Until you get a standardized, duplicated, dead, boring environment that stifles and destroys all creativity.

The computer is also a perfect example of two opposing insanities of civilization: specialization, and one-size-fits-all mass production. Operating systems like Windows by Microsoft is mass-produced by the millions. In order to satisfy everyone's needs, it is designed to perform millions of specialized functions... in order to understand this system; it would take at least ten years of research by the makers of Windows to be able to know how to fix it. But they come out with a new version every 1-2 years. So the system remains forever unfathomable... even to the programmers who made it: it becomes an unfixable, unmanageable, unwieldy, maddening waste of time.

The idea of trying to mass-produce an identical operating system that is supposed to satisfy every person on earth has forced Microsoft to make a product that is so complex, so complicated, has so many bugs in it that nobody understands it, and everyone hates it. It crashes so regularly, that it is like the early model 'T' Fords: where the drivers took along at least five or ten spare tires or inner tubes for a single outing... plus an entire tool-kit, and a manual for all of the mechanical adjustments they had to constantly re-do. Whoever uses a computer only needs a tiny bit of its over-complicated abilities and programs. Whenever they punch the wrong button and find themselves in an area they do not use, or have never seen, and never used they are lost. That forces them to get expensive help from experts. But no human understands the entire Windows system. It is too complicated even for the entire programming staff of Microsoft to understand. The programmers cannot understand their own programs. The complexity of modern technology has raced so fast, become so complex, that it is completely out of control. It cannot be controlled or understood by those who make it or by those who use it. And it is fast becoming so unusable, so incomprehensible, that people are developing a fear and hate of all modern technology.

All Microsoft has to do is segment their system into manageable units and make the system able to be custom-built, so that each consumer gets only what they want. That would simplify the operating system down to where the consumer could actually use it and understand it and be able to fix it himself without paying experts 35-100 dollars-an-hour to fix it.

But.... That would make the system too easy to use and too easy to copy. And then that would put Microsoft out of business. Because then a million different manufacturers would make their own versions of the simplified specialized parts of the system; and there would be NO monopoly of the market. So... Microsoft makes damn sure that their soft-ware remains too complex for people to use, copy, or repair... so only another huge corporation will ever have the resources to make a competing model of their idiotic software. That way; it keeps a lock on the business of selling software. So the insanity of mass-producing a single machine-operating system, to fit a billion different needs... by making it so complex that nobody understands it or can properly use it... goes on. As each year it becomes increasingly complex, increasingly unmanageable and wasteful and less user-friendly.

The Computer is so complex, that when something goes wrong with it: you can't even shut it off. Does that ring a bell of warning? Machines that cannot be shut down without damaging them? Machines that freeze into complete unusability at the tiniest glitch? Pouring all of the excess wealth of modern society into this kind of unusable, unreparable complexity? The entire telephone system of a major computer store; crashing for days and taking days to fix; because the phone system is computerized? So the store loses how much business selling computers and computerized appliances because its phone system is computerized? The computer is a mechanical recreation of the body-brain dynamics of humans.

The source from which its commands come from is the keyboard. The keyboard represents the genetic codes that trigger all of the biological and neural functions of your body and your brain. It represents the oldest instinctive power that controls what you do. Chemical commands. Molecular codes.

The body of the computer represents the human subconscious. This is where all of the chemical commands and instinctive drives are stored, processed and digested. The monitor screen: represents the outer layer of the human brain. The cerebral cortex. 99% of which is dedicated to processing everything you see visually. The outer layer of the human brain is only concerned with outer reality. It focuses almost completely, only upon things that are outside of yourself. When you use a computer: you are manipulating a mechanical human brain by controlling which root keys to punch. This is the instinctive drive. You are driving the computer by controlling it on a mechanical instinctive level.

After the instinct-keys are punched. The subconscious circuits in the body of the computer go through complex, convoluted paths... much like the convoluted paths of your subconscious brain. The final result shows up on the monitor. Your conscious brain. A blank screen that is actually an empty vacuum. The dynamics of a mechanical computer exposes the fact that the conscious brain of is not in control of what it shows on its screen. What comes up onto its screen actually comes from deep instinctive keys that are punched. You are a creature of your instinctive drives: not your conscious monitor.

This is what the outer cerebral cortex is supposed to do. Your outer brain is a monitor. It is supposed to monitor your Inner Universe, and your Outer Universe: and make sense of the two Universes, and figure out what to do.

But the computer is blind. It cannot see past its own projected screen. All it knows are its own projections. Which is exactly how the awareness of the unaware human brain works. Humans who have no Sense of Pure Wonder do not see the Universe as it actually is: they project their own thoughts and feelings onto what they see.

The Loss of Human Identity.

How is human identity lost? How is it destroyed? You could write a thousand books on this and never get to the end of how this happened. It happened by overpopulation. It happens by opponents opposing each other. Through power. Through Wealth. Through Knowledge. Through Status. By Conformity. Through Advantage, Laziness, Adversarial roles, fear, hate, ego, selfishness. It happens through using tools, by using ourselves as tools, and finding that our identity has become what we do all day: function like a tool. How we use ourselves as tools is how we identify ourselves. It happens by being selective, exclusionary. It happens by limiting ourselves, and limiting others who threaten us with change and the fear of destroying our nice safe normality. It happens by trying to preserve the dead past at the expense of the living young. Perpetuating old dead cultures and religions at the expense of every new generation that is brainwashed into conforming to whatever brand of insane reality your civilization holds as sacred and unchangeable... only for later generations being completely incapable of fathoming why people would live in this insane manner. It happens from the effects of 'identity'... mass production, duplication, repetition and re-duplication

Polarization

Today; everything is being polarized into absolutes or extremes. Clothes are fashioned with only two polarized purposes in mind: to hide how fat you really are, or to show off how slim you really are. People are being polarized into obese, unfit, overweight people who do not exercise at all... or gym junkies, jocks, athletes, models, movie stars and TV stars; who are obsessed with their physical appearance and performance. The entire consumer marketplace is becoming more polarized. Rich people are buying more expensive cars, more expensive houses... while the middle-income population shrinks, and 99 cent Stores spring up everywhere. Consumer goods are being polarized into items like gold-plated bathroom faucets costing 30,000 dollars, or mass-produced faucets being made as cheaply as possible.

Every opinion is being polarized with the most emphatic, non-comparative adjectives possible.

'Is that what you think? Is that what you feel...?' 'Is that your opinion...?'
What is the standard word used to indicate certainty? 'Absolutely.'

Everybody's opinion is becoming an absolute opinion; everything that two or more people agree on is absolutely right, exactly right, precisely correct, absolutely correct. What are polarized values but separating something so extremely, that if you are absolutely right, then everyone else must be absolutely wrong? Why do extremists always create conflicts where none existed previously? Because people can profit from polarization. They can gain attention, fame, status, wealth and power from it.

Misunderstanding, miscommunication, mixed messages... come from how we use language as a polarization of irrational, imagined, abstract absolutes. It comes from being trained to say one thing and do another. It comes from civilized societies not recognizing, validating, supporting, paying any attention to the actual instinctive, genetic, biological, natural needs and wants of the human animal.

If you go into any civilized community on Earth you will hear one universal thing: young babies and little children bawling and weeping as their needs, wants, feelings, etc. are being callously ignored. Or even worse: them being beaten, punished, yelled at, trained, disciplined, tortured, raped, abused, neglected: all because they all have natural needs and wants that are being brutalized by their civilized parents. Because their parents have been victimized all their lives, and every day they come home to unload their frustrations upon the only available handy victims. Because their children are the only people they have power over. Because that is how their parents were raised.

It is irrelevant whether these parents do this to their children knowingly or unknowingly... willingly or unwillingly. They all end up doing it because that is how civilization is designed to work. You cannot have civilization unless you stifle, suppress, twist, stunt, traumatize, damage, weaken and poison every natural instinctive function and urge of the human animal.

The Media includes little children as young as 6 years old, in all kinds of televised competitions glorifying winning over everything else. The constant media hype and obsession on competition and winning at all costs; polarizes our views, our values... it makes you believe that if you do not win the world championship; then your life is worthless, and you should mope and cry at the tragedy of not winning, not being the best in the world. We are breast-fed on absolutes, we absorb absolutes... we are trained in absolute actions, absolute thoughts, absolute emotions, absolute ideas, absolute values, and absolute ways of thinking. Winning and losing are all that matter. Everything and everybody must be polarized, and everyone must be pitted against each other in antagonistic conflicts. What is winning and losing, but merely another polarization of absolutes? It is just another way to get attention, fame, status, wealth and power. There are countless symptoms of increasing polarization. The steady increase of polarized absolute values and ideas are being acted out in everywhere. \

Selective Polarization

Once you selectively polarize anything... once you take it out of the larger context it exists in... then you have effectively destroyed its universal usefulness and meaning, and replaced it with a linear 'usefulness' that is only used once, or that only has one use, or one meaning...

That is how we think. We use only separated words. We use separate definitions for each word. The act of defining anything automatically makes your understanding of it limited, selective, non-relative, absolute and generally meaningless. If you ever hear any person in an argument stop anyone and say:

'Define your terms.'

They are only saying:

'Since I don't like what you are saying to me, I will make your terms, your definitions so meaningless... so irrelevant, so abstract: that they will not bother me. Until you come up with a selective, limited, meaningless truth that I can admit-to, which does not upset me, or threaten me... or in any way, shape or form suggest that I may be wrong...'

Trying to narrow down the definition of all the words you use is basically a way of lying to yourself. You are creating your own exclusive system of semantic rationalization so nobody including yourself can ever prove you are wrong or successfully disagree with you. Narrowing down the meaning of any word is an attempt to not understand what another person is saying. It is a hypocritical way of pretending to be honest when you are actually... actively turning a deaf ear to anything the other person has to say.

You understand things by being as inclusive as possible. By connecting things together relatively into a larger context. The greatest understanding comes from communicating without words... by communicating through example... the best teachers teach by example. The greatest learning influence in people's lives comes from example. From how they live, what they do, how they act towards you.

All absolutes are polarized imbalances that are so disconnected from each other, that they seem to have no cooperative connections. Like black and white, yes and no, on, and off, go and stop, Red and Green, up and down, in and out, North and South. Because we selectively focus on one Polar opposite; we choose not to be aware that the Earth is a round globe and the South and North Poles are merely imaginary dots on a map that could be placed anywhere. The same goes for magnetic poles. The actual magnetism of the two most polarized places on Earth are in the huge underground stores of ionized magma, which this crust of Earth, stone, continents, sea beds, floats on. Some parts of this crust has more ironized minerals than other places. There has never been and can never be any absolute magnetized Pole on, or in this planet. Yet all scientists, all textbooks, treat this relative fact as if it does not even exist. No matter what polarized extreme you look at... if you study it, you will find that there is no absolute disconnect between them. People choose not to be aware that the light-colors of red and green come from the same beam of sunlight. There is no red or green in that beam of sunlight. Only when you diffract that beam into separate rays, do you get separate colors. Even the full spectrum of a rainbow has no separate color, no absolute Red or Green. Only gradual shifts in color that are so gradual and mixed-up, that all you see are hazy, fuzzy colors so indistinct that is impossible to separate any single shade of Red or Green from it.

There is a difference between selective, or negative polarization, and non-selective or positive polarization. Negative Polarization is weak and runs down until it finally stops... and dies. Positive polarization only keeps on getting stronger and stronger, and stronger. The reason all civilized selective polarization is evil; is because it is anti-life... it weakens and kills and destroys not only living energy, but all energy...

The difference between Negative And Positive Polarization can be demonstrated easily with a string and a fairly heavy object tied to one end. If you only polarize the swing of that object halfway... if you only mimic with your hand, the same arch the object is traveling, slightly... you get it to swing more widely... slightly. But you will never make it swing all the way around. But worse... if you give your hand a linear motion, that does not mimic the actual motion of the object at the other end of the string... even with your supposed reinforcement of that swing, you will find that its swinging will die down... and slow down... until your uncoordinated negative reinforcement of that objects motions actually starts to negate the motion of that object... and you will not only bring it to a complete halt, you will force it to start weakly moving in the opposite direction that its cyclic motion was originally trying to go.

On the other hand: if you give the object a full mimicking motion of 360 degrees instead of only half, or 180 degrees: you will not only speed up that arc: but make it go completely around, and keep on getting faster, and faster, and faster. The only limit to how fast and strong that motion becomes will be your own endurance to hang on to the ever-increasingly heavy weight-potential power-speed of that object, the tensile strength of the string, and the amount of friction it will create moving through the air. That is positive polarization, or as scientists call it: positive feedback.

If you only recognize two poles of anything... and not the full circular process-motion-dynamic. You will never be able to positively reinforce that energy and make it more energized-stronger-faster; so it evolves to a higher vibrational condition of dynamic balance. In fact, if you only try to move that object on your string to only two polar opposite locations, that object will start jerking wildly... in a random meaningless, unpredictable motion... trying to escape your foolish attempt to make it do what it was never designed to do.

That is generally the effect of all one-sided and two-sided selective polarization. It is only when you positively reinforce everything, that you get the dynamic of Life, of ever-increasing abundance, ever-increasing energy, ever-increasing diversity, ever-increasing creativity. As living organisms, we are designed to function by positive feedback, and create more life, more fun, more happiness, more sadness, more of everything by positively polarizing everything we feel-think-see-do, etc. Not selectively only self-gratifying aspects of ease. But when you only reinforce two polar opposites, and nothing else in-between: then you get random, insane, uncontrollable energy that is a destructive, random and meaningless hell.

That is one reason the belief in Hell exists. Because we have already created their own weak, random, meaningless living hells while alive, and cannot imagine an afterlife without it. History is full of thousands of accounts of corrupt powerful and wealthy people on their deathbeds... begging for forgiveness and absolution for the sins they committed during their life. The belief in instant ease, instant absolution, is a moral fantasy that keeps these people from facing any unpleasant accounting of their own actions while they are alive. Their desperate wish for some instant, magical, absolution on their deathbeds; is only a continuation of perpetuating this belief. If these corrupt people are not instantly forgiven, then their fate becomes unimaginably horrible. No culture ever refuses them this hypocritical easy way out. Especially the confessions of the rich and powerful on their deathbeds.

Institutionalized religions never ostracize the powers that keep them in power. Christianity is based upon the Myths of Instant Forgiveness. People are granted all kinds of absolution from their countless sins, while on their deathbeds. Only when they know they are dying, do they ever confess to a tiny part of their actual sins and actual guilt. Only when they know they are dying, only when they know it is too late for them to be actually punished for their sins and crimes.

Identity And Dehumanization

Dehumanization is when you do not feel anything for yourself, or for any other human person, whether it is your wife, your children, your neighbor, a stranger walking down the street. It is simply an emotional disconnect.. an emotional numbness where you feel nothing. Every human interaction and contact that lacks emotional feeling, is a dehumanized form of personal contact. Ultimately, any kind of dehumanized act-thought-feeling, any form of dehumanization: from mass murder, to snobbery, to indifference; is a condition of one-sided separation. All imbalances, all evil comes only as a result of how cut-off we are from our feelings, ourselves, other people and the world around us. Whatever exists in a state of imbalanced separation creates misery and unhappiness: our egos, fear, hate, envy, indifference, etc, are all conditions of imbalanced separateness: that is what using tools too much has created. Any kind of separation, whether it involves cutting yourself off, distancing yourself from, becoming numb or drugged or distracted... is all a tool-state of human existence. Every privileged condition of power, wealth, status and knowledge is a tool-state of separateness. Acting-thinking-feeling like a tool creates dehumanization. Simply the lack of connectiveness, the lack of the connective elements of your humanity, (Love, Courage, Honesty) creates unhappiness, imbalance and evil. The easiest way of determining if there is a lack of dynamic balance and connectivity within the human psyche is the lack of a continual Sense of Pure Wonder.

Tools do become more like our tool-brains. Our tool-brains do become more like tools. Humans do become more tool-like. That is the dynamic of the reflective feedback of the closed system of hand-eye-tool-brain coordination. But this closed cycle of feedback between the tool-brain and the tool does not include the totality of the human animal. It does not include the 4 billion-year-old evolutionary wisdom of our genetic history or the rest of our bodies, our lungs, our hearts, our livers, our stomachs, our legs, etc.... For humans to become more like computers and computers to become more like tool-brains does nothing to improve our over-all awareness or happiness. To function only as a tool, or more like a tool is a process of dehumanization.

The progress of technology, the corporatization of business, results in the dehumanization, and corruption of people who are involved in this process. No matter on what level: each person adds his or her contribution to the overall impact of the system. It is much easier for a company employee to be indifferent towards a customer by replacing personal ethics with company policy than if they had to deal with someone on a personal level. It is much easier to overcharge and cheat an insurance company or government bureaucracy, than an individual who carefully goes over each item and questions each charge.

To understand dehumanization, you need to look at human history from a tool perspective. For instance: human slavery is merely the universal predilection of all humans to use other animals including humans only as tools. The enslavement of other animals is not even called slavery; instead, we call it: domestication. Yet, that practice alone has been responsible for more inhumanity, brutality, killing, and bloodshed than all human slavery combined. We kill far more chickens, goats, pigs, and cattle, than we do humans: and without any qualms. Killers are replaceable. Anyone can drive a bulldozer, or pull a trigger, or push a button. But it is very, very hard to replace anyone who is creative: because each person's creativity is unique and can never be duplicated. The irony is that civilization glorifies killers, not creative people. The only creativity it glorifies is in tool-use... and that, usually only after the person is long dead. Simply because most creative people are not interested in becoming powerful or rich: they are not considered important.

In any civilized society, it is the fate of the powerless to be used by the powerful as tools. Throughout history, all who were powerless: women, children, servants, bondsmen, vassals, serfs, peasants, slaves, were deemed as some kind of property. Human slavery only began to die out when people found that they could make machines do the same work better, faster and more cheaply. To this day: all around the world: many, many cultures still women are used as slaves and draft animal to do all the hard labour to haul wood and water, care after the animals, feed the animals, feed the family, and do all the cooking and washing. While the men doing nothing except sit in the sun and talk. Their women are kept illiterate, ignorant, and working as draft animals and slaves all their lives.

Why? Because as far as the men are concerned: their livestock is more valuable than their women. Because any accumulation of monetary wealth means a higher status. And in countless agricultural cultures all around the world today: you will find that Livestock represents their status. How many cows or goats you have determines your standing. Women are ignored except as a means to raise more livestock. But since in some areas where the men cannot have multiple wives anymore as they once did: they force one woman to do the work of five or ten that had previously shared the burdens of work. That is one way they punish their women for the inconvenience of being forced to change their age-old cultural traditions, and lifestyle. Contraception is still forbidden to billions of women around the world. Simply because the superstition of the prowess of a man, their social standing and status: is determined by how fertile his wives are, and how many babies they can father.

Even the relief agencies that try to help them; are not allowed to change their sacred age-old culture, or tell them anything that might in the slightest way inconvenience their culture, or male dominance. Only if the women take it upon themselves to change how they live does anything change. The biggest fear in such awful cultures is the fear of anything in their culture changing.

Why are these cultures so awful and so inhumane? Because humans value their culture more than the people who live inside these cultures. Humans are basically only expressions of the tool-cultures they live-in. They are carriers of this culture. The extinction of any old, obsolete culture is regarded as a crime far worse than genocide, or mass killings. You can always have a bigger population by having more babies to perpetuate your sacred culture. But once a sacred culture dies: there is no living thing that can bring it back except humans who are so nostalgic about their forgotten, old, obsolete cultures that they spend billions of dollars and millions of man-hours in trying to re-create it, and stage it, and re-introduce it back into their newer cultures. Everyone is supposed to be full of unquestioning awe of their own culture. Their culture itself is supposed to be more important than themselves. Humans are carriers of this tool-disease called culture. We are basically carriers of abstract dead ideas called a sacred culture that is not supposed to change.

The concepts of ownership, slavery and power, stem directly from tool-use. Ownership and Power go together. It is natural to think that you own anything that you can manipulate or control. Whatever form it takes; the basic imbalance of people working for other people is also the basis for all accumulation of power and wealth. The Industrial Revolution merely signaled the transition from human slavery; to a combination of human wage-slavery, plus machine-slavery.

What are factories but places where people are trained to function only as machines? Why are migrant workers and illegal aliens from Mexico called Braseros or Arms without human bodies or souls? What are armies but people dehumanized and trained to function only as machines... to destroy and kill other humans? Today, we call this kind of tool-enslavement: technology. It is unthinkable to imagine modern human existence without it. Slavery of all kinds: Humans enslaving plants, Humans enslaving other animals, Humans enslaving rivers, Humans enslaving eco-systems, Humans enslaving each other, Humans becoming enslaved to their own tools, tools enslaving humans: enslavement is the unmistakable earmark of civilization. Power, control, oppression, manipulation, and slavery, is the legacy of 10,000 years of over-intensive tool-use

The beginning of human cruelty originates from over-intensive tool-use. Once humans became more tool-oriented than life-oriented... once they valued the dead things in their hands more than the living things they could kill with these dead things... they became cruel. Civilization was born out of the enslavement and butchery of animals on a mass-killing level. Once the connection between Humans and Nature was destroyed by over-intensive tool-use, once humans no longer felt at home in the Wilds of Nature, but only within enclosed shelters: human cruelty was born. As our tool have evolved and developed; so too has human cruelty grown and developed. The irony is that we actually think they have control over the tools we use; while it is the tool that controls and determines the kinds of cruelty humans practice daily without thinking. Whether it is weapons of war or laboratory experiment on animals or humans, ordinary farm tools. Whether it is the enslavement of humans, or the enslavement of other animals: it is all the same.

Human slavery exists because of our fear of death. If people were not afraid to die, no human would ever allow themselves to become enslaved. If people were not afraid to die; they would rather die first than become a slave. The freedom of every independent Nation is based upon this: the willingness to die rather than being conquered and enslaved. Thomas Paine's famous line: 'Give me Liberty, or give me Death', is the only reason Nations exist. If a Nation cannot force its citizens to fight to the death to insure its survival: then it can be conquered and enslaved easily. But if even a tiny Nation like Vietnam decides to fight to the death rather than let a foreign power invade it and rule it: then the larger Nations had better beware which Nations they try to enslave.

Human slavery comes from cowardice; it comes from a lack of courage. It comes from civilized people becoming so used to ease, and cowardice, and dishonesty; that they willingly lie to themselves; and convince themselves it is better to exist as a slave and; than be free and killed. If every slave would rather die than be a slave: then there would be an instant end to all slavery. Then every slave would either kill their masters; or die trying to kill them. And every master would either be dead, or own a useless dead slave... with every other living slave on this planet searching to kill the remaining masters that were still alive; so they could finally exterminate the entire culture-idea and concept of slavery and masters as an acceptable way of living. If there was no fear of dying... no fear of death: then there would be no slavery. And also no civilization. If the first horses that were enslaved had refused to be ridden: we would have no work horses. If the first fowl that was captured had refused to eat as a captive slave: we would have no chickens to kill and eat.

Without the concept of other animals and other humans being enslaved, manipulated and used for some kind of advantage: what could civilization be? Then each person would be forced to create their own advantage by their own effort. If every person refused to take advantage of any living thing... what would human society be like? If every person refused to take advantage of any dead thing... then there would be no tools, no tool-use and no technology. Human existence is a matter of fear and Courage. If you enslave a piece of flint to do your bidding. If you enslave a thighbone of a Wildebeest to do your bidding: you are actually perpetrating the same cruelty on a dead thing, as you are when you force a living thing to do your own bidding. The evolution of Human civilization is the evolution forcing your will upon living and dead things. It is an evolution of different levels and kinds of cruelty... and how this tool-cruelty became normalized: until it produces different levels and kinds of cowardice, dishonesty, fear, greed, and slavery.

Humans hypocritically try to discriminate between different forms of cruelty. The idea that it is okay to kill all other living things except humans remains a widely held belief. As with everything else, we try to separate instead of connect. We try to separate and label cruelty into acceptable and unacceptable norms. What is 'cruel' is basically what is not 'normal'. What is 'normal' is not 'cruel'.

Cruelty is a process of tool-values, tool-training, tool-living, tool-thinking, tool-feeling and tool-functioning. The result is the same: separation without a balancing connection; i.e. imbalanced separation, imbalanced Splitness. The degree, to which this is practiced, how it is practiced, why it is practiced is irrelevant: the dynamic, the process and the result is the same: cruelty. Whether an entire ecosystem is killed, or an entire forest... whether you kill 20 million of your own countrymen, or 5 million of another country's soldiers, whether you bomb the civilians of another country or kill your own civilians; the act: the process, the dynamic is the same. Tool-brains controlling tool-bodies, using tools to kill with. Imbalanced humans committing imbalanced, separated acts without connecting them to realize the horror of what they are actually doing. Separated, desensitized humans enclosed inside their self-created, distorted realities and normalities: unaware of just how, why, and what they are doing... unaware of being slaves to their own precious tools. Tool-cruelty does not discriminate between living things. In order for civilization to further enslave its wage slaves, it is now creating the condition of debt slavery. Once a person is brainwashed to become a consumer, they often become imprisoned by debt. Overconsumption = Debt = financial slavery... which is basically a condition of fiscal imbalance. But so is any over-accumulation of wealth.

It is spiritual state of greed. Always wanting more than you can have. Never having enough, never satisfied. Always wanting more than you can afford:

As long as you can keep control of your finances, you can play the credit card companies like a string by simply paying your debts on time monthly. The only reason these companies make money is by relying on people's greed outweighing their self-control and fiscal responsibility. If every person were fiscally responsible, they would never have to borrow money or pay interest on it. Then every credit card company would go bankrupt. To profit from human greed is corrupt. To encourage it, to feed off it is corrupt. But in our consumer culture, since greed is the dominant cultural value: it is regarded as being a necessary evil. Our society is so structured that borrowing money is almost unavoidably necessary in order to buy a house. In modern society it is seen as normal, there is nothing wrong with being continually in debt. The slavery of debt is normal just as many other kinds of slavery; only, it is not seen as a form of slavery. Like all other basic aspects of civilization, the concept of slavery has been creatively abstracted and split up, given different labels, slants, twists, and spins. Human power and greed has only shifted to a certain extent from people working for you as slaves to machines working for you. So instead of 100% bonafide slaves working for you, you get the mixture of wage slaves and machines working for you. This more abstract form of slavery is now legalized and upheld as the idea of money working for you, instead of actual people. This is merely another way of abstracting slavery. What this has done is to produce the totally dehumanized phenomenon of abstract greed: where there is a complete disconnection between greed and the effects of that greed.

Try tracing the effect of a stockholder, to a chairman of a corporation, to their corporate policies, to what political clout the corporation has, to what resources they consume, to what they produce, where it is manufactured, where it is sold, how its products are used, the effect of those products on the environment: and you get a vast segmented array of influences and forces: each cloaked and insulated in secrecy, each considered to be separate from the other. Thus: the dehumanizing abstraction of money and the universal motivation of greed fuels the entire global system of capitalism: and it does so by splitting up human existence into compartmentalized, separated processes, by insulating each one through secrecy. Recently, the privatization of prisons in America has resulted in corporations being able to use the labour of unpaid criminals in various ways. But in or out of prison: corporate policies do not vary in the seeking of profits, or using people for profit as wage-slaves.

Humans have managed to wall themselves off from much of the Natural World and from each other as much as possible, with the development of cities... by erecting insular cubicles called buildings and rooms. Except for when they had to travel outside a building, or outside a city. If you try and find out where they going; you will find that the only reason they are driving cars in the first place is pure necessity, pure logistics... getting form one necessary location to another... because that is how cities are made. Cities force people to travel in crossing patterns... they force people to be at cross-purpose to each other, they force All human energies to be in a continual state of conflicting cross-purposes because all of their goals, all of their motivations, all of their destinations, where they want to go are at cross-intents, cross purposes to each other until you get gridlock... until you get all human energy nullifying itself into an insulated frenzy of meaningless useless activity with no good end results.

Today, Americans spend only 3% of their time outdoors. Today, you can strap yourself into a glass and steel cubicle so no outside human contact is possible, and also destroy any sense of connection you may have to the Earth, even when you are traveling. The Earth itself must be covered with concrete for you to travel over it: so your passage becomes totally meaningless and without impact for you. Except for destroying the Earth itself as a necessary condition for traveling over it. Rather than having streets for the use of children and adults to socialize and play on, it was taken over by machines... until the memory of a street meant to be used for humans instead of machines no longer exists. People were pushed to the side, to using sidewalks as the machines took over the main centers of the roads and streets. The invention of the car stands out as a landmark advance in tool-separation-segmentation-insulation. Because of cars: our social, physical and environmental alienation has increased. It is the ultimate separation of humans from each other, and from the planet they live on.

By living in gated communities, in gated buildings, by walling ourselves off from everything and everyone around us: we are leading increasingly hermetically sealed lives... traveling in hermetically sealed cars and planes and buildings. Everything we use must be hermetically sealed; everything that is sold or bought must first be hermetically sealed. Modern consumer culture has taken our separation from any natural environment to its logical conclusion: total sterility, total insulation, and total boring deadness. Consumer goods are being packaged by a standard of total sterility. Why? Fear of germs, fear of other people poisoning you, the fear of all natural things from insects to animals invading the sterile confines of our existence. People have become paranoid of contact with anything that is not totally sterile. Packages, bottles, boxes are wrapped and rewrapped.

Special seals are placed on every cap. Yet, it is the very sterility of modern civilization that is truly sick... producing increasingly imbalanced, distorted human realities. This sterility prevents any involvement, appreciation or exploration of Nature. Nature itself becomes disgusting, icky, alien, feared. People only feel safe inside walls, surrounded by concrete and asphalt: they become city people. Yet in Europe, natural, everyday earth has been re-introduced into children's playgrounds because Science has belatedly found out that exposure to the natural microbes in earth is crucial in strengthening the immune systems of growing children: thus preventing them from developing countless allergies and medical problems later on in life.

Now with the invention of air travel, computers, cell phones, headsets, and video games; there are yet more ways of cutting off our awareness from one's actual life-reality-surroundings-existence-environment. People are becoming so unaware of what actually exists around them, they are becoming so completely engrossed in their own abstractions; that for them...for all intents and purposes: the Actual Universe no longer exists.

Why are people doing this? Fear of Nature? Fear of the Universe? Spiritual emptiness, boredom, normality, expediency, convenience, the need for distraction? Paranoia, cowardice, ease, self-gratification? How does this affect human happiness or health? How does it affect our Sense of Wonder, or Love, or Courage, or Honesty?

What is it, with this craze of talking in public on a cell phone? It is merely another way to not be aware of the Universe around you. It merely another way of pretending that nothing else exists except you. That is also one reason so many people wear sunglasses today. It is a safe way of observing other people, but never letting them see you are observing them. It is another sick, cowardly, technical one-sided advantage. You can see the other person's eyes, but the other person cannot see your eyes. What happens when you catch them with their sunglasses off? Suddenly you see their weak, fear-filled cowardly eyes. Suddenly you see that they cannot even look you in the face. Suddenly they become pathetic. But let them put their sunglasses back on; and they are instantly transformed back into impassive haughty, cold, superior-looking dehumanized humanoids... into expressionless human robots who are afraid to smile... afraid to show any emotions, afraid to show their eyes, afraid to show their faces, afraid of everyone around them.

Much of the increasing tolerance between people; has stemmed from the dilution of their original ethnic culture. The effect of this has resulted in many people turning their work into a religion, simply because there is nothing else of any true value in their lives. If what you identify with is not totally frozen into any particular religion-culture-belief system; then you can tolerate other beliefs much easier: especially if they are equally as diluted, and nobody takes them too seriously. The weaker a person's cultural abstractive identity is; the more inclusive they can be... abstractively. However: if there is no personal morality or ethic to replace the loss of older cultural values and identities, then people become spiritually empty. The more people develop their abstract abilities, the more modern, the more technological their culture becomes; the less that culture contains any human values of Love, Honesty, Courage and Wonder. Technology increases the importance of tool values in society, not the importance of human values. Not meaning; 'Are you living?' but: 'are you working?'

Inside civilization: most human interactions have become dehumanized into a completely impersonal exchange of money for goods and services. Instead of a human interaction, it becomes an abstract transaction. It stops being human in nature. One person hands over the money, while the other person hands over the goods or services. Almost nothing human occurs during this transaction or exchange. But now: this dehumanized transaction has become further dehumanized by not even happening between two humans. Instead: a machine replaces one of the humans. So the human slides in his card: and the machine slides out the money, or pumps the gas. Or the human picks up the phone and a machine answers telling him to push a button, which he does: only to have another machine answer him, telling him to push another button. Increasingly; people interact with machines instead of other people. Rather than interact humanly, people interact via e-mail; now there are interactive videogames, interactive computer programs, interactive TV. Almost every business on the Internet tries to hide their phone number as ingeniously as possible because the last thing they want to do is actually talk to a living customer. They try to force customers to interact with taped messages and computer programs. This is the new, modern inhumanity of machine abstraction: destroying all forms of human-to-human contact and replacing it with human-to-machine contact. The model of supplying goods and services for money (capitalism) is systematically making human-to-human interaction obsolete.

People have become so cut off from each other and their surroundings, their surroundings have become so boring, they themselves have become so boring; that watching television and being entertained by mass media has replaced socializing to a frightening degree. People have nothing interesting to say to each other, they have less and less in common with each other; they live in such a normalized condition of non-awareness that they would rather be entertained and distracted by watching TV than talk to each other or do anything socially on an intimate human level. Literally: mindless, non-critical non-awareness is becoming the normal state of human reality. There is a complimentary dynamic at work here: increase the amount of non-creative work and you increase the level of boredom; and consequently, you increase the need for distraction and entertainment. Split up human awareness into more and more segments, into sound bites, into flashed images; and you increase the craving for meaningless entertainment and distraction. The gradual process of people being slowly forced to live like tools, to become more tool-like may not be apparent over any one lifetime, but today you have the stark truth of how much we have become like a machine that is turned on or off. Humans are being forced into two absolute tool-states: functioning and non-functioning, or working (on) and non-work, (off), or working and vegging out on the couch watching TV. How many times have you heard? 'Are you working today?'

'No: I'm off.'

Or...

‘Are you off?’

Or:

‘Are you on?’ ...

Not meaning; ‘Are you living?’ but: ‘are you working?’

Work, and any kind of mindless non-participatory spectator entertainment such as movies or TV, is how much of our time is being spent by a majority of the affluent. Now, not only is the TV used as a babysitter; the computer is being used to fill up the empty social vacuum of adolescents and adults. Finding easier ways of doing things mechanically, effectively and subtly poisons the entire fabric of human existence: the result is a loss in the quality of life. But if you have never experienced any way of life other than the one you are in, you will never realize just how corrupt your specific normality actually is. This process of how dysfunctional corruption becomes normalized in society, as a way of life that is taken for granted, has never changed.

The goal of a tool-based society is for humans to function like tools-machines as much as possible. Everything else is of secondary importance-value. Today in modern society: both parents must work in order to support the family: their machine functioning, their work comes before their family. They barely have time to see each other in passing during their hectic schedule of machine-functioning activities. That is the miracle of technology.

The problem with civilized societies is that the only way to have a healthy economy is by the depersonalized exchange of goods and services for money. If in order to have a healthy economy; you have to leave out the humanness of people. But if you have to leave out all of the human values of Love, Courage, Honesty, and Wonder: and keep only tool-values, tool-principles: then what you get is a dehumanized slave population that keeps on accumulating-consuming-wasting, using more tools, requiring more tool-skills, and having less human skills. This gradual process has been now underway for 10,000 years. It is only when you step completely outside of this dynamic and look at it from the outside that you can see these trends at work.

How much time do you spend driving your car each week? How much time do you spend with your children? What do you spend more time on? Your car or your children? If you include the time you needed to work to afford that car... and the time to fix it, and the time needed to work to pay for the insurance, and wash it, and clean it, and put gas into it... including all the hours you spend driving it: Do you spend more time with your children than all the time needed to be able in order to afford, buy, maintain, and drive your car?

Of course you don't. Working to make enough money to afford a car, maintaining it, working to afford the insurance for it, the registration, license, gas, oil, etc... including all the hours you spend behind the wheel. Washing it, etc... add up to much more time than you spend with your children. Machines take much, much more time and attention than a living thing does. A living thing does not rust, or stop working if one tiny thing goes wrong. If you bother to do a time-study upon this, you will find that it is far more time-consuming and expensive maintain machines than living things.

But your car is only one machine.... Add up the time you spend on all the other machines. And see what fraction of your life, your time and your energy you spend with your children compared to the time you spend with machines. Modern consumers actually equate buying things for their children as spending time with them. As long as you are in the same room, even though you're both ignoring each other; that is also considered to be spending time with them. What kind of time?

Now people call any time spent with their children quality time. If a person can spend one hour of quality time a day with their children, they are considered to be exceptional parents. The fact is that most civilized parents spend almost no quality time with their children. The idea of parents spending time with children is pawned off to baby sitters, and nannies, and schools, and extra curricular activities, and TV, and movies, and computers, and shopping. Take away the distractions, entertainments, self-gratifications, chores, routines, and what is left?

What is the consumer craze and love of buying and driving huge gas-guzzlers called SUV's? SUV's are a symptom of the human ego. They are just a way for people who live in a state of subconscious rage... saying to other people:

'Outa my way!... outa my way!... get outa my way!'

'I am bigger than you. I am more powerful than you. I sit higher than you. My machine is more powerful than your machine.'

'I am safe in this tank of a car. I will buy a Hummer, and be so insulated and isolated from all the people who I despise and ignore and drive over them if I have to. They cannot touch me... I am safely insulated inside this huge military machine.'

'I am driven, I am goal oriented. I am successful. I have a linear awareness. I go from one point to another point, and nobody better get in my way, because if you do... you will die.... I will crush you under the huge wheels and massive weight of my SUV.'

'I have a 4-wheel drive. I can go anywhere I want to. I can crush anyone under my wheels I want to. Nothing can stop me. I am powerful. I drive. I am driven. I am driving. Get outa my way! Get outa my way! I am a huge ego! My ego is bigger than yours! Your puly car is small! My car is big! I am bigger than you! Get outa my way!'

SUV's are a status symbol of the wealthy affluent upwardly mobile rich; who can afford expensive cars. They are a symbol of military power, and raw might, raw size, and pure insularity.

Repetition

If you want to look at how healthy a person's job, environment, lifestyle is: just see how much diversity is involved and how much duplication is involved. A healthy job is diverse, ever-changing. A healthy environment is diverse, ever-changing. A healthy lifestyle is diverse, ever-changing. The unhealthiest environment is when there is a lack of diversity: as in a prison cell. The unhealthiest lifestyle is when there is no diversity, when people are locked into the same repetitious habits and routines. Most people are so locked into the same habits, only when they almost die from a heart attack or some other major pathological health crisis do they ever wake up and change how they live and what they eat. Most pathological illness comes from bad living and eating habits that accumulate over time. By simply not changing, people gradually become unhealthier. This is the curse of all forms of normality: take the activity of walking in a city down a concrete sidewalk and walking in a forest. The sidewalk is uniformly flat, the building surrounding you are dead. If you walk down the same sidewalk each day, you will see the same boring unchanging structures every day. Your gait will not change; you will have no need to keep your senses alerts because there is no unevenness to the sidewalk. You can perform the function of walking like a robot while remaining almost completely oblivious to your surroundings. You can ignore the buildings around you.

You don't even have to look where you are going. You can ignore the sidewalk itself, except when you come to a curb. If you go walking in a forest, you can't do what you did in the city. You can't ignore the environment around you, or take it for granted. You have to look where you are going; you have to keep alert. You need to be careful and not get lost. Each step is different. Every inch of your environment is different. If you come back later, everything will have subtly changed as all the growing-living things in the forest keep on changing with the seasons, with time... What is the difference?

If you carefully examine and compare these two kinds of environments, these two lifestyles: action-by-action, and ask yourself: "how much repetition is involved?" You will see that in any artificially constructed environment, there is an incredible volume of repetition: repetitious acts; using the same tool the same way, doing the same action, being in the same room, walking down the same sidewalk. While in a natural environment there is much less of this, because everything is different: each situation, environment, action, is different, more diverse. What I am trying to get at; is that the difference between a healthy way of living and an unhealthy one is the difference between diversity and duplication.

The Effect of Duplication

Now: tool-duplication is reaching its last absurdity. With the new microchip computer technology; duplication has become so cheap that it is almost free. As a result, it is spawning like crazy. And the cheaper it gets, the harder it is to value it, the harder it is to make a profit from it. For now: businesses are still relying on people buying conventional concrete things like CD's. But, if you can download a CD for nothing: then why buy it? Here is the irony: the better you get at duplication, the easier it is to duplicate things, the less you value it, the more worthless it becomes... and then where is your profit? Except by creating an exponentially accelerating explosion of more duplication? And what is the result? An exponentially accelerating explosion of waste, mountains of garbage hauled away daily from modern houses that use things only once and throw them away. One-time usage is becoming more popular. Throwaway cameras, throwaway bags, throw-away paper towels, throw-away anything made of a cheap material that is not designed to be used very long.

You could argue that the connective aspects of tool-use balance its separating aspects... that the Internet is an ultimately beneficial, connective web of information-knowledge due to the technology of computers. But this connectivity is only abstractive in nature. There is a difference between the connectivity of dead tools and the connectivity of living organisms, between mechanical connectiveness and organic connectiveness. Just as there is a difference between how a house is made by nailing dead pieces of lumber together: and how a living ecosystem is made by mixing the energies of the sun, earth, air, water, trees, plants, and living organisms together. Besides: the top 500 search engines on the Internet are not about information: they are about pornography

So: the concept of identity results in duplication: the more you duplicate, the more worthless it becomes. The outcome of this one-sided dynamic of tool-use is inevitable. You get a duplicated, boring, dead, worthless, meaningless environment. Why is it happening? Because the tool-brain mirrors how tools work. The tool insatiably wants more duplication: more dead things. Or is it the other way around? It does not make any difference. What you get is accumulation. What you get is a re-re-re-reflection of the tool dynamic, of human abstraction, of greed: of human spiritual corruption. One example of the increased level of abstraction in any civilized society compared to aboriginal societies is how people are named. In aboriginal societies: people are either given a name that fits their personality; or when they reach a certain age, they choose a name for themselves. Either way, a name becomes a unique fingerprint that in some way matches the person possessing that name.

But as civilization grew in population and as people became more tool-oriented... as their identity became based upon some central-common historical-cultural background of myth-legend-folklore-religion: they came to repeat the same names over and over. People's names became identical for the first time. They were named after the tool functions they performed: not their personalities. They became Millers, Carpenters, Carvers, Smiths, etc... Their first names became repetitious duplicates of their ancestors: Son of John... Johnson. These labels-identities were inflicted on each person at birth: imprinting people with a prefabricated identity, a prefabricated self-image, a pre-destined function-role in their society... giving them no chance to grow up and freely develop and discover their own personality; because the name they were given had nothing to do with their own individual uniqueness. Because of civilization: people were forced into duplicate roles-functions-jobs-names-identities.

Human Change vs. Tool-Change

The difficulty in motivating humans to become more balanced, healthier: is because of each person's normality. Unless your normality changes to a healthier state, you cannot compare any two different conditions; and realize that one is better than the other. And even if you do change: even this cannot give you a proper perspective on your own health. A shift from one condition of normality to another condition of normality is not a fluid, dynamic balance. It is only when your normality keeps on changing instead of staying the same, that you get true dynamic balance. Only in a state of continual change, growth, learning, expansion and Pure Wonder, can a person stay balanced in a condition of relatively good health.

Originally, all human routines were determined by the cycles of Nature, which are always constantly changing. Once these routines became disconnected from Nature, they became more and more frozen. By adapting our tools in order to survive instead of adapting themselves: we humans did not have to change or evolve ourselves. By piggybacking on the evolutionary development of our own tools, we humans have enjoyed a free evolutionary ride for 100,000 years. The more our ancestors used tools in order to survive, the less they had to evolve genetically. The results can be seen today in our modern technology changing at an incredible speed: while all of the age-old human problems, imbalances and practices remain relatively unchanged... except when they are forced to adapt to the changing technology of tools: not to nature, not genetically.

However, this evolutionary shift-imbalance has created a basic conflict-problem. If tools continue evolving and humans don't.... If mechanical evolution replaces biological evolution as the dominant energy-flow on this planet; what is the inevitable result? By making the Earth so chemically toxic, that only machines can survive it: this could also destroy the organic humans who created these tools in the first place. Tool-technology has upset the global balance of all the ecosystems on the Earth to the point where most of them are in a state of decline, or at a crisis level. Mass extinctions, global climate-change, global pollution: all point towards this trend. Living organisms are becoming fewer in number, growth cycles are declining, environments are becoming harsher for all living things from frogs to grasses. Yet because humans are basically crisis-oriented problem solvers, no concerted attempt has been made to address the fundamental conflict between living organisms and tools. Since we benefit from tools in the short run, the long-term consequences of tool-use are not even an issue for us. Rather: we worship the technology producing these effects instead of questioning it. We refuse to look at the human factors that are actually in need of change. Because that kind of change is difficult and painful: while all tool-change is based upon expediency and convenience. So: we insanely try to fix our problems with the very tools which created these problems.

Tools vs. Life

There is a basic difference between the accumulation of genetic experience-knowledge through the DNA of living organisms, and the accumulation of mechanical experience-facts through the abstractions of tool-symbols. The compression of experience-knowledge in living organisms is achieved through increasing simplification. The compression of experience-knowledge in mechanical abstractions is achieved through increasing complication. These two dynamics exist as two opposing goals-trends. The computer is a perfect example of this: the smaller it gets, the more complex it becomes. But in living organisms, the more millions of years of genetic experience is passed on to the next generation: the smaller the compression of DNA gets, the simpler it gets. Human happiness is achieved through increasing simplicity. Human unhappiness is achieved through increasing complexity. The integrated compression of human wisdom is achieved through increasing simplicity. The mechanical compression of machine wisdom is achieved through increasing complexity.

The Dynamics of Distraction

The effect of civilization on human awareness can also be shown in this way:

1. Being forced to spend most of our time using tools, using our tool-brains as tools, leaving our human potential-growth undeveloped.
  2. Separation, segmentation, accumulation, more things to pyramidally focus-on, resulting in the segmentation of all awareness, developing a programmed response to stimuli; focusing on everything only pyramidally, segmentally and fleetingly, non-connectively.
  3. Reflective fear, the insulated ego, the unwillingness to explore-digest-experience one's own self, resulting in inner emptiness and the need for all kinds of vicarious experiences, or entertainment.
  4. Normality, desensitization of awareness, non-changing deadness, inner emptiness, boredom.
  5. Not having learned how to live in a balanced state of awareness, (living in the present, balanced between the past and the future), not having learned how to exist in a state of Pure Wonder: which may also be described as "pure being."
- . Not having learned how to turn off our dominant tool-brain, not able to control the reflectivity of our own self-created abstractions or thoughts. Once we cannot control our own dominant tool-brain, then it continues to produce thoughts; so we develop a condition where we are incapable of stopping our random thoughts. Without any Inner or Outer Sense of Wonder, these reflecting and re-reflecting thoughts become the state of our awareness, the condition of our awareness. Then our awareness is directed and governed by the dynamic of this type of distractive thinking so we only think in distractive patterns-ways, so we think, feel, act, non-connectively.

All these general effects of living inside civilization produce the need for busyness-work-distraction-entertainment. This can be seen from the earliest participation of people in social events merely as spectators, the earliest building of the inverted pyramidal structures of the arena. What is distraction? It is the segmental, pyramidal focus of human awareness upon arbitrarily chosen unconnected things. It is trying to stimulate-occupy, fill a reflective, de-sensitized awareness with meaningless, unconnected stimulus-novelty-sensationalism.

Two obvious characteristics of human awareness are its need for distraction and the fact that it is primarily crisis-oriented. Anything in the past is of little importance. A perfect example of this today is called News... mostly sensational pieces of information are presented in a completely random-arbitrary order, totally unconnected to each other, dealing with things that have no direct connection to the viewers. None of these pieces of information are examined in any depth, or explored, or evaluated, or compared, or put into perspective, or put into any meaningful context that would apply to the viewers. The only thing this does is manage to hold the viewers attention: momentarily-segmentally-unconnectedly. By focusing exclusively on only crisis-oriented news events: people around the world have lost all understanding of the causality of history: they have lost all perspective of the present in relation to the past. There is no historical, causal understanding of events, no attempt to put them into any historical context. All the media does is endlessly skip from one crisis to the next. But does it ever follow one story to its conclusion, or trace it back to its origins? Never. Any pyramidalized structure that organizes any kind of mass viewing has one flaw: it can only show you one thing from one viewpoint. Once you become a spectator, you become a passive pawn to whatever they decide to show you or let you watch. Essentially, the spectator is a victim of their own passivity and their urge to pyramidally focus upon only one thing. Mass media by its very existence effectively destroys any alternative source of information except what it provides. If you cannot televise your story or your opinion: tough luck. The story that gets airtime is accepted as the only one worth watching, as the most important version and viewpoint. In effect: mass media functions not to disseminate information, but to funnel only one piece of information and ram it down the minds of billions of viewers who blindly accept whatever they are exposed to. How much of the news is only designed to momentarily catch your attention, with some sort of crisis, catastrophe or sensationalism? How much of it panders to people's fears? How much of it is just overblown hype? Add up all of the thousands of hours of watching such eye-catching sound bites and what benefit is it to you? Does it add to your happiness? Knowledge? Wisdom? Experience? Insight? What beneficial effect does it have? What use does it serve? Satisfying the need to gawk? Or be vicariously titillated? Or horrified?

Giving you a false impression-feeling that you are somehow in touch with what is actually happening to 6 ½ billion people around the world when you are actually living inside an isolated bubble? That nothing else of any importance has occurred in the world, except these items, which are selectively chosen for their audience appeal? What happens when you increase the intensity of any kind of Pyramidal focus to the level of obsession? You get the psychological disorder known as stalking. You get polarized eating disorders like Bulimia and Anorexia. All kinds of imbalanced mental and emotional conditions are created from imbalanced Pyramidal Focus.

Mass Media has the huge power of telling people what is important. The media news has the 'responsibility' of literally telling billions of humans every day what were the most important events that happened. Whether it reports on a local sausage-eating contest, on a celebrity divorce. Whatever it reports. It is telling millions and billions of people.... just by the fact that they have decided to put it on the TV.... just because they have decided to print it.... that these are the only important things which happened today. However...the insinuation, the message they are trying to convey to the masses has another side to it. And that other side is the unspoken assumption. Which is: “Everything else that happened today all over the world today is not important.” The point is: the news media no longer reports the news: it creates it, it makes its own news, it has become detached from the reality it is supposed to report, and that is very dangerous because it is now only propaganda that is reported and covered, not what is really going on, not the issues that are really important. The news industry has become a censoring device that censors the news:

“Only what we have decided to show you is important. We have weeded out the unimportant things. We have edited all the unimportant things out of the news... We only tell you what we think is new. Not what is actually new. Not what actually happened. And what we think is new is not actually new at all; it is what we think you will swallow, and we will feed you this repetitive shit day after day, night after night for the rest of your fucking lives whether you like it or not.”

‘Trust us. We know what we are doing. We have been weeding out unimportant thing out of the news for you for almost ‘xx’ years now. We are professionals. We have professional editors. Who work for professional corporations who are not slanting or censoring your news at all. We have experienced personnel who we hire and fire as we need. We have topflight reporters whose jobs depend on what policy our corporate masters happen to hold. We have famous revered anchormen. We have famous journalists. Anything we have not reported Today... is not important. Whatever we have not reported... you do not need to know about it. We have given you all the pertinent facts. We have boiled it down for you. We have studied, and edited and crafted our news so you will be informed. Now you know everything there is to know. You need look no deeper. You do not need to look at any other news source... See? All The other channels have the same exact content. So we must be giving you the truth. We’re all the same because we’re all owned by the same corporate masters. Because we are so professional, that all of us have independently arrived at reporting on the same stories. We have all independently chosen the exact same few stories from all the thousands and millions of stories and issues that are important in the world today... So we must know what we are doing.’

But the Media is even more powerful than that. Not only does it tell you what are the most important things that happen each day. Not only do they decide what are the most important things that happened. They can make you believe them simply by how much attention, and time they spend on it. It does not matter what it is. If the media decides to go into a feeding frenzy over a court case. Not only is that all you will see and hear on the news for months, even years...not only is that all people will talk about. But... while they are doing this.... They are not reporting on anything else going on around the whole world.... For years.... For months... and that environmental fact, that effect in itself: forces people to believe that nothing else of any importance happened during those months and years. Because? Of course. If anything had happened that was important during all that time, why the media would have reported on it, wouldn’t they? Shouldn’t they? Did they?

It does not matter. All you know is what you see and hear on the TV: nothing else. If all you see and hear comes from a single tiny pinhole called a TV. Then that is all you will know, and that is all you will believe. One source of truth: one bible, brainwashing millions and billions of people... where have we seen this before? Oops.

Even worse. Merely the length of time they choose to spend on anything called news; automatically determines its importance. You can have a national uprising in Chile. If your news gives the story only 15 seconds airtime.... Why then. That tiny National uprising can’t be all that important, now can it? I mean... if it had been really important... they would have spent more time on it. Like the story about the cat up the tree. There was the local reporter talking to the fireman. For over two minutes. Now that story I remember. ‘Huh? What National Revolution? Oh... I forgot... it was merely a short statement... I barely caught the words. It was some South American country, Chile or Argentina or something. But that’s not important. Don’t bother me with that unimportant crap. They barely covered it. Yeah, they had a five-second mention of some demonstrations going on in front of the republican convention in New York... so what? It’s not important. Just a few hotheads that’s all...’

Oh?... You mean millions of people from all over America have organized hundreds of demonstrations in New York against the 2004 Republican Convention? And that they all organized their own groups independently of the others? And that when they all arrived at New York, and found hundreds of thousands of other people all flocking into New York for the same purpose of deposing Bush from office, and the Media didn’t report this to the Nation? And when these demonstrators started marching through New York by the million strong ... the media still did not report on this march?

CBS’s coverage of the 2004 Olympics was such an abysmal failure and the viewership was so low... that it fleetingly reported about these millions of protesters against Bush. Who had been marching for three days even before the convention even started?... A few other stations barely mentioned this unimportant news... while the entire coverage inside the convention goes on for ours, days, weeks.... Because the few thousand conventioners are important than the millions of protesters?

But... The media has their rationalization. The protests were peaceful. There was no looting. No breaking of windows. Why should we cover a peaceful demonstration of millions of protesters? These millions of ordinary people, who are not powerful or rich as sin, are not important. The billionaires being voted into office are important. That’s where our cameras were aimed at for two weeks. How dare you criticize us for being bias! We covered both billionaire conventions. So one of them had a few million protesters outside which we refused to cover. So what.

Oops. Oh. I see. Now if the protesters had rioted, and burned and looted... Then they would have gotten their media coverage... oh. But they didn’t do that. They were all peaceful law-abiding citizens. They were not crackpots or hotheads. They knew damn well that if they had become violent then the Republicans could have pointed to them victoriously, and righteously... saying to the media reporters:

‘See? These people who are against us are only the lunatic fringe. Do you want to join them? Anarchists who loot and burn? Who are irresponsibly violent? Don’t listen to these crazy violent criminals. They’re the ones who are evil, not us.’

So the Republican millionaire conventioners had it both ways. They won both ways. When the hundreds of thousands of protesters showed up one week ahead of time before the convention to protest it, and get on National Media. The Republican Corporate OWNED Media simply refused to cover them as a newsworthy story. If the protesters had gotten angry about not being seen on the national news, and started being violent; the Corporate Republican Media would have instantly demonized them. Then the viewers would have become even more afraid of lawlessness, and voted in more strongmen like Mussolini and supported Bush even more avidly. Out of fear and hate.

The Corporate Republican Media has done this kind of selective censored lying broadcasting many times before. It showed only the violence, and tarred hundreds of democratic movements around the world as violent anarchist radicals when they were nothing of the sort. They have regularly portrayed millions of peaceful protesters as a few dissident crackpots in the streets. Never showing or mentioning the millions or thousands of people who did not become violent. Simply by being selective about where they point this one tiny pinhole of a camera that all the rest of the world is supposed to watch, and take all their information from. Oops. But there is supposed to be no censorship of the press in America. America is supposed to have a free press. You mean a corporate-owned National Media can do that? You mean it can cover-up and hide hundreds of organized protests involving millions of ordinary citizens in the middle of New York City from the entire Nation? Before and during a national Republican convention? Simply by only giving those protests a few seconds exposure on the air and no more? Case closed. Done deal. What they don't tell you is more important than what they choose to tell you.

'What do you mean we didn't report it. We did. For five seconds... while we focused on the convention itself; for weeks and months before, and after, and during... The millions of protesters outside that convention however...did not earn the right to be on national news for hours, or days, or even minutes... They only earned the right to be on the news for five seconds. Once. Period. The message is clear. Anything that is only put on the News for five fucking seconds is not important.

When in American history have there ever been one million people massed to protest against any political party? Any political convention ever? This shocking news should have been swept up by the public media and broadcast around the nation as a groundbreaking earth shattering event. It was not. As far as the American News media is concerned it never happened. Ask the average American: and they will not even know this ever happened.

One million protesters?

If the powers that be, if the American corporate owned Media can successfully quash a story that huge, and make it disappear as if it never existed... what can't they do?

Look at what happened with the 'million-man march' organized by black men. Who spent tons of money to publicize their march on Washington. They were more organized. They went to their local news networks and got them to cover it individually... Because the corporate sponsored national networks refused to do so. So they had their million men in Washington. They made speeches. The small independent networks gave them a tiny smidgeon of coverage... : Washington itself ignored them completely as if they did not exist. These 1 million men had no money: they represented nothing simply because they had no millions of dollars to stuff into the coffers of political campaigns. The status-quo treated them with complete contempt, and acted as if they did not even exist...

'Yeah, yeah... you had your big march: now go away and don't bother us anymore. You know damn well we don't give a shit about you and we will do absolutely nothing about your issues, complaints, or problems or marches. You had your big march... and what good did it do you? Nothing. You will stay out of the power structure because we will never let you in. Now go home, and don't bother us anymore.'

What was the effect on the Nation from this march? Nothing. The point is: If Washington can ignore one million black men marching on them... if Washington can even ignore one million white people marching on them at their political rallies... what else can they ignore? What else can they brush under the rug and pretend it does not exist? And Americans still believe they live in a land of free speech. Huh? Rather: Americans now have the right to have their free speech ignored. Any speech that is not backed by millions of dollars is ignored. If the speech is free: it is worthless. This is an example of how human values have been corrupted by money. Civilized humans no longer have human values. They only have a system of values based upon money. The American public has already been brainwashed to channel flip; so it will never focus in detail or in depth about anything. If 300 million viewers see the New York protests against bush on their 'news' for only five seconds... they have already been effectively brainwashed into believing the protest wasn't important, and did not involve a lot of angry people.

The power to control exposure in the media is almost complete. And you will find that the media controls its own hidden agendas very easily...simply by controlling what they decide to put on the air... and how long they put it on the air. Whatever is on the air, will be what people talk about. How long it is on the air will be how important people think it is. That is how superficial mass awareness is. That is how corrupt Mass Media is. The horse no longer pulls the cart. The cart is in front of the horse. The cart leads the horse around by its nose.

This is normal today. It wasn't Normal 20 years ago. Who gives a shit any more about history or the past? Who makes sure not to educate the masses about what was not Normal 20 years ago? Oops.

The fact remains that Mass Media is responsible for psychically wounding and damaging its viewers by obsessing on violence, destruction and death. Nobody seeks to examine why people want to have safe, vicarious, non-experiences of being a spectator: rather than have actual experiences of their own Life. In civilization: all mass spectatorship is pandered-to and sanctified. Non-involvement, being a spectator; is an unavoidable aspect of civilization. Civilization could not survive without the social dynamic of the arena and the non-involvement of spectators.

Simply because of accumulation; the spectator or viewer is deified as a social institution: their very numbers are worshipped. Why? A single onlooker is completely worthless. But pile them up by the millions and they become a blind, reactive social force that dictates what other people do. Clearly: it is the dynamic of accumulation that determines how much the spectator is valued; they are only valued and glorified because of their numbers. By glorifying the spectator, people are directly glorifying the value of pure accumulation. The basic reason people listen to the news is obvious: they want to know what's happening in the world: they want to be informed and enlightened about what's going on in the world... However: the idea itself is insane. The idea that any one person can know what is going on in the world is not only crazy, it is impossible...: The reason it is impossible is because the human species has overpopulated itself into the impossible condition of 6 ½ billion people wanting to know what 6 ½ billion people, minus themselves, is doing. Knowing everything that is going on in the world is impossible unless you are god. That is the exact attitude watching news creates in viewers; watching, with the attitude of a detached god on high, detached from everything they see. By showing stories of humans suffering and disasters: this creates a false sense of smugness, arrogance, security and superiority. The simple fact of being able to watch something without being affected by the conditions and situation of a story the news is presenting, the simple fact of not being personally involved in all of the new stories creates a false sense of Olympian superiority in those watching the news.

It is how the news is presented, what they choose to cover that is the problem; one disconnected story after another. Every story has nothing to do with the next one. Until watchers are brainwashed into thinking that it is normal for any news story not to be connected to any other news story. Until watchers are brainwashed into not connecting any information they see together. Until watchers are brainwashed into believing that all Life is unconnected, disconnected chaos that is meaningless and makes no sense... Why bother even to try make sense of anything when the news you are bombarded with every day makes no sense? Why bother even to try make sense of anything when the news is a disconnected, random hodge-podge of unconnected events?

The fact of the matter is: the only news you should be interested in, and the only news you should be given, is the news which affects you directly and affects where you live and where you work. Your priority of the news should begin at the center of your world: You and your immediate surroundings, and then spread out from there in a decreasing level of priority, which quickly decreases to a value of almost zero once you get beyond your immediate surroundings. But because of human overpopulation; human society has become so uncontrollable, so huge and so menacing and so blindly destructive: what happens in China can and does affect people who live in North America.

The point is; mass media news does not cover, and does not deal with the news that its mass viewership needs and should have: the news about their immediate surroundings, the latest breaking news about their family, their work and the neighbourhoods they live in. Instead: it deals only with distant events thousands of miles away, which are totally unconnected and have no impact on the lives of the viewers. This barrage of distant new stories which have no immediate impact on the masses of viewers creates the impression that all news is meaningless and bears no connection and no relevance to the life of the viewer.

One reason why people are addicted to the news is their fascination and fear of violence and death... and the opportunity to watch it safely and vicariously as spectators. But, this root reason is never questioned, dealt with, or understood. The point is that when people do not examine their own motives and actions, their own fears; they become blind, reactive victims-consumers-spectators: from whom other people can profit from and manipulate.

What destroys all human perspective is the Dynamic of Disconnection; the tool process of accumulation and segmentation and separation. If you split up a pile into millions or billions of segments and all you know of that pile is one single segment: then you have no idea of the pressures being put upon that single granule of sand, and where these pressures are coming from or what they are caused by. And if you have no interest in understanding anything outside your little world of normality, outside your own life, your own job, family, community, culture, nation: you will never understand the greater forces at work beyond you that affect you, and you will never know how to deal with these influences. Then you will react blindly and predictably to everything around you simply because you do not question it. The need to understand the world as a whole, the need to understand civilization as a whole is crucial for any control over your own life. But in order to do that you need to understand it organically: starting from the organic center of your body: you; your personal self, and then expanding your awareness both outwards and inwards holistically. Not viewing news about people you don't know and will never meet who are thousands of miles away. Not looking at events that are not directly connected to your life organically. The vicarious urge to look at what other people are doing while ignoring and not looking at what you are doing is a symptom of the human emotional-mental disease known as projection. By projecting your attention out, by focusing your awareness on events happening thousands of miles away from where you are; you are effectively escaping, avoiding and refusing to face all the problems and realities that exist in your life and in your own inner self.

But the difficulty of understanding all this comes from the dynamic of accumulation. Increase any population and you increase the number of segments conflicting within it: while making it more impossible to understand or deal with the entire structure as a whole. The news media tries to simplify this by giving you a simple packaged product, saying in effect: 'This is all you need to know.'

The perceptual distortion of mass media and its attempt to duplicate human experience by having everybody watch the same thing can only be understood if you look at what people are not doing rather than what they are doing. If you have 100's of millions of people all staring at one thing, one speck of sand, or whatever... what are they not looking at? Not aware of? The answer is; everything else; everything that is important and relevant to their lives. By removing our awareness from our actual environment, by creating a reality that is selectively focused upon only one thing, the effect of this non-awareness concerning everything else has enormous consequences and implications. Especially when it is multiplied, magnified, reflected and re-reflected through the distortive lens of mass media.

Above all, mass culture and mass media fosters and propagates non-critical awareness. It survives only by creating artificial, temporary myths and fads. It cannot afford to have any of them destroyed by critical awareness and critical thinking. What is mass media doing to insure its own survival? It is systematically... and slowly leaching all pertinent information and facts from all data-bases. If you compare any news coverage today to any news coverage 10-20 years ago, you will see this difference starkly. Journalists and reporters are avoiding facts today like the plague. They are very careful not to give the viewers too many facts... if they do... then they are fired, because that always sets off a huge wave of public outrage when the public discovers actual facts of actual corruption that cannot be hidden or swept under the carpet. So the media and all of its employees such as journalists and reporters and editors: carefully whitewash every story of most of the pertinent facts that might upset the viewers too much.

Today: most affluent consumers are not only raised upon a diet of junk food. They are also fed a diet of junk news... they are fed a diet of junk information... they are fed on a diet of junk misinformation. They are fed tons of junk facts. They are fed with tons of junk trivia. Their brains are so filled with this shit that it is coming out of their ears. What wonder is it; that modern, affluent people are so ignorant, so badly educated, and so misinformed? What wonder is it that they are so brainwashed? When there is no nutrition in the information you are fed, when all the nutrition, all the meaning, all the relevancy, all the truth is taken out of the information you are fed before it is shown to you.

All processed information that is doctored, and manipulated, and put through an industrial grinder: takes out all nutritional information, and adds poisonous artificial normalities, and trace elements of trivia, and toxic deadly moral, ethical lies and poisons: before it reaches you. Purifying your brain of all the toxic, processed information you have been exposed to all of your life is not an easy process. Cleansing your mind of all the lies and fallacies you have been raised to believe-in all of your life is a long, difficult, hard process cleaning up a garbage dump that has been accumulating junk information for 30, or 50 years is not an easy task. This is why it is better to teach children the truth when they are still young. They do not have minds filled with an accumulation of years of junk facts, junk values, and junk information. This is why it is much more difficult to enlighten adults than children. The loss of perspective in human awareness comes from accumulation.

Take a single cooperative community where all are equals, without any leader: and each person in that community can have a fairly balanced idea of the environment around them, and the situation around them. But increase the number of people to 6 ½ billion, add the pyramidal focus of mass media: and you get the phenomenon of millions of people all looking only at one news event or happening on a TV... and not having any idea of what is actually around them. They have no idea of what is happening next door, or what is happening on their street or in their area at all.

How sane is it to ignore your own surroundings and your own life, plus everything else that is going on around the world, and stare at only one single incident, when that event has no relevance to your own life? And for 100's of millions of other people to do exactly the same thing?

Here are some effects of mass media.
No comparative information,
No perspective,
Mass conformity
Duplication.

Mass media is a single pinhole; through which 100's of millions of people stare through: convinced that this single pinhole; is the only way to look at things... and the pictures they see through this pinhole are the only ones worth watching, and the attitudes, values, and ideas presented through this pinhole as the only ones of any importance. The power of selling people anything from beliefs, to lifestyles, to goods and services has exploded due to this simple dynamic of many people watching the same thing. That is all Television and mass Media is.... A single pinhole, which hundreds of millions of people look through. Images, subliminal suggestions, subconscious assumptions, messages and propaganda that can be easily controlled. So don't bother going outside on your street to see how your neighbours are doing. Just stay glued to your TV set, and find out what's happening all around the world.

Of course: your TV will not tell you how your neighbours are doing next door. Only what someone is doing thousands of miles away; which has nothing to do with your life at all. But even though the news has almost no relevance to people's lives: they continue to watch in the hundreds of millions. So it really does not matter if you do not know what your neighbours are doing or who they are. They are probably all sitting in their homes; glued to their sets also. Seeing the same identical images you are. And ever since modern media has forced people to watch the exact same things on the boob tube... people do not want to talk to each other anywhere. They do not want to look at each other. Or speak to each other, or get to know each other. TV and the car have destroyed American families and communities more completely and effectively than a military occupation by a hostile nation. People no longer spend their free time with each other. They spend their time watching TV. Even worse... Families do not want to spend any time together. They do not want to look at each other, or speak to each other, or get to know each other. All they are willing to do is sit down besides each other in their own living rooms: ignoring each other for hours. All they are willing to do is nothing. All they are willing to do is be spectators. Take TV away from an average consumer family and what is left of it? Strangers ignoring each other as much as possible all of their lives.

Multiply the awareness of all these people focusing upon one thing: and then consider what they should be focusing on if they had not been so distracted. This kind of non-awareness has never been studied or looked at. How many trillions of hours of wasted time in human lives are due to this kind of distraction? How many more thousands of hours could they have spent with their children and loved ones? But: the equal and opposite reaction to being forced to function and perform too much as a machine, is to become an inert, mindless vegetable: a resting machine... recuperating from this unnatural stress that everyday tool-functioning demands of every human inside civilization. Both are tool-states of being.

The leading question of all narrow selective focus is: when billions of people are looking into only one pinhole, to the exclusion of all else: what is it that these billions of people are not aware of? All pyramidal focus brings the ethical question of priority. What is most important? If you simply watch what is shown you through one tiny pinhole, and react to that: then you are allowing others to determine what is most important for you. Simply by being a spectator instead of a participant: you have given up the power to create your own agenda, or your own priorities.

Any single focus or viewpoint that is duplicated and multiplied by the dynamic of mass media, pyramidal focus, and the mindless, reactive conformity of spectators destroys perspective. It destroys any alternative viewpoints, any sense of Wonder, and manufactures a mass normality that is worthy of the epithet "brainwashing". News organizations are mostly like a bunch of conformist chickens: primarily interested only in crisis situations, continually trying to peck at the shiniest pebbles or crisis around them; and usually all choosing the same one at any given time, while ignoring all the other thousands of crisis situations. In a consumer driven, corporate controlled economy: what point is there in having a media that broadcasts only what the consumer wants to hear and only what corporations allow them to hear? What is the point in broadcasting only one major story... the same story to billions of viewers, and by that pyramidal focus: implying that no other news stories happened that day to 7 billion people? That is the opposite of news. Rather: because of its lack of honesty, diversity, perspective, and content: it is merely a selective form of cultural-corporate propaganda. No powerful, privileged group wants an informed public; they want a docile, unquestioning, malleable public.

You could characterize the human need for distraction as a fly buzzing around the reflective emptiness of an insulated, insular human awareness. Your awareness is like a fly buzzing around inside your brain. It needs something to land on and feed off: but only momentarily... since what it is landing on has no substance. The fly is restless. It cannot stay in any one spot for very long. It cannot stay still. Try keeping your awareness from flitting around in your head like a fly. See if you can stop your awareness from acting like a fly. The need for distraction is actually a very superficial kind of awareness. Humans possess two general kinds of awarenesses: the tool-brain focusing upon one thing to the exclusion of all else, pyramidal or selective focus and being aware of everything around you all the time, the Sense of Pure Wonder. But when that pyramidal focus becomes dominant and segmented, it becomes an imbalanced awareness; it develops a need for distraction. It becomes a distractive awareness. Distraction becomes a normal condition of that awareness.

Consequently: you have an incredibly reflective awareness with an incredibly instantaneous dynamic of feedback. A dominant tool-brain, which craves more stimulus, more excitement, because it is too numbed by its civilized-dead environment to be stimulated, because the environment of civilization is basically unchanging-boring. Put that together with the need to accumulate, the arbitrary randomness of human creativity, the need to survive inside the accumulation of civilization, the tendency to preserve, perpetuate, glorify, worship, value things pyramidally, the pyramidal dynamic of the four major aspects of human accumulation: knowledge-power-wealth-fame and you get the sum total of all human activity. But all this activity is mainly a process-history of tool-brain creativity, tool-innovation: a process that seems to be changing, a process that is abstractively creative, but which humanly and genetically does not change. Instead, you get a repetitive cycle of human non-awareness, numbness, dysfunction, imbalance; which each new generation is unaware of repeating. Human awareness is adjustable. But it was designed to adjust itself to natural things. Human awareness is designed to skip lightly from one thing to another... when appropriate. It was designed to be intensely concentrated... when appropriate. The point is: the natural design of the human brain is to be distracted by Nature naturally... Anything else. Any other kind of distraction is unnatural, and screws up our awareness.

Modern media seeks to do both: skip our awareness and keep us distracted... and focus it intensely on these distractions for us. But in real life: only on a two-dimensional abstract screen: not in a 360 three-dimensional space with sound-color-smell-living things all around us. Modern Media focuses our awareness so we do not have to do it ourselves. So we do not have to develop our awareness. So our awareness becomes underdeveloped, lazy, frozen, stunted. Until we are barely aware at all. Until old people who have blocked out most of their awareness during their lifetime becomes so insensitive to everything around them that they develop what is known as tunnel vision.

There is one TV show that demonstrates a few dynamics of our modern American culture...which is the dominant consumer culture of the Capitalistic World. It is a star search contest; that features ordinary people trying to mimic-duplicate famous entertainers-singers. The premises... the assumptions... the norms, the normality, the culture, the values, that this show sells to the public are...

First: The premise that any of your own original creativity is automatically worthless, simply because you have not yet successfully sold it to millions of uncreative people. Basically, if you are an unknown then you have no talent. If you are famous, then you are a creative genius. So creativity is determined by how duplicated it is, how well-known it is, how mimicked it is... not how actually original or creative it is, or how beautiful it is. Something can be ugly, boring, an uncreative... but if it is famous... these facts are ignored and the person who created it becomes a legend. So... no singer is allowed to sing their own music... in their own way. They must sing someone else's music... and as identically as possible as that other person sang it 10 or 40 years ago...

Second: It assumes that there is a deified system of judging this. The sacred way is two-fold. First there are the preferences of the audience. Regardless of how uncultured they are, or their exposure to what is being sung. If a singer sings a standard ballad that is famous; but that particular audience does not happen to like it or love it... or if they have never heard it... then that performer is out of luck. The audience will instantly reject anything it is not familiar with. The other half of this destructive sacred judging is a panel of experts, who score the performers on different categories... and nobody can explain how they do it since each 'expert' does so on a purely random, subjective basis. Meaning that anyone can become an expert if they are lucky enough to sit on that expert panel.

Thirdly... It assumes that one performance can be and is, either better, or worse than another performance. Even though the performers are singing different song, from different eras, by different entertainers, in different ways with, different styles, in different costumes, with different inflections, and different interpretations of those different songs, etc.

Fourthly... it is a competition. It assumes that entertainers and artists and composers and singers must compete against each other in order to gain popular recognition and fame. If they refuse to compete at all... no matter if they happen to be ten times better than the singers who do compete... then they automatically lose. And are considered to have mostly no talent or ability at all.

Fifth: It is a competition for money and a recording contract. So only the greediest, the most ambitious artists, the most egoistic ones even apply to enter the competition. This exclusion of all less driven-obsessed singers makes sure that only one kind of talent is shown: the talent of greedy, attention-starved egoists who have swallowed and believe in all of this crap.

Sixth: It worships winning... All losers... even though you personally may have liked them better and thought that they deserved to win. Disappear forever, and are never seen, or heard from again. And even worse, it degrades the losers by a public show of humiliation and rejection... that is supposed to be normal. Instead of simply announcing the winner, which is all the show is really about... winning at all costs... it slowly eliminates each contestant by announcing which losing place they earned: the last, worst loser... is destructively announced first. So each contestant is forced to endure as much destroyed hope as possible by titillating each one with the dream-possibility of winning.

This teaches: Do not do this unless you enjoy humiliation. Or in other words... Elite competition is to be only for a select few... not for you. Besides; even if you have no confidence, and enjoy your hopes being destroyed, you will never be picked anyways so why bother... unless you are confident... huh? What kind of bullshit mixed message is that? In order to win: you have to be supremely confident that you are better than anyone else. Then you have to be humble and allow yourself to be humiliated and judged, and criticized in public. Which means the person with the thickest skin. The least sensitive ass. The crudest idiot has the best chance of winning. Only the biggest egos win. Only the most obsessively driven people even want to compete. Only the most ambitious, the most single-minded people win. But if you are too confident: if you are too good: you will lose. So basically: the best panders, the best pleasers, the best unoriginal mimics, the ones with the least creativity, and the least sensitivity, and the biggest most insensitive egos win.

Supposedly if you are confident and... and also very, very lucky.... You might win. Therefore, the show teaches that basically: all talent, all creativity, all values, all judgments are mostly random and meaningless. It gives no understandable explanation for confidence. How you get it. Why some have it. Why some do not. It also teaches them that only one person in a million is ever talented or good at anything. Only one person in a million can ever get a recording contract.

Why? Because they need the other million people who they do not give that recording contract to... to buy their music. If everyone was a composer and a musician... then who would be left to buy CD's and listen to all these millions of artists? You cannot have six billion equally creative people in a consumer society. It destroys the consumer advantage. It also effectively destroys people's belief in their own creativity and worth. The entire show is only for distracting people from their lives...it is only meant to gratify people addiction to distraction. So it teaches that the highest human status, wealth, self-esteem: lies in negatively gratifying people: because do not know how to entertain themselves. And do it by mimicking 'famous' singers as closely as possible...and looking like them as much as possible. A Singer might sing better... but if they do not look like that artist, then no matter how closely they ape that artist, they lose purely on image alone.

This show: sells, preaches, teaches, praises, worships, and idolizes:
The dynamics of duplication and repetition.
The values of Fame, Greed, and Status as being the only way to succeed.
The dynamic of distraction
The dynamic of antagonism-competition
The sacredness of the consumer and the sacredness of self-gratification.

Above all: it gives the viewer only what they are already comfortable with, only what they are used-to, familiar with. Its unspoken religious message is that only comfortable normality, only normality that gratifies you the most is good-right-winning, etc.

And

It teaches that there is no such thing as diversity or personal creativity. It spits on and sneers at human, morality, humaneness etc. It teaches people to be as duplicated and boring and as competitive and greedy as possible; as uncreative as possible. Because as far as this show is concerned: nothing else is more important than aping and mimicking a famous person.

There is another show called: Jeopardy, which trains people to give answers: as if they are questions. In other words: if you watch this show long enough: your entire brain will start firing backwards instead of forwards. You will be unable to make any logical connections: because you have already been brainwashed to make the exact opposite connection. In other words: you will think right is wrong and wrong is right and weak is strong and strong is weak. It also trains people to not connect anything to anything. It asks questions that have no logical rhyme or reason. It brainwashes people into becoming obsessed over trivial facts, and not trying to connect any facts that are actually relevant to each other, and actually do have connections to each other. The information explosion has fragmented all information into disconnected bits and bytes that are never connected.

The insanity of modern consumer culture is the insanity of giving people too many choices. Once you have too many choices: you become unable to choose intelligently. Your power of choice has been nullified. Your power of choice becomes meaningless. Choice itself becomes meaningless.

The Culture of Mass Media

Before modern the modern Media of mass radio, and mass TV, and mass records, and mass movies and mass videotape machines existed. The elite held their power and prestige by a type of secrecy we call: 'mystique'. They hid from the public. They were never seen in public, except on special occasions. And appeared only in order to impress the awe-struck masses with their sacred Royal presence, their shining noble splendour... dressed in the most expensive, the most elaborate clothes... representing the most sacred concepts the masses had been brainwashed to worship. The Queen of England still holds her crown by this simple tactic of exclusion. By not letting anyone see her. Everyone wants to see her. She wins by not replying to any criticism. As long as any elite has the power to prevent themselves being dragged out in public, and answer for their crimes and illegalities and sins. They will remain secluded behind walls of elite privacy until they rot and die.

This elite secrecy of total seclusion and exclusion makes them seem perfect. Every time they appear only at state occasions; they wear the most perfectly coiffed hairdos and the most perfectly glittering attired garments. Their utterances were all ritualized. Nothing is given to chance. They come out as dutiful robots. To perform the function the mass needs them for. So the mass can worship them. They existed and still exist basically only for the masses to worship them. That is their only useful function. They soak up this worship as their natural due... as their god-given right... and retire back to the seclusion of their boring, dead, empty lives. Lives filled with trivia, and detail, and imaginary symbolism, and invented rituals and customs. They are ritual-makers. They are addicted to rituals and abstract symbols. Take away their abstract symbols and rituals and what is left? Nothing.

After Kings and Nobles lost their power and wealth: this empty area of mass urge to worship something, some figurehead, an icon, an idol, was easily filled by media idols and icons and figureheads. Who still only exist to be worshipped for no particular reason ... except that people have been brainwashed from birth to worship something. It doesn't matter what or who you worship... as long as you do.

So these media idols were worshipped as the idle rich. People so rich they did not have to work, and could play and have fun on screen.

This gave the masses the impression that their idols were better than they were at having fun, better at loving, speaking, dressing, acting etc... Even though everyone knows they are merely actors... puppets who are given lines. And told where to stand, and what to say. Basically they have replaced the old worshipped idols of the Noble, Royal Elite... who also only existed only to be worshipped, and were also told where to stand, how to act, and what to say.

Any mass, any public become very insecure and frightened if they have nobody to worship and idolize. They need to look up and idolize somebody... anybody... First the royalty of Kings disappeared as a class... then the idle rich disappeared as a class. Now all we have left to worship are actors who exist only to be worshipped as a class of idle rich icons. But that class is too small. So the Media has created fairytales about how the idle rich live behind closed doors. They have sold these fictions as being actually true. Now the media sells the masses fictions about how the powerful and wealthy live, and their motives, and lives, and why they do anything. It sells them fictions and lies about how presidents live, and how Kings once lived. It sells the lie that these powerful people, these idle rich were, and still are better than the masses can ever hope to be. By giving written scripts to actors to speak. Written scripts that have been worked on and crafted and polished by the best writers in the world... who try to make their fictitious lies, these fictitious characters... the most well-spoken, the most intelligent, the most loving, the kindest, the most beautiful, the most perfect people in the world who are all visibly better spoken more intelligent, more muscled, more beautiful, more perfect than the masses that stare at them through the boob tube.

But TV has many hours of programs to fill. The ones who hold the real power in Modern capitalistic Democracies do not want to publicize their existence at all to the public. The entire power-elite, and wealth elite of Western society has gone underground and live hidden anonymously amongst the masses. Nobody knows how much money anyone has or makes any more. Nobody knows how much power anyone actually wields anymore. And everyone despises and hates the puppets called elected officials for their obvious lies and corruption.

So what has mass media done to fill this need for the masses to worship a class that is higher than they are? It has sold fictitious lies about every profession that has power, authority, or status. It has glorified the entire upper class elite positions of power, prestige, and authority. It has brainwashed consumers to worship all figures of authority by glorifying them as a class... as being more passionate, more loving, more caring, more decent, more honest, more hard-working, more selfless, more self-sacrificing, more noble, more ethical, more moral, more beautiful, more intelligent, better spoken, more funny, more unique, more humane, more educated, more wise, with better personalities, better cars, better homes, better interior furniture, better clothes, more interesting lives, more and better friends, more challenging jobs, with more meaningful work, more meaningful, more ethical decisions to make. It has sold the lies that all of the upper elite positions of power and wealth are made up of ethical moral people constantly agonizing over what are the best interests of the lower class.

Who are these new idols? Not Royalty, not Kings, not the idle rich. These old-fashioned idols and icons are laughed at, and despised. Not politicians: they are despised also. Not even movie stars or TV idols. They only exist to sell the masses fake lies about how the lower class lives. No.

Now the new worshipped TV icons are fictional Doctors, Policemen, and Lawyers and Judges. In short:

every authority figure, every evil elite class that oppresses the masses, and stands as an icon of unquestioned respectability. Except for the complete fairy-tale fantasy idols of ancient Kings, warriors, dungeons and dragons that are sold to children. Once TV sold only stories about cowboys killing and shooting Indians and badmen, but that was just another passing fad.

Now the very news media reporters who report the news are being idolized. Now they are worshipping the lives of the rich and famous also. But most of it... the meat of mass TV: is the glorification of people in power. Period. But only as pure lies and fiction. Take the camera and follow the life of any actual policeman, any actual judge, any actual doctor, any actual lawyer... and you will either be disgusted, or fall asleep bored out of your mind, hate them, or call the FBI to have them arrested.

Everyone knows these fictionalized lives these TV icons of the power elite: are nothing but glorified crap. Everyone knows actual policemen, lawyers, judges, and doctors do not actually have these wonderful interesting challenging lives. But people watch these shows anyways. Why? Simply because there is nothing else better on TV. Simply because the ones in power will always glorify themselves every chance they get. Because nobody is allowed to see how they actually live, and what they actually do. The public is not allowed to see what actually goes on behind the closed doors of a hospital staff meeting, or inside a police precinct, or inside a lawyers office or a judge's quarters... so the Media sells the masses lies and fiction about what goes on behind these fictitious closed doors, and the masses lap it up, and do not even think of questioning or exploring to find out what actually goes on, or how these people actually live, or what kind of people they actually are. As long as the masses have an upper class elite to idolize, worship, hate, and blame: they are happy to remain as ignorant of all the actual facts and truths. Watching perfect policemen, perfect lawyers, perfect judges, perfect Doctors all their lives on TV makes them feel that everything is in order, and the authorities know what they are doing. Besides it is only meaningless entertainment. It is just to be distracted. Who cares what kind of shit is shown on TV? It's free. How can you complain about entertainment you don't even pay for? The shows are paid for by advertisers. And who believes advertising ads? Only the dumbest of the dumb.

But if your entire culture is drowned in nothing BUT advertising... and you can't escape it. If it becomes normal. Then like it or not: it affects you as much and as deeply as the air you breathe and the water you drink. Allowing shit to be shown on TV is the same as allowing turds to rot on your living room floor. It stinks up your entire living environment whether you care about the turds or believe in them or not.

If the actual truth were publicized about people in power roles and power careers... if cameras were installed secretly in actual police precincts, hospital staff meetings, lawyer's offices, judges quarters... All these professions would quickly lose their glamour. They would be arrested and jailed. And the last bulwarks of the lie that civilized society is controlled and run by decent people would finally be ripped naked. All the other masks of fake sanctity about the higher levels of the elite have already been torn off and exposed as lies. Now all the other masks are being torn off also.

But consumer masses do not care about the truth, even when the news makes the scandals of billion-dollar scams and robberies public. They put the masks back onto the corrupt greedy Robber Barons and beg them to parade around as if it never happened. Just so the masses can worship something... somebody.... anyone.

The addiction... the insane craving need of the poor and ignorant to look up to something and idolize it has not changed ever since civilization was invented. And no matter how many times the corruption of who they respect and idolize has been exposed... they ignore it and continue to worship these false idols as the only way they know how to live. Civilized lower classes fervently need something to worship: even if they consciously know that they are worshipping lies and fiction.

For thousands of years: the lower classes had to go out in person to worship their deified idols. Then China forbade their peasants to even come near their revered Emperor or see him at all. They were supposed to worship him from afar, never seeing him at all. This was perfect for the upper class. They could hide behind a wall of complete secrecy and anonymity. And be worshipped by anonymous worshippers they never saw who did not even know what they looked like, or who they were, or what they did, or even why they were supposed to be worshipped. Now the modern form of worship is easier. People do not have to go outside to worship their deified idols from huge distances electronically. They just sit down beside each other in darkened rooms, and stop living, and worship their deified idols-of-choice on TV for hours on end. And like the Chinese Emperors... none of these deified idols know they are being worshipped unless they actually come out of their elite enclaves and meet their adoring masses in huge televised, glamorized public spectacles of more even more idolization as they are given awards and praised, and as they all praise themselves and each other, and hug each other, and pat each other on the back to show that they all like each other.

These rich, wealthy, deified idols are not allowed to show the slightest sign of dislike towards each other in public. If any of them commit this sin: Then that person is ostracized and frowned upon for not holding up the public façade of rich-wealthy people all loving each other and proud of each other. No hate, no unpleasant scenes, no bickering, is allowed to happen at these gala occasions. It is all fake niceness and smiles and fake happiness. So all the lower classes will buy the bullshit that these rich deified idols are actually happier than the poor are because they are so much more loved by the masses, and so much more richer, and smarter, and more beautiful, and more perfect than the ordinary uneducated slobs who idolize them so lazily. That they really do not care about these idols at all.

That is one problem with the mass media and mass brainwashing of today. Idolizing and deification has become so cheap, so worthless and so easy: anyone that ordinary people are being idolized at a moment's notice for almost any excuse. Deification and idolization has become so cheap, and easy, and worthless... that all this brainwashing is wearing thin. So thin that it has lost much of its effectiveness. The insane thing about consumer culture.... is that it consumes itself. It consumes its own culture. It consumes its own icons! It eats itself alive. The icons of Hindu culture have lasted 7,000 years: and are still going strong. The icons of consumer culture disappear almost overnight, and are replaced by others in a matter of a few months or a few years. It is a culture of impermanence, discarding, and an insatiable appetite to replace what was thrown away. It is a culture that is screaming out to the consumer: this will not last very long. So, you better get yours while the getting is good. If you don't it'll be too late.

Hollywood and Perfection

What does the entertainment industry of modern America called Hollywood do? It creates artificial fantasies, and stories: so we do not have to create our own fun for ourselves. And what kind of creations are they? It would take a thousand books to detail the crap Hollywood sells that is thought of as being good but is actually sick. Movies are basically shadows on a screen. Hollywood creates shadows on a screen. Just as Plato spoke of people staring at shadows on a cave wall. Over two thousand years ago:

The Path of Splitness

Chapter Six A: The Beginnings of civilization

Plato claimed that humans are more fascinated in staring at shadows than going outside in the sun and actually living. Hollywood is merely the prophetic words of Plato realized even more than he could have imagined. Our love of abstract images is greater than our love of actual images. Hollywood's abstract imaged on a screen has created the sick culture of perfection even more than the culture of perfection was worshipped in Greece during Plato's time. To a large extent: the abstract perfection of Hollywood has become the standard that everything is measured by in consumer society.

Everything shown in Movies is perfect. People in movies are perfectly handsome and perfectly beautiful. They live in perfectly designed houses, with perfect furniture, and perfect kitchens. Their houses are always in perfect order, and perfectly clean. Their hair is always perfectly coiffed; their clothes are perfectly designed, and match, and fit them perfectly. People in movies never have actual problems. All the people in movies are perfect. The doctor is an old friend of the family, and takes time out of his busy schedule to be especially kind to a perfect patient, who is perfectly looked after in a perfect hospital. The cars are perfectly polished and never break down. The grungiest low class people have hearts of gold, but the rich people have much more human feelings and are kinder and more perceptive than poor people. Unless it is a genius who is not recognized and later wins the girls and gets rich. The poor people in movies are always perfectly happy in their appointed station and would never dream of owning a mansion or driving an expensive car because they are not as perfectly beautiful, and not as perfect as the rich people. All of the fake scenes are perfectly faked. All of the suburbs are perfectly beautiful. TV and Hollywood have created a fictional normality where everyone is perfect. Full of perfect stereotypes... the perfect 2nd banana, the perfect lower class supporting cast, the perfectly less deserving, less gifted, less beautiful, less passionate, more mediocre, more boring, more faceless, less interesting, supporting cast who dote on the main actors, and do not want or deserve what they have or want. All of them happy in their less deserving roles.

The result of this Media blitz of Perfection by Hollywood is modern consumers expecting their own lives to be a perfect fairy tale. Why? Because they worship and value the abstract shadows on a silver screen more than they value their own imperfect lives. They are obsessed by the Hollywood success stories and the fairy tales. Hollywood is the sick culture of instant over-nite success, instant over-nite fame, instant over-nite happiness, instant over-nite wealth, instant over-nite fame, instant over-nite status, and instant over-nite self-gratification. Hollywood is the magical fairy tale of attaining instant over-nite perfection without working at it. In fact they even took the letters 'gh' out of the word night so it would be easier to write about over-night success stories Now Americans girls now seek to have instant, over-nite makeovers so they can instantly become as perfectly beautiful as perfect, famous movie stars... over-nite Americans try to have perfect bodies, perfect cars, perfect houses, perfect jobs. They seek to dress perfectly in the latest fashion, and act perfectly, and ignore all the other people around them who are not as perfect as they are, or as rich as they are. Americans seek to be as modern and as perfect as possible. Because they, and all the modern world has been raised on the artificial perfection of Hollywood as a peer example now for over a hundred years. They only shop at stores that are perfectly clean, and only use perfectly new things. The instant anything gets a scratch on it and its perfection is marred; it is thrown away because it is ugly, broken, used, and not perfect. They spend fortunes on chemicals to keep their houses as perfectly sterile and antiseptic as possible. They work at the most perfectly boring jobs. Their personalities become perfectly boring, and perfectly artificial: until these modern, perfect people lose their humanity. They are perfectly ignorant and dead inside. They never smile or have any actual fun. They are obsessed with being perfect that they disgust human people who do not give a shit about perfection. Hollywood is too perfectly in love with its own self-image to change its love of artificial perfection. And all the people watching these reflections that Hollywood churns out do not notice how the messages have changed and gotten more perfectly insane, and more perfectly meaningless, more perfectly sick. There is no critical self-awareness in a movie industry that can make hundreds of millions of dollars in one weekend except the awareness of how much money it makes. This obsession with perfection is one effect of civilization upon humans. Perfection is sought everywhere in silly societies that have no perspective on what is actually important in life. Until these people become so silly: there is nothing you can say to them, simply because you have nothing in common with their perfect lives, or perfect clothes, or perfectly dead minds and hearts.

The sad thing is that these perfect people, with their perfect bodies, and perfect houses, and perfect faces do not realize; is that they are despised and laughed-at far more than they are envied by other people with any intelligence or self-esteem or energy. The sad thing about these perfect unapproachable people is that they never smile, they never laugh, they are never spontaneous. They do not know how to have fun spontaneously. They do not know how to be open... Except with a small exclusive set of perfect friends, and perfect acquaintances... all seeking to become more perfectly successful than the other perfect people. All seeking to make more money, more perfectly easily, without actually working at it like ordinary imperfect people. And what for? So they can smugly be convinced that they are more perfect than other people?

In What Context?

Do you mean if you have a more perfect body, and are lucky enough to get onto a popular sitcom: that you are worth one million dollars per-episode? Do you mean that the few lines you utter during an episode of 'Friends' is worth a million dollars? And all the starving children in Ethiopia are beneath your notice, and not one of them is worth a penny of the money you are worth?... Because they are not as perfect as you?

Because they could not say those lines as perfectly? Or because your imaginary character fits what the American masses want to watch more perfectly, than other American sitcoms? Could a starving baby from Ethiopia get a million dollars per-episode on Friends if they put it on the air? But even if that single starving baby earned a million dollars per-episode on Friends... what about all the other millions of starving and dying babies around the world that are not earning a million dollars a week? Is there enough money in the world to give all the starving babies in the world a million dollars a week? Is there enough money in the world to give every living human being a million dollars a week? If not; then why the fuck do we give all this money to people who need it the least?

How obvious an example do you want to underline the selective stupidity of exclusive wealth? How obvious an example do you want to demonstrate the insane inhumanity of selective fan-worship of famous rich people? How obvious an example do you want to expose the asinine, obscene stupidity of the concept of perfection? How perfect is Hollywood? How many people who worship perfection; pay money to watch it on a screen? How perfectly does Hollywood suck in trillions of dollars that could be used to feed starving babies? How ethical is this use of money, adulation, power, status, and wealth? How ethical, how moral is Hollywood? How insulated is Hollywood from the rest of the World's poverty? What is the point of pouring trillions of dollars into crass, sick entertainments? What is the point of pouring money into lying, distorted fairy-tales and completely ignoring all of the starving sick, and poor people on Earth? This is one cultural example of how the civilized idea of perfection can poison the entire human race.

562

Where does superficial perfection come from? What makes a Movie star worth millions and a starving baby in Africa worth nothing? Where you were born. What food you ate. What kind of family you lived in. How rich they were. If you are born in a slum ghetto with drug addicts for parents who beat you and rape you, and feed you the worst diet of junk food possible: so you grow up unfit, fat, with a terribly low self-esteem: Why then.... you're not perfect enough to become a beautiful sleek movie star.

But if you are born in uptown New York to wealthy parents and raised as a spoiled Jewess Princess, and are given by your parents: perfect genes, perfect skin, and a high self-esteem.... Why then: you must be worth millions of dollars more than a starving baby who does not have these elite, privileged advantages.

This is where superficial physical perfection comes from. Is there any reason to strive for perfection? Should any ideal of perfection be striven-for? What is a humane ideal of perfection? The perfection of: Intensity, Wonder, Love, Courage, Honesty, Fun and Creativity... except none of these human attributes can be perfected. But this is only because we are already designed to develop these attributes within ourselves to begin with... before civilization was ever invented. The trouble is: humans have a historical legacy of destructiveness and destruction that must be healed. And the only time you will ever achieve any levels, or kinds of humane perfection; will be after humans have healed the entire planet: not before. And the perfection they achieve will only be due to healing the Earth's first, and themselves last. And the more humans heal each other and the Earth, the more they will change, and grow... making the definition of perfection change constantly... until it becomes a meaningless concept which actually is and has always been.

Perfect perfection is something that changes so fluidly and effortlessly that it is never the same from moment to moment. The perfection of a flowing river is that regardless of where it goes, or what obstacles it encounter, it is constantly changing. Humans do not value the perfection of change: we worship the perfection of things that do not change. We worship the perfection of unchanging deadness; we worship the perfection of dead things. Because we are so removed from ourselves, from our own bodies, from our own hearts, our own central minds: we are mostly dead inside. We have not yet begun to live. We have not yet learned how to live.

The actual truth is: that whatever does not change is the least perfect of all things. Whatever accumulates, and rots because of accumulation is the least perfect of all things. We worship the perfection of impenetrable unknowable mysteries. We worship the pyramidal zenith of unapproachable, stunted people; who we call Stars... Who if we got to know them, we would lose all interest in. We yearn for what we cannot reach. We stretch out our arms for something we want and cannot have. We mistake the selfishness of wanting as being intrinsically good for us. We believe that the culture of selfishness is ethically good for us. We mistake our wants to be laudable, virtuous goals that we should strive for. The entire human race is a bunch of three year-olds, reaching for things that are not good for them. And then we do not reflectively understand why we are not happy after we have attained an unreachable goal. So we repeat this idiocy over, and over again without learning from our mistakes. Because we do not pause to reflect. We refuse to be reflective. Even though that is precisely what makes us different from all other animals. Our reflective abilities are what make us human. But we have not grown up yet and learned how to use this reflective ability properly as mature, intelligent, wondering, critically minded, aware adults.

If you want to be perfectly happy: then never do the same things twice. Never play the same song twice. Never dance the same dance twice. Never walk the same way twice. Never act the same way twice.

Never repeat the same joke twice. Never say the same thing twice. Never feel the same thing twice. Never think the same thing twice; never act the same way twice.

This means you should be yourself as reflectively as possible, as creatively as possible; as differently as possible. If you can surprise yourself: then you will entertain yourself far better than anyone else can... by enervating you with a boring repetitive acts that never change.

But that means that you will always be blissfully unaware of how perfect you are. Why? Because everything you say and do will sound so foolish that everyone will be convinced you are stupidest, most idiotic, most irritating fool on Earth. And it will only be afterwards... that you will discover that every foolish thing you said and did: was the deepest, wisest, funniest thing you could have said or done...

You will find that once you do not give one shit whether what you said was wise or stupid, or funny, or serious. Everything you do will be perfectly right. Everything you say will be perfect. Then you will become the most perfect lover, the most perfect fool, the most perfect sage, the most perfect idiot, and the most perfect ass. Because you did not care about perfection. If you actually want to be perfect you cannot give a shit about perfection. That is something perfect people never learn. Perfect people are so terrified of making mistakes; they never even come close to being perfect as humans. Instead they become perfectly boring, perfectly dead, perfectly predictable. The only way to become perfect is to make as many mistakes as possible and learning from your mistakes as much as possible. Once you stop making mistakes, and stop learning from them; you stop growing, and changing, start becoming less perfect.

Huh? Be as imperfect as possible to become as perfect as possible? Once I kick your ass enough times, so that you do not give a shit whether you are perfect or imperfect: then your spirituality will be perfected enough so you do not ask any more stupid questions about perfection. Then you can have a perfectly sore ass, and go around holding your sore ass as perfectly as possible, and say to yourself: 'Oh... What a Perfect Ass I am.' Then after being a perfect ass, you will evolve to become other perfect things. As long as you hold yourself in. As long as your awareness works on the dynamic of fear and exclusion. As long as you think you are better than other people. As long as you have an ego. Not only will you never become perfect: you will never know what perfection is in the first place. Perfection is the art of not caring if you are perfect or not.

Tools Principles vs. Human Principles

If there is one obvious thing in all civilized societies that is most invisible... it is the astounding fact that in all human society; mechanical functioning comes before everything else. There is nothing else in all of civilization that has a higher priority. In fact: every other priority is built upon this imperative. Whether it is a machine or a human that is doing the mechanical functioning is irrelevant. It is the mechanical functioning itself that is most important. A 'perfectly' civilized society is where everything goes like clockwork, where everything functions 'perfectly' meaning mechanically, predictably, boringly, regularly, unchangingly. Look at the Swiss. Affluent, privileged, mechanically perfect. And boring as hell... without the slightest sense of humour or fun.

Civilization is designed so tools can evolve further: not humans. The historical proof for this is 10,000 years of continual human misery, suffering, brutality, bloodshed and violence contrasted against the fantastic, creative, evolution of tools during that same period of time. Humans have never had any control over their own tool-use. Moreover, tool innovation is the only justification and reason for our existence. They are the only reason we have escaped extinction. A basic reason we never question our use of tools is because it is unthinkable to suppress a trait that is responsible for our survival as a species. The reason why tool-values are pre-eminent in human society is simply because they were more crucial to hominid-human survival in the beginning than any other factor.

Yet, the unthinkable has already happened. After over 4 million years of evolution, our species has evolved from splitting a rock with another rock, to splitting an atom with another atom. Until now, the monstrous destruction of this one-sided splitting has become too horrible for even humans to endure. We are now engaged in belatedly trying to stuff the nuclear genie back into its bottle. We are actually trying not to use this technology. Even cloning is being questioned. The imbalanced acts of one-sided separation and one-sided duplication are now just beginning to be ethically questioned. Humans are just now beginning to wake up and realize the consequences of this path.

But all other technologies have no such restrictions placed upon them. What nuclear warfare has done is to shift the accumulation of power and wealth away from warfare to the only other vehicle left which can accumulate things on a large-scale: Capitalism. The fact is that throughout all human history, up until the development of the atomic bomb: warfare has always been the easiest and most efficient way to acquire-accumulate any power or wealth.

Now: instead of destroying the Earth in a quick succession of World Wars, humans have woken up slightly... and moderated their tool-use. How? By transmuting military violence into economic violence: as a slower, more systematic form of destruction. Today the goal of our capitalistic civilization is obvious: pure, abstract greed... The stock market is nothing more than pure abstract accumulation. Each stockholder has a personal vested interest in preserving, perpetuating and advancing the tool-dynamic of accumulation and greed on a global scale.

It is by this means that the tool insures its own survival. Once you have a global system where the pressure to produce profits is stronger than any other consideration simply because shareholders are only interested in monetary gain: then the entire process becomes a blind engine... spewing out things without rhyme or reason. It becomes a self-perpetuating dynamic that is completely uncontrollable and ultimately totally meaningless. Unless you step outside the global normality of civilization, and examine how and why this dynamic works: you will not be able to realize how universally corrupting it is.

The problem is, that when you believe in the idea of winning, when you believe in the idea of profit: or in other words; when you have an ego-based awareness... then the more profit you make, the more you win; the more your ego-based self-esteem increases, the bigger your ego becomes, the more smug, arrogant, controlling you become. What is fair or balanced about winning when other people must lose? How much is a fair amount of profit? How much profit is enough? There is no such beast as enough profit; because it is all based upon the principle of an insatiable addiction to greed, and accumulation that never gets enough that is never satisfied; that always wants more.

This results in people not just making a profit; but cheating each other, being as dishonest as possible, lying as much as possible, or as much as they can get away with. And this results in all kinds of corrupt practices from price fixing to outright thievery. This in turn destroys the entire fabric and integrity of human honesty at its root because there are no limits placed upon the degree of human corruption except some kind of external regulation; it is a hopelessly inadequate approach which is easily circumvented. No form of external regulation can control the inner corruption of greed, or dishonesty, or fear, or hate.

This leads to the double standard of outer and inner values. It leads to the hypocrisy of humans saying one thing and doing another. It leads to the pathetic attempt to control the inner values of humans by external means. It leads to the ensuing corruption of governments, laws, business practices, etc... simply because of the conflicting double standards people are supposed to adhere to. You cannot have both profit and cooperation in the same dynamic, or greed and fairness, or the love of profit and love of others, or winning and balance, or honesty and ego. The conflict between the artificial values of civilization and the intrinsic values of our genetic instincts force people to live conflicted lives. How much profit is enough? When does it become gouging? When does it become profiteering? When does it become excessive?

There is never a serious attempt to limit profits, simply because everyone believes in it. Trying to restrict the greed of the majority of humans is like trying to restrict the majority of ocean water. Any minority trying to create a lower level of greed against the higher level of greed of the majority of humans is like building a dyke against the higher level of the ocean and trying to create a lower level of water behind it. The larger ocean always finds the path of least resistance and soon turns the slightest crack in your dyke into a raging torrent. Build up any accumulation of wealth, build up any higher level of greed by the majority of civilized humans...: and not all the dykes, levees and artificial dams of lower levels of greed can prevent it from bursting your artificial rules and regulations to cause havoc and destruction.

The grey area of profit is mostly kept hidden. It hides all of the graft, paybacks and influence peddling. It hides all kinds of self-interest and advantage. It hides how and why power is wielded. It hides all of the monetary and fiscal imbalances created by greed and corruption. The greater the greed, the greater the secrecy, the greater the profit: the more the imbalance between power and powerlessness, the more the inequity between wealth and poverty. Fear, greed, secrecy, power, and profit; all coalesce to produce the various degrees and kinds of corruption that exists within civilization. You will never cure this corruption unless you change the basic dynamic that it feeds off: which is accumulation. This root dynamic must be looked at, studied, evaluated, compared and questioned. But you can only do this if you compare it to a system that is not based upon accumulation. And no such system exists. We have nothing to compare the dynamic of civilization with, no perspective to evaluate it by.

Linear Functionality

Throughout human history: all of human technology has been justified and rationalized by linear logic, linear rationality, linear functionality, linear purpose and linear goals... they are basically all the same thing. They mean the same thing: and they all have the same effect. The effect of all linear functionality is to make the ends justify the means. If you are engaged in only one function, one purpose, if you do only one thing: then you must ignore all other functions, purposes and goals. In order to do any one thing, in order to reach any single goal: you must have a linear function, a linear purpose, a linear intent, a linear objective. That automatically forces you to ride roughshod over all other functions, purposes, goals and intentions. The philosophic question goes: Does the end justify the means, or do the means justify the end? People have wrestled with this ethical problem and never found a satisfactory solution to it. The entire question is a fallacy. Because it assumes that linear logic, that anything that is linear is okay. It takes linear functionality for granted. It does not ask whether linear functionality or logic is right or wrong... good or bad. It merely asks what the proper order of any linear function is. It merely asks which part of linear logic-function is more important.

The fact is that it is irrelevant which part of linear logic justifies which other part of linear logic. As long as you function linearly. As long as you think linearly, act-react linearly: you are dehumanizing yourself and everyone else in the process. This creates linear stupidity. It creates the attitude of: 'This is what is most important. What I am doing now; is important. This and only this is important. Nothing else in the Universe is more important than what I am doing now.'

This is the kind of Pyramidal tool-focus that creates the human ego. By humans acting-thinking-feeling linearly, they create a separated awareness which is exclusively focused on one idea, one goal, one function, one mechanical function... when the line... becomes sacred, unquestioned... everyone follows that line... that lie, whether it be a line of thought, or a line drawn on paper, or a line-road drawn into the ground. The human unsanity of the line, the unsanity of linear function, was created gradually all because of the linear nature of tools, all because most tools function linearly.

A farmer can and will destroy a whole woodland supporting hundreds of thousands of different species for the single, linear function-purpose of feeding and supporting one group of one species: his human family. A power company can, and will build a dam across a river, thus destroying an entire valley and its ecosystems for the single, linear, purpose-function of supplying power for a single human city. A construction company can and will destroy hundreds of square miles of land by leveling it and covering it with concrete and asphalt in order for the single purpose of a single species being able to travel from one point to another, as fast as and as easily as possible.

The ancient Mayans had to cut down 1,000 acres of Jungle for enough wood: just to make enough lime to cover one of their buildings with lime plaster  $3/8^{\text{th}}$ 's of an inch thick. Then what did they do? They began madly covering their buildings with even thicker plaster. They turned all of the rainforests around them into festering swamps so fast by cutting down all the trees and destroying their own eco-systems; that their entire Civilization disappeared in short order. Why?... Just to show how wealthy they were. All for one linear purpose of covering stone buildings with plaster in order to prettify them by covering them with fancy murals. They destroyed themselves simply by an irrational, exorbitant use of their natural resources. Today: this 2,000 year-old Rainforest they destroyed has since grown back... It took two thousand years for that rainforest to grow back from the devastation that the Mayans had inflicted upon it.

Now... today: that rainforest is being destroyed even faster than the Mayans... because of the linear purposes of oil companies, miners, ranchers, and villagers cutting down the trees even faster than the Mayans, for even more insane, useless linear reasons. And the only hope for saving any part of this huge Natural Wonder is by turning it into a National Park designed to preserve the 2,000 year-old rotting-crumbling Temples and buildings... Worshipping and preserving the old, ruined Mayan Temples that were responsible for originally destroying the rainforest 2,000 years ago in the first place. That is how insane civilization is.

This is the insane kind of linear priorities human have because of linear functionality. Those useless rotting temples are now more sacred and more precious to civilized governments and civilized societies than all the living things on this Earth. These piles of dead stone are more important to preserve; than all the trees in the world, all the animals in the world, all the plants in the world. Everything alive takes second place to preserving our dead heritage of the past. A heritage of pure useless destruction... which we still mindlessly worship and still mindlessly practice. Because of linear functionality.

Consumers can, and will create a globally destructive oil industry by buying cars solely for the purpose of traveling more easily and quickly: Thus making the journey itself as meaningless and boring as possible. Now airplanes travel almost perfectly linear straight lines at the highest possible speeds to arrive at their destination in the shortest possible time. The journey itself becomes meaningless the journey loses all meaning except for the end result, the goal, the destination... This is the rationale of all Science, all Technology, and of all civilization... That any linear end justifies any linear means.

Nobody bothers to notice that the corruptness of this rational was exposed thousands of years ago by many philosophers who were ignored in their day, and continue to be ignored today; except in 'philosophy courses' that do not even discuss the relevance of the fact that the creation of all evil comes from this way of thinking and doing and feeling.

Every linear chore, every linear task, linear work becomes meaningless except for its result, except to finish it. In French, if you say you're finished: 'Vous etes fini'. It means: you're dead. The only reason for doing chores is to get them out of the way. The only reason to drive a car is to get somewhere so the journey. Which becomes just another boring waste of time: is finished. People become goal oriented, they only work towards a goal. If there is no end in sight, then why do it? The only reason to do anything is the satisfaction of finishing it so you do not have to do it later. Whatever you do becomes meaningless except for the goal of finishing what you started. Then your entire life becomes filled with drudgery, with boring tasks that must be done just to get them over with. All because civilization is based upon linear concepts and dynamics, upon single-purpose functions, single-purpose goals.

A grain of sand has countless functions and purposes. It is needed and used as a crucial ingredient in soil, as a main component in all bedrock, in stone, in Tectonic activity, in mountain building, in the erosion of waterways, in controlling river and ocean currents, and as a building material for insects, birds, and animals, and it is used in the digestive processes of many living organisms... to name just a few functions and purposes of sand.

If you use any form of energy or matter; including sand; for a single, linear purpose-function: then by definition: you must destroy its original, intrinsic, multi-purpose functionality. You cannot have linear functionality without destroying multi-purpose functionality. This is why no matter how we try to alleviate or moderate the destructive effect of civilization: all over-intensive tool-use, all technology, all civilization is destructive towards living things. Including us.

If a mechanical, linear system such as a computer encounters even the tiniest obstruction: the entire system stops dead in its tracks. The same applies to a single-purpose, mechanical linear system such as a freeway. If there is one major obstruction on the highway: hundreds of cars grind to a halt... thousands more cars pile up behind them: and they all must wait until the obstruction is cleared before they start moving again. A single lane of traffic operates at the speed of the slowest car. The other drivers can honk and curse all they like: but if one idiot decides to slow down to 5 miles per hour; then everyone behind them must slow down also. That is why all mechanical, linear functionality is so horribly inefficient and wasteful.

Whereas a multi-directional, multi-purpose system such as the water in a river has no problem when it encounters an obstacle: it just flows around it. It does not need a maintenance crew to keep it running. It is an entirely self-regulating, and self-balancing system because it is multi-directional, it is multi-functional, it serves more than one purpose. So is the human body. So is the Universe. All multi-purpose functionality, all multi-path logic is superior to single-purpose logic. All multi-focus awareness is superior to single-focus awareness. That is why our instinctive-subconscious awareness is faster, smarter, wiser, more intelligent, more spontaneous, more creative and more adaptive, than the shallow, surface conscious awareness of our abstractively trained tool-brain. We use less than 1% of our brain capacity by only using the shallow, single-purpose, linear functioning of our consciousness, that is: our tool-brain. We only use the thin, outer crust of our brains to function mechanically. We do not use the inner core of our instincts, or the magma of our subconscious. Instead, we only use single-path, single-focus linear forms of functionality.

What would the Universe be like, if it operated purely by linear functionality? Then each atom, each electron could only be used for one purpose... one function. And after that one usage; it would have to be thrown away. Then there would be no such thing as covalent bonds. Then all the atoms sharing electrons would separate from each other after being connected only once. What if when the Universe came into being; only linear functions could work? Then after Energy, and Space, and Time were used for one specific function... then it would have to be thrown away as completely useless. Then Energy could only be used once for one function... and after that function it would have been thrown away as completely useless. Then Space could only be used once for only one function, and after that: be thrown away as being completely useless. Then there could have been no 'Big Bang' at all. Then all of the billions of changes in Energy and Space that had to happen during the Big Bang: would never have happened at all. Then no stars could have been formed. Then no galaxies could have been formed. Then no planets could have been formed. Then we would not be here today...

If someone decided to try to make the Universe function linearly, if someone tried to make the Universe function only mechanically: it would instantly freeze into complete uselessness. Just as our expensive, complicated machines freeze into complete uselessness the instant one tiny thing goes wrong with its linear functioning. Just like freeways freeze into complete uselessness the instant they have get a little too congested. If a river gets a little too much water does it get too congested? Does it instantly stop flowing like a linear highway does? Does it stop flowing? No. Because it is not operating by purely linear functions. It operates by general, multi-purpose, universal functions. Not by linear mechanical ones... Science presents our Universe as only functioning mechanically. But that implies it also functions only linearly, and people actually believe this crap.

Why do humans use the principle of linear functionality? Because that is how dead tools function. We think like our own tools, feel like our own tools, and act like our own tools: because we have been using them for millions of years and they have turned us into human tools. This does not mean that using them and thinking like them, and feeling like them and acting like them is humanly intelligent. It is not intelligent for an animal to take on the intelligence level of the symbiote that uses it.

What 4 million years of over-intensive tool-use has done to us; is that it has crippled us: by preventing us from accessing and developing 99% of our undeveloped human potential. It has impoverished us. It has made our lives shallow, bleak, boring and empty. It has made us uncreative, unspontaneous, unintelligent and unwise. Humans have yet to tap into the wealth of their Inner Selves. We have yet to explore the infinite bounds of our Inner Universe. Only if we relinquish our individual egos, only if we stop using tools too much, can we ever hope to evolve beyond our limited, shallow, mechanical awareness.

One insanity of linear functionality in modern society, is that there you have no control or choice over what you will spend most of your life doing. The idea of there being any choice in careers or jobs is laughable to say the least. People, given the circumstances, and choices available, usually gravitate towards the highest paying jobs with the highest status: regardless of what they like doing. Just because you like playing with children, does not mean you will work as a babysitter or nanny the rest of your life. Work is not supposed to be fun except for the exception: which exists only to prove that all the other jobs are not fun. Humans were never designed to spend their lives performing single-purpose linear functions or jobs. No human was ever genetically designed to become an engineer or a lawyer. To do only one thing or one job is a horrible, horrible waste of human life energy, time, effort, focus, and creativity.

But civilization is so structured; that the only way you can survive is by functioning linearly. The only way you can make a living is by functioning linearly. The only way you can think is by thinking linearly. The only way you can read is by reading linearly. The only way you can speak is by using logic and words linearly. The only way you can succeed is by functioning-thinking-speaking-focusing-feeling linearly.

The idea of linear usefulness in civilization is so insane, so corrupt... merely because it is based upon mechanical negative linear functionality. You may be the most talented, the best aeronautics engineer in the world... but. If you are unemployed... you are considered totally useless. You may be the best brain surgeon in the world... But. If you are unemployed. Then you are considered to be worthless. You may be the most talented, the best cook, mother, carpenter, writer or artist in the world... But. If you are unemployed. Then you are considered to be useless... a total failure. So much so: that many people who once were employed and fall out of employment, or are retired... kill themselves, commit suicide... because they are no longer linearly useful to civilization anymore. This is the same kind of insane Negative circular logic employers use on employees:

‘We need an experienced -----, do you have any experience?... No? Sorry... can’t hire you. How do you get any experience? Get a job. How do get a job? Get hired. How do you get hired? ‘You need to have experience.’

Meaning, screw your humanity... or the fact you happen to be a human being. If you aren’t being linearly useful as a tool to be used by civilization; then nobody cares if you starve, die, go broke or have a mental-emotional breakdown. That is what civilized people are supposed to base their self-esteem and self-worth on. Huh? The idea of only using one ability of any person, and not using anything else of their abilities, potentials, talents, etc. Is a totally ridiculous wasteful, inefficient, stupid, limiting way of living or doing anything. It is a horribly boring way to live. And it turns people into boring machines because they are forced to spend their energy doing only one thing, one function, so narrowly, that people develop a tunnel-vision of such narrowed blindness and non-awareness of any other possibility, any other part or aspect of themselves, they stop learning-growing-changing, asking questions, being curious. They stop living. Instead: they only function as machines. Until their machine-existence becomes normal. Until life and living becomes mostly a machine functioning existence. Until they stop being creative, stop having fun, stop laughing, stop playing, and only work, and try to relax from working too much. Until anything else other than their work becomes strange-weird-crazy-unimaginable-impossible-dangerous-feared-hated-disliked-sneered-at-laughed-at-ignored-denied-avoided. Until every person’s life branches off from any shared experience, until people’s lives become so linearly insular, that every person develops their own habits-customs-lifestyle-norm-reality, that people live next door to each other yet are completely alienated from each other because they apparently have nothing in common with each other

Civilization only exists because we function linearly most of our waking hours. Linear functionality is how civilized society works. It is the functional backbone of civilization. Without it civilization could not survive or exist for one second. Take away all linear functionality, and what is left? Just people living... getting along as best they can.

But what does linear functionality actually do? What is the result? It teaches the obscene lie; that work comes before family, friends, children, love, laughter, play, fun, socializing, being human. It teaches human uselessness. Linear functionality teaches emotional uselessness... that functioning mechanically is more important than human feelings. This is one of the most crippling things any human can learn. Babies, bawling in tears, watching mommy or daddy, or both, leaving for work: are taught at a very early age that they are not needed, not wanted, or loved. The message it sends is that their parent's work is more important than they are. It teaches them that work is much more important than love, or caring, or looking after children... that work is more important than feelings, or family, or being human. That any kind of linear functionality is not only important, it is sacred... never to be questioned or analyzed. Children are taught this obscene degrading dehumanizing lie each day; as their concerns are ignored in their parents rush to go to work... and again when their parents come back after work: by their parents exhausted inability to even listen to them. Teenagers are considered to be generally useless: simply because they have not yet learned how to function linearly yet in a specialized job or career. This weird cultural belief forces people to study and work for years, just so they can become linearly functional at one thing, just so they can have the privilege of looking for work, and be forced to compete as adversaries and enemies and competitors and strangers against each other. In order for anyone to get a job, we must fight against each other to get that single job, or career... we must become competitors, antagonists, enemies.

This destroys all love-trust-liking-caring-fun-happiness-play... it destroys all social bonding. It destroys all social groups and social activities. Anyone with a linear interest, a linear focus, a linear hobby, a linear career, a linear job, a linear chore:... instantly has nothing in common with anyone else who does not share an almost-identical interest in their linear ----- ; In fact, all these other people no longer even exist for them. Linear interests force people to branch-off from each other in so many countless ways, on so many countless levels: that it becomes normal to regard all the thousands of humans you see every day as non-human humans... as impersonally functioning machines. And that is a social divider of huge power.

Ask any married person what comes first in their priorities and they will put their family first. However: in order to afford a family, a car, a hose, clothes, etc. They have to spend most of their time working. And nobody is willing to admit that putting their family first, and work second: is pure hypocrisy. What their actual priority is... is work at job first, work at chores second, relax from job and chores third... and family last.

Until paying for the car, the clothes, the taxes, the food, the mortgage, takes a higher priority... and the work needed to pay for all these other higher priorities increases also... until there is almost no time, no energy, and no money to spend upon the supposed priority of family at all. What people say their priorities are... does not even vaguely resemble their actual priorities. It is called lip-service. White lies. Normal polite politically correct bullshit. What if a parent honestly said that their work had a higher priority than their family? They would be disapproved of, and ostracized and lectured by hypocrites who are not willing to admit their own unpleasant truths.

People are taught that they are only useful if they can successfully perform a single task working in a factory, or a single career as a lawyer. Tellers punching cash registers are used as single-purpose machines, to perform a single linear function. They must become enemies to each other: competing for the same, boring, easy, lucrative jobs. From birth to death: people are considered to be basically useless; unless they specialize in a linear function or a specialized, linear career. This effectively strangles and destroys nearly all human potential, human self-esteem and human values.

The growth, evolution, and development of linear functionality creates Specialization. Linear functions and models grow just like bushes and trees do. The farther any linear function goes, the more it branches out into more and more specialized linear functions. And just like a bush or a tree, the farthest-most ends, the extremities take up most of the energy, and grow and flourish the most. The result is that the more specialized the function, the more useless it is to the rest of the model, yet the more resources it sucks out of the linear tree in terms of money, and man-hours, and human life-energy hours. The result is the more specialized your function, the more lucrative it is the higher status it enjoys, the more money you are paid to do it. So in order to survive and succeed inside civilization; people waste their lives training and studying to become as specialized and as useless and wasteful as possible in the narrowest fields-linear models; because that is where the money is. In other words: the civilized notion of success is finding the most useless, specialized function possible that pays the most money.

Until you get scientific researchers who are so specialized that they cannot explain what they do, or why they are doing it: because their specialized linear functions are so meaningless and useless, that they have no understanding of what they are do; and have no goal or purpose in their specialized research. In other words; they are being paid just to fart around with some complex machines.

Yet this kind of specialized insanity is exactly the kind of stupidity that is worshipped in awe and reverence simply because it is so specialized, because it is so complex, because it is so incomprehensible, because it is so useless, because it is so stupid, because it is so irrational, because it is so unjustifiable, because it is so illogical. Then you have the curious dynamic of ignorant people worshipping something merely because they do not understand it...because they are ignorant about it.

They are only worshipping the effect of their own ignorance... it is the effect of ignorance that creates this awe and reverence. What people are actually worshipping is the ignorance itself. It is a vicious cycle that creates the norm of people who do not expect to understand their own part in this, who are not expected to question any linear function at all. And the more specialized and useless and complex their linear functions become: the more unquestioningly they pursue it, the more narrowly they focus on it, the blinder they become, the more non-aware they become, the more disconnected they become, the dumber they become.

The ability to ignore your surroundings, ignore the people around you, indifference, denial, narrow, obsessive behaviour: all this comes from linear functionality. Linear functionality is the rationalized excuse for every imaginable kind of inhuman behaviour. The cop writing an expensive ticket to an unemployed person with no car insurance... the lawyer evicting a penniless family out into the street, with their wailing terrified children in total shock... the telemarketer making hundreds of intrusive phone calls an hour...are only: "doing their job". They are only enforcing the law; they are only following company policy, obeying the law, obeying regulations, they are only following one linear train of thought, one linear set of rationalizations, and one linear model. Linear functionality destroys all human sense of love, caring, kindness, morality, ethics, and humanity. It forces people to become inhuman, single-purpose functioning robots. It destroys all critical, comparative awareness and thinking. Linear functionality today is leaving billions of unwanted, less fortunate people to starve and die in hopeless misery. It has created billions of human outcasts... rejected by their own tool-societies, rejected and forgotten by the entire population of more fortunate humans... simply because they do not happen to be linearly useful as tools.

All physical violence is simply the accumulated power of an explosive energy being directed along a single, linear path... like an axe, an arrow, a bullet, or a missile. All destruction, all brutality, is energy-power being used linearly... functioning linearly. All the armies in the world are merely examples of linear functioning, linear destructive power and linear non-critical behaviour gone rampantly insane. What if there was no linear functioning, linear thinking, linear logic, linear power, linear inhumanity, or linear destructiveness? What if we thought-felt-acted-inter-acted on more than one level at a time? Today...people cannot even imagine such a way of living. The abstract linear line is what we do with our brains, our eyes: we draw lines with our eyes, with our minds, with our thoughts, with our actions; because we have been trained to do so from birth. We have become tainted with tools so much that we lose our own humanity in the process. All because we do not question the linear effect of using tools on ourselves.

Linear thought habits destroy all critical-comparative awareness and thinking.

When you are sitting in a traffic jam on the freeway... do you try to be critically aware? No. What does being in a linear traffic jam teach? It forces you to become resigned to your lot. It forces you to push down all of your impatience. It forces you to store up all of your anger at the stupid linear things, regulations, machines, that obstruct you and prevent you from doing anything at all. It forces you into a near permanent state of boredom. It forces you not to think critically. It forces you to be hopeless. It forces you to waste your time. It forces you to waste your life... looking for a linear part to fix a linear machine, and follow the linear regulations and laws.

If everyone who bought any machine; actually followed all of the instructions to the letter of how to maintain it, and run it, and studied all of these books so they would know when to do their proper regular maintenance... they would find that all the time they thought they saved is lost in the extra time they took to run and maintain all their machines and appliances.

Everyone sluffs off these details of how to properly maintain your VCR, or Fax, or Computer, or Car, or Washing Machine, or Fridge, etc. The result is; machines continuously breaking down, and furious consumers trashing them, and buying new ones. Only to find that the newer the machine, the more complex it is, the more it breaks down, the longer it takes to learn how to use it, the cheaper its quality, the shorter its lifespan. Then they mourn for the good old days... when a refrigerator used to last 50 years. And a car lasted 30 years. When the machines were actually simple enough to be fixed easily. When you compare the quality of a car built 50 years ago to the ones being built today: the old cars were heavier, simpler and not as complex. But they lasted longer, broke down less and were cheaper to fix. So... what do you want? A piece of modern, overpriced, expensive junk? Which you will be forced to trash before you can get your money's worth out of it? Something that is expensive as hell to fix? Or do you want a simple, reliable, practical vehicle that does not gouge your pocketbook; and gets you from point A. to point B, just as effectively and comfortably as the brand new car does? What do you want: a car or a status symbol?

Which is easier to drive? Faster? More comfortable? Has more gadgets? Rides smoother? Oops. You just lost your common sense. You prefer complexity to simplicity. You prefer luxury to hardship. Even if it is the ease of a newer, more expensive model car to an older cheaper, more reliable model car. People do not bother to compare one linear normality to any other norm. People stop comparing at all. They stop thinking critically. They stop asking questions about anything. If your company orders you to do things a certain way, then it is totally unimportant what someone else thinks, or how someone else does a linear function. You just follow your narrow, linear orders and ignore everything else because nothing else is important. That is how soldiers are trained to kill, that is how you are trained to use tools and how to function in the workplace. The result is a brutalized, non-human machinelike behavior that has become normalized throughout society.

One problem with linear functionality is that it creates waste. It creates pollution. It kills. It is destructive. It creates things that are disposable. It creates uselessness. Use a paper bag once: then throw it away. Use a chemical in a factory: then pour it into the river as a useless waste product. Burn wood, coal, or oil once: and throw the useless exhaust gases and particles into the air and dump the useless soot into the ground, where it kills all living organisms that exist there. Use a pair of shoes until they wear out: then throw them away as a useless piece of junk. Make one grammatical error on a printed page, and throw it away as a useless piece of paper that is not linearly perfect. Every form of human waste, every polluting, toxic, poisonous waste product we create comes from this insane dynamic of linear functionality. All linear functionality results in one-sided, imbalanced, accumulating waste.

The civilized concept of linear success. The idea of making linear mistakes. Poisons all of our lives. If we make too many mistakes; then we lose. All sports are designed to be played so the athlete that makes the least mistakes win. Every war ever fought is won by the army that makes the least mistakes. Every civilized success story is about the person who makes the least mistakes. Winning and success is achieved by not making mistakes. We have been raised to fear making any mistake. We are terrified of doing anything wrong; because it is a mistake. What is wrong? Whatever an Authority tells you is wrong.

If there is one thing wrong with the linear logic process of a computer program. That program crashes. If one thing goes wrong with a modern passenger airliner... that plane crashes. If one thing goes wrong in a nuclear reactor, it crashes. If one thing goes wrong with the power grids of modern industrialized nations. The power to whole cities crash. If you make one mistake navigating a ship or plane... you can crash and die. If you miss any linear target, you either lose, or crash or die.

The civilized farce called education is based upon giving the right linear answer, the only one correct linear answer, to one linear question. If you go off that predetermined linear path, if you make any mistake: then you fail, you flunk. If you make too many mistakes: you are uneducated. As a result, the more educated a person is, the stupider they become: because they are terrified of making a mistake. Because they have been taught that there is only one way, one correct answer. Because they have only been trained how to think linearly. However: the Universe does not function linearly at all. The Universe does not function by following only one linear path. It makes mistakes. Making mistakes is only way the Universe can function. There is no such thing as a 'success' in the Universe.

Unless you want to select a particular thing and call it a success. But in order to do that, you would have to give all the glory to the trillions of mistakes that had to come before that single mistake, in order for this single success to exist. Human civilization tries to function linearly... without making any mistakes. As a result... it screws up everything it tries. And humans never learn from these linear mistakes. We keep doing the same mistakes over.

One lesson in modern technology is drummed into human brains until we absorb that message in fear, and unquestioning obedience. Whatever is done: must be done only one way... and that way must be perfect. If a nuclear reactor built along the edge of the Pacific Ocean does not work perfectly... if it leaks... it can destroy half the Earth's oceans in a single cataclysmic poisoning. Yet people do not give a single thought to the nuclear reactor between Los Angeles and San Diego, only a few thousand feet from the entire Pacific Ocean... without any fail-safe or sensible precautions to prevent a nuclear mistake from poisoning the entire Pacific Ocean and turning it into a death zone for millions of years. If that ever happens... then literally hundreds of millions of humans will starve to death because there will be no more fish in the Pacific Ocean... all because only one human machine did not work 'perfectly'. It is this kind of linear logic, and technology that is systematically destroying all living things on this planet including human animals.

In every manufacturing process, there is only one way to do it. Every other way is wrong; a mistake. There is only one way to do a job... any other way is wrong; a mistake. Even if the wrong way is faster, better, easier, simpler, etc. In every sacred cultural dance and ritual: there is only one way to do it. Every other way is wrong. It is not only a mistake, it is such a sacrilege that if anyone even dares to try to change the only right way... they are killed. Or not even listened-to. Or laughed at. Or completely and utterly ignored. Every process, every ritual, every government, every business, every corporation, every family... the daily routine and habits of every human on this planet... literally everything humans do, we do only one way. And God help anyone who tries to even suggest that there is any other way to do it.

Every machine works only one way. Every machine must be repaired and maintained in only one way. Every machine can only be assembled only in one way. Every machine can only be disassembled only in one way. Every linear form of logic and rationality has only one answer. All of these exclusive, one-way, one-answer, one-success ways conflict with each other. They are not the only way. No single linear path is the only way.

Yet this is how all civilized cultures and societies work. They never change the basic dynamics by which they work... Western civilization sells the idea of no change as being a revolutionary change. How? By glorifying explorers, people who pushed the limits... Only after they were safely dead... And only if their new path is adopted by the rest of society... only then do they suddenly become publicly recognized as trailblazers ... Or, going where no man has gone before.

Once a person blazes a linear trail. Then others follow that linear blazed trail mindlessly... until it becomes a beaten path, then a road, and finally a concrete highway. Because all of the people following that linear blazed trail never explore any other linear trail or possibility. Until every new blazed trail, every new linear path becomes set in stone, set in ritual, set into habit, set into routines, into tradition, into law, into culture, into dogma, into belief systems, into norms, etc... etc. That is not change. That is the best way to change as little as possible.

The more specialized our tools became, the more specialized and exclusive humans became, the more they belonged to exclusive clubs, cliques, groups, professions, religions, etc. The mindset of exclusiveness, the idea of exclusiveness, the attraction of anything that is exclusive. Thinking along certain exclusive rationalized paths. Feeling exclusive, special. Forming exclusive societies, groups, etc... comes from humans using tools that increasingly worked only in one, specialized way. We trained ourselves as tool-using apes for millions of years to think, feel, act and inter-act linearly: by adapting ourselves to the tools we used. Instead of to the environment we lived in. But this incredibly narrowed form of adaptation led us to lead narrow, blinkered, linear lives devoid of all creativity and wonder. Without the sense of pure wonder, humans are just walking tools... justifying their use of tools by linear rationalizations, which are meaningless outside the context of tools. This is a self-contained form of circle-logic. This vicious cycle that needs to be broken if the Earth is to be saved from further destruction by civilized humans. Linear functionality has no validity outside itself. It has no meaning or use outside of civilization. In actuality: it is our tools that are using us to use them. We only fool ourselves by rationalizing that this is our godhead, our supreme uniqueness that makes us superior to all other living creatures.

If you want to get an idea of what the wisest possible linear human wisdom is... just look at how the famous ancient Chinese book of wisdom called the 'I Ching' uses linear lines to explain how and why the underlying dynamics of people's lives work. It transfers a 'random' tossing of six round coins in all its possible permutations into linear translations of connected and unconnected lines. Without even understanding or explaining why this transfer of round coins- to linear lines takes place. It takes place because the human animal is the only animal that walks upright and the only animal that translates all the horizontal life energy of all the earth and all the living things on it into vertical energy wave-sensations. There is no reason this book needs to transfer the permutations of six found-tossed-round coins into linear lines in the first place... it just does it unquestioningly... unquestioningly transforming all of its wisdom and explanations into linear lines. And from these mostly meaningless linear abstractions, translate the actual energy dynamic back into common sense words... why? Because by the time this book was written, human reality had become so linear that, it had to interpret the entire actual Universe into and through linear lines.

This book does not bother to explain why the tossing of coins is even needed, or how this tossing works. There is no such thing as randomness in the Universe. The tossing of the coins is merely a way of accessing and detecting finer, subtler energy waves emanating from human life-auras that determine exactly... precisely... which of these permutations will show up because once you throw up round coins into the air near you... they instantly become self-balanced... and the energy of their motion joins with the energy of the human aura of the person throwing those round coins. The self-inveighed value placed upon what each side of the coins... whatever the heads or tails mean to that person then align themselves to whatever subtler energy is coming from that person's aura.

Why? Because humans are capable of soaking... filling any physically dead object with their own energy, and their own meanings... merely by being near these objects or focusing their attention on them. That is how and why all sacred objects gain, hold, and accumulate supposedly magical powers of healing. The more hours and years human life-energy poured into making any artefact, the more it is revered and put into museums. That is also why we obsess and revere old, dead artefacts that were once made, created, and used by humans... because the aura-energy emanating from these artefacts have been permanently changed with the overlaid aura-energy of their most recent past into a personal history of its creators-makers-users... and we sense that lost history of these forgotten people and try to resurrect their memory.

How the Chinese book of changes works is simple but subtle. The tossed coins have to be held in the hands of the tosser... in order to absorb that person's Auric energy field... and then this energy then determines precisely in what combination of permutations the tossed-near perfectly-balanced moving coins end up on the ground as a result of that tossing. All this is understandable and explainable. That is...if you understand what is going on in the more subtle energy waves of living things, which no scientific measuring device can sense, and which science assumes has no energy to detect in the first place.

Nevertheless... Changing horizontal energy waves into vertical energy waves when they are not ready to be changed and are damaged by that change is a blood-sin of violence. An undigested insight that is misused can become the creation of more evil. No human is supposed to become aware of energy waves they are not directly attuned-to, and have no understanding of. Because then, they will use that subtler energy-knowledge for more crass, brutal, selfish motives, and pollute their own psyches and physical bodies with pre-knowledge they are not ready to use properly yet. The mere use of the Book of Changes for any self-interest automatically destroys the wisdom it is seeking to give to the tosser. So... most uses of the book result in null effects. The book itself is an evil book of pre-knowledge that was designed specifically for people obsessed in getting a spiritual advantage over other people... by finding out insights that they were not supposed to find out yet. Any positive use of that book is harmless, because then, it only reveals what the tosser already knows deep inside themselves... Then it is only a confirmation of what the person already knew instinctively... on a gut level. So there was no good or positive reason for that book ever to have been published or written in the first place.

Now take the linear use of lines... look at how human wisdom uses these lines... and you will find that any human wisdom that even uses linear lines at all is potentially a corrupting force that gives people pre-knowledge of things they are not ready for yet. This book is an exception. Why? Because it explains the dynamics of what is called wisdom so anyone can understand it, so they can use their own wisdom and not use one single thing in this book for their own advantage. In fact I challenge any human to see if they can use anything in this book to gain any kind of advantage for themselves. The fact that this cannot be done proves this book has a positive energy that is incorruptible... because it happens to be written with the intent of destroying everything that is corrupt

While on the other hand: the Book of Changes was obviously corrupt before it was ever written... Because the goal of that book is an attempt to systematize all signs and meanings specifically for the use of the advantage of the reader of the book... That is the reason it was even written... Its original intent is corrupt. Why is the 'The Book of Changes' revered as a mystical sacred book? Because people do not understand how and why it works or does not work. Once you understand how to use this book positively, then you no longer need to use it all. Then you can follow your own wisdom and gut instincts and throw the book away. Once you understand any self-interest, or self-advantage that is Negative-weakening-unloving-imbalanced is Evil: then you will not use the book.

Similarly, you do not need to read this book if you already understand the dynamic and principles contained in it. But if you do not understand these principles; then this book can become a valuable asset in understanding yourself and the civilization you live in.

Tool Functioning vs. Human Functioning

The way you deal with things is affected by what you deal with. The way you deal with things is determined not only by what you deal with: but for how long you deal with it. Kindergarten teachers who spend most of their time with little pre-school children become unused to dealing with other people on an adult level simply because they have become more used to socially interacting on a child's level. Mechanics who spend most of their life fixing mechanical problems: are only interested in mechanical things.

Human dysfunctionism comes from using tools. Tool functionalism creates human dysfunctionism. By spending more of your time dealing with tools and machines than dealing with living humans and living creatures: you end up treating living things including yourself: like you treat tools.

Why do people love tools so much?

Because a tool or machine does not demand your time and attention like children do. Machines are not demanding, they do not whine or cry when they are hurt.

Once they are fixed: you can ignore them.

As long as they function correctly: you can ignore them.

After you fix a tool or machine: you can abandon it. And leave it alone, and ignore it. Until it breaks down.

If a tool breaks: you can throw it away.

If a tool breaks: you can always make another one.

You do not have to pay attention to machines. As long as their mechanical function works: you can take them for granted.

Slaves that are alive feel pain. Slaves that are not alive do not feel pain. You can use tools like mechanical slaves. You can abuse them. You can yell at them. You can throw them out the window or stomp on them and break them and they will not protest against this brutal destructive treatment.
